THE LIFE

OF

DAVID HUME, ESQ.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.
MY OWN LIFE.

It is difficult for a man to speak long of himself without vanity; therefore I shall be short. It may be thought an instance of vanity that I pretend at all to write my life; but this narrative shall contain little more than the history of my writings; as, indeed, almost all my life has been spent in literary pursuits and occupations. The first success of most of my writings was not such as to be an object of vanity.

I was born the 26th of April, 1711, old style, at Edinburgh. I was of a good family, both by father and mother: my father's family is a branch of the Earl of Home's, or Hume's; and my ancestors had been proprietors of the estate which my brother possesses, for several generations. My mother was daughter of Sir David Falconer, President of the College of Justice: the title of Lord Halkerton came by succession to her brother.

My family, however, was not rich, and being myself a younger brother, my patrimony, according to the mode of my country, was of course very slender. My father, who passed for a man of parts, died when I was an infant, leaving me, with an elder brother and a sister, under the care of our mother, a woman of singular merit, who, though young and handsome, devoted herself entirely to the rearing and educating of her children. I passed through the ordinary course of education with success, and was seized very early with a passion for literature, which has been the ruling passion of my life, and the great source of my enjoyments. My studious disposition, my sobriety, and my industry, gave my family a notion that the law was a proper profession for me; but I found an unsurmountable aversion to every thing but the pursuits of philosophy and general learning; and while they fancied I was poring upon Voet and Vinnius, Cicero and Virgil were the authors which I was secretly devouring.

My very slender fortune, however, being unsuitable to this plan of life, and my health being a little broken by my ardent application, I was tempted, or rather forced, to make a very feeble trial into a more active scene of life. In 1734 I went to Bristol, with some recommendations to several merchants; but in a few months found that scene totally unsuitable to me. I went over to France with a view of prosecuting my studies in a country retreat; and I there laid that plan of life which I have steadily and successfully pursued. I resolved to make a very rigid frugality supply my deficiency of fortune, to maintain unimpaired my independency, and to regard every object as contemptible, except the improvement of my talents in literature.

During my retreat in France, first at Rheims, but chiefly at La Fleche, in Anjou, I composed my Treatise of Human Nature. After passing three years very agreeably in that country, I came over to London in 1737. In the end of 1738 I published my Treatise, and immediately went down to my mother and my brother, who lived at his country-house, and employed himself very judiciously and successfully in the improvement of his fortune.
Never literary attempt was more unfortunate than my Treatise of Human Nature. It fell dead-born from the press, without reaching such distinction as even to excite a murmur among the zealots. But being naturally of a cheerful and sanguine temper, I very soon recovered the blow, and prosecuted with great ardour my studies in the country. In 1742 I printed at Edinburgh the first part of my Essays: the work was favourably received, and soon made me entirely forget my former disappointment. I continued with my mother and brother in the country, and in that time recovered the knowledge of the Greek language, which I had too much neglected in my early youth.

In 1745 I received a letter from the Marquis of Annandale, inviting me to come and live with him in England; I found also, that the friends and family of that young nobleman were desirous of putting him under my care and direction, for the state of his mind and health required it. —I lived with him a twelvemonth. My appointments during that time made a considerable accession to my small fortune. I then received an invitation from General St. Clair to attend him as a secretary to his expedition, which was at first meant against Canada, but ended in an incursion on the coast of France. Next year, to wit, 1747, I received an invitation from the General, to attend him in the same station in his military embassy to the courts of Vienna and Turin. I then wore the uniform of an officer, and was introduced at those courts as aid-de-camp to the General, along with Sir Harry Erskine and Captain Grant, now General Grant. These two years were almost the only interruptions which my studies have received during the course of my life: I passed them agreeably, and in good company; and my appointments, with my frugality, had made me reach a fortune, which I called independent, though most of my friends were inclined to smile when I said so: in short, I was now master of near a thousand pounds.

I had always entertained a notion, that my want of success, in publishing the Treatise of Human Nature, had proceeded more from the manner than the matter, and that I had been guilty of a very usual indiscretion, in going to the press too early. I therefore cast the first part of that work anew in the Inquiry concerning Human Understanding, which was published while I was at Turin. But this piece was at first little more successful than the Treatise of Human Nature. On my return from Italy, I had the mortification to find all England in a ferment, on account of Dr. Middleton's Free Inquiry, while my performance was entirely overlooked and neglected. A new edition which had been published in London, of my Essays, moral and political, met not with a much better reception.

Such is the force of natural temper, that these disappointments made little or no impression on me. I went down in 1749, and lived two years with my brother at his country-house, for my mother was now dead. I there composed the second part of my Essay, which I called Political Discourses, and also my Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals, which is another part of my Treatise that I cast anew. Meanwhile my bookseller, A. Miller, informed me that my former publications (all but the unfortunate Treatise) were beginning to be the subject of conversation; and that the sale of them was gradually increasing, and that new editions were demanded. Answers by Reverends and Right Reverends came out two or three in a year; and I found, by Dr. Warburton's railing, that the books were beginning to be esteemed in good company. However, I had a fixed resolution, which I inflexibly maintained, never to reply to any body; and not being very irascible in my temper, I have easily kept myself clear of all literary squabbles. These symptoms of a rising reputation gave me encouragement, as I was ever more disposed to see the favourable than the unfavourable side of things; a turn of mind which it is more happy to possess, than to be born to an estate of ten thousand a year.

In 1751 I removed from the country to the town, the true scene for a man of letters. In 1752 were published at Edinburgh, where I then lived, my Political Discourses, the only work of mine that was successful on the first publication. It was well received at home and abroad. In the same year was published at London, my Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals; which, in my own opinion, (who ought not to judge on that subject,) is of all my writings, historical, philosophical, or literary, incomparably the best. It came unnoticed and unobserved into the world.

In 1752 the Faculty of Advocates chose me their Librarian, an office from which I received little or no emolument, but which gave me the command of a large library. I then formed the plan of writing the History of England; but being frightened with the notion of continuing a narrative through a period of 1700 years, I commenced with the accession of the house of Stuart, an epoch when, I thought, the misrepresentations of faction began chiefly to take place. I was, I own, sanguine in my expectations of the success of this work. I thought that I was the only historian that had at once neglected present power, interest, and authority, and the cry of popular prejudices; and as the subject was suited in every capacity, I expected proportional applause. But miserable was my disappointment: I was assailed by one cry of reproach, disapprobation, and even detestation; English, Scotch, and Irish, whig and tory, churchman and sectary, freethinker and religionist, patriot and courtier, united in their rage against the man who had presumed to shed a generous tear for the fate of Charles I. and the Earl of Strafford; and after the first ebullitions of their fury were over, what was still more mortifying, the book seemed to sink into oblivion. Mr. Miller told me, that in a twelvemonth he sold only forty-five copies of it. I scarcely, indeed, heard of one man in the three kingdoms, considerable for rank or letters, that could endure the book. I must only except the primate of England, Dr. Herring, and the primate of Ireland, Dr. Stone, which seem two odd exceptions. These dignified prelates separately sent me a message not to be discouraged.

I was, however, I confess, discouraged; and had not the war at that time been breaking out between France and England, I had certainly retired to some provincial town of the former kingdom, have changed my name, and never more have returned to my native country. But as this scheme was not now practicable, and the subsequent volume was considerably advanced, I resolved to pick up courage and to persevere.

In this interval, I published at London my Natural History of Religion, along with some other small pieces: its public entry was rather obscure, except only that Dr. Hurd wrote a pamphlet against it, with all the illiberal petulance, arrogance, and scurrility, which distinguish the Warburtonian school. This pamphlet gave me some consolation for the otherwise indifferent reception of my performance.

In 1756, two years after the fall of the first volume, was published the second volume of my History, containing the period from the death of Charles I. till the Revolution. This performance happened to give less displeasure to the whigs, and was better received. It not only rose itself, but helped to buoy up its unfortunate brother.

But though I had been taught by experience, that the whig party were in possession of bestowing all places, both in the state and in literature, I was so little inclined to yield to their senseless clamour, that in above a hundred alterations, which further study, reading, or reflection engaged me to make in the reigns of the two first Stuarts, I have made all of them invariably to the tory side. It is ridiculous to consider the English constitution before that period as a regular plan of liberty.

In 1759 I published my History of the House of Tudor. The clamour against this performance was almost equal to that against the History of the two first Stuarts. The reign of Elizabeth was particularly obnoxious. But I was now callous against the impressions of public folly, and continued very peaceably and contentedly in my retreat at Edinburgh, to finish, in two volumes, the more early part of the English History, which I gave to the public in 1761, with tolerable, and but tolerable, success.

But notwithstanding this variety of winds and seasons to which my writings had been exposed, they had still been making such advances, that the copy-money given me by the booksellers much exceeded any thing formerly known in England; I was become not only independent, but opulent. I retired to my native country of Scotland, determined never more to set my foot out of it; and retaining the satisfaction of never having preferred a request to one great man, or even making advances of friendship to any of them. As I was now turned of fifty, I thought of passing all the rest of my life in this philosophical manner, when I received, in 1763, an invitation from the Earl of Hertford, with whom I was not in the least acquainted, to attend him on his embassy to Paris, with a near prospect of being appointed secretary to his embassy; and, in the meanwhile, of performing the functions of that office. This offer, however inviting, I at first declined, both because I was reluctant to begin connexions with the great, and because I was afraid that the civilities and gay company of Paris would prove disagreeable to a person of my age and humour; but on his lordship’s repeating the invitation, I accepted of it. I have every reason, both of pleasure and interest, to think myself happy in my connexions with that nobleman, as well as afterwards with his brother General Conway.

Those who have not seen the strange effects of modes, will never imagine the reception I met with at Paris, from men and women of all ranks and stations. The more I resiled from their excessive civilities, the more I was loaded with them. There is, however, a real satisfaction in living at Paris, from the great number of sensible, knowing, and polite company with which that city abounds above all places in the universe. I thought once of settling there for life.

I was appointed secretary to the embassy; and, in summer, 1765, Lord Hertford left me, being appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. I was Chargé d’Affaires till the arrival of the Duke of Richmond, towards the end of the year. In the beginning of 1766, I left Paris, and next summer went to Edinburgh, with the same view as formerly, of burying myself in a philosophical retreat. I returned to that place, not richer, but with much more money, and a much larger income, by means of Lord Hertford’s friendship, than I left it; and I was desirous of trying what superfluity could produce, as I had formerly made an experiment of a competency. But in 1767 I received from Mr. Conway an invitation to be under-secretary; and this invitation, both the character of the person, and my connexions with Lord Hertford, prevented me from declining. I returned to Edinburgh in 1769, very opulent, (for I possessed a revenue of £1000 a-year,) healthy, and though somewhat stricken in years, with the prospect of enjoying long my ease, and of seeing the increase of my reputation.

In spring 1775 I was struck with a disorder in my bowels, which at first gave me no alarm, but has since, as I apprehend it, become mortal and incurable. I now reckon upon a speedy dissolution. I have suffered very little pain from my disorder; and what is more strange, have, notwithstanding the great decline of my person, never suffered a moment’s abatement of my spirits; insomuch, that were I to name a period of my life which I should most choose to pass over again, I might be tempted to point to this later period. I possess the same ardour as ever in study, and the same gaiety in company. I consider, besides, that a man of sixty-five, by dying, cuts off only a few years of infirmities; and though I see many symptoms of my literary reputation’s breaking out at last with additional lustre, I knew that I could have but few years to enjoy it. It is difficult to be more detached from life than I am at present.

To conclude historically with my own character. I am, or rather was; (for that is the style I must now use in speaking of myself, which emboldens me the more to speak my sentiments;) I was, I say, a man of mild disposition, of command of temper, of an open, social, and cheerful humour, capable of attachment, but little susceptible of enmity, and of great moderation in all my passions. Even my love of literary fame, my ruling passion, never soured my temper, notwithstanding my frequent disappointments. My company was not unacceptable to the young and careless, as well as to the studious and literary; and as I took a particular pleasure in the company of modest women, I had no reason to be displeased with the reception I met with from them. In a word, though most men, anywise eminent, have found reason to complain of calumny, I never was touched, or even attacked, by her baleful tooth; and though I wantonly exposed myself to the rage of both civil and religious factions, they seemed to be disarmed in my behalf of their wonted fury. My friends never had occasion to vindicate any one circumstance of my character and conduct: not but that the zealots, we may well suppose, would have been glad to invent and propagate any story to my disadvantage, but they could never find any which they thought would wear the face of probability. I cannot say there is no vanity in making this funeral oration of myself; but I hope it is not a misplaced one; and this is a matter of fact which is easily cleared and ascertained.

LETTER

ADAM SMITH, LL. D. TO WILLIAM STRAHAN, ESQ.

Dear Sir,

Kirkaldy Fifeshire, Nov. 9. 1776.

It is with a real, though a very melancholy, pleasure, that I sit down to give you some account of the behaviour of our late excellent friend, Mr. Hume, during his last illness.

Though in his own judgment his disease was mortal and incurable, yet he allowed himself to be prevailed upon, by the entreaty of his friends, to try what might be the effects of a long journey. A few days before he set out, he wrote that account of his own life, which, together with his own papers, he has left to your care. My account, therefore, shall begin where his ends.

He set out for London towards the end of April, and at Morpeth met with Mr. John Home and myself, who had both come down from London on purpose to see him, expecting to have found him at Edinburgh. Mr. Home returned with him, and attended him during the whole of his stay in England with that care and attention which might be expected from a temper so perfectly friendly and affectionate. As I had written to my mother that she might expect me in Scotland, I was under the necessity of continuing my journey. His disease seemed to yield to exercise and change of air, and when he arrived in London, he was apparently in much better health than when he left Edinburgh. He was advised to go to Bath to drink the waters, which appeared for some time to have so good an effect upon him, that even he himself began to entertain, what he was not apt to do, a better opinion of his own health.
His symptoms, however, soon returned with their usual violence, and from that moment he gave up all thoughts of recovery, but submitted with the utmost cheerfulness, and the most perfect complacency and resignation. Upon his return to Edinburgh, though he found himself much weaker, yet his cheerfulness never abated, and he continued to divert himself, as usual, with correcting his own works for a new edition, with reading books of amusement, with the conversation of his friends; and sometimes in the evening with a party at his favourite game of whist. His cheerfulness was so great, and his conversation and amusements ran so much in their usual strain, that notwithstanding all bad symptoms, many people could not believe he was dying. "I shall tell your friend, Colonel Edmonstone," said Doctor Dundas to him one day, "that I left you much better, and in a fair way of recovery." "Doctor," said he, "as I believe you would not choose to tell any thing but the truth, you had better tell him, that I am dying as fast as my enemies, if I have any, could wish, and as easily and cheerfully as my best friends could desire." Colonel Edmonstone soon afterwards came to see him, and take leave of him; and on his way home he could not forbear writing him a letter, bidding him once more an eternal adieu, and applying to him, as to a dying man, the beautiful French verses in which the Abbé Chaulieu, in expectation of his own death, laments his approaching separation from his friend the Marquis de la Fare.
Mr. Hume's magnanimity and firmness were such, that his most affectionate friends knew that they hazarded nothing in talking or writing to him as to a dying man, and that, so far from being hurt by this frankness, he was rather pleased and flattered by it. I happened to come into his room while he was reading this letter, which he had just received, and which he immediately showed me. I told him, that though I was sensible how very much he was weakened, and that appearances were in many respects very bad, yet his cheerfulness was still so great, the spirit of life seemed still to be so very strong in him, that I could not help entertaining some faint hopes. He answered, "Your hopes are groundless. An habitual diarrhoea of more than a year's standing, would be a very bad disease at any age: at my age it is a mortal one. When I lie down in the evening I feel myself weaker than when I rose in the morning, and when I rise in the morning weaker than when I lay down in the evening.
I am sensible, besides, that some of my vital parts are affected, so that I must soon die."
"Well, said I, "if it must be so, you have at least the satisfaction of leaving all your friends, your brother's family in particular, in great prosperity." He said that he felt that satisfaction so sensibly, that when he was reading, a few days before, Lucian's Dialogues of the Dead, among all the excuses which are alleged to Charon for not entering readily into his boat, he could not find one that fitted him; he had no house to finish, he had no daughter to provide for, he had no enemies upon whom he wished to revenge himself. "I could not well imagine," said he, "what excuse I could make to Charon in order to obtain a little delay. I have done every thing of consequence which I ever meant to do, and I could at no time expect to leave my relations and friends in a better situation than that in which I am now likely to leave them; I therefore have all reason to die contented." He then diverted himself with inventing several jocular excuses which he supposed he might make to Charon, and with imagining the very surly answers which it might suit the character of Charon to return to them. "Upon further consideration," said he, "I thought I might say to him, 'Good Charon, I have been correcting my works for a new edition. Allow me a little time, that I may see how the public receives the alterations.' But Charon would answer, 'When you have seen the effect of these, you will be for making other alterations.' There will be no end of such excuses; so, honest friend, please step into the boat. But I might still urge, 'Have a little patience, good Charon, I have been endeavouring to open the eyes of the public. If I live a few years longer, I may have the satisfaction of seeing the downfall of some of the prevailing systems of superstition.' But Charon would then lose all temper and decency. 'You loitering rogue, that will not happen these many hundred years. Do you fancy I will grant you a lease for so long a term? Get into the boat this instant, you lazy loitering rogue.'"

But, though Mr. Hume always talked of his approaching dissolution with great cheerfulness, he never affected to make any parade of his magnanimity. He never mentioned the subject but when the conversation naturally led to it, and never dwelt longer upon it than the course of the conversation happened to require: it was a subject, indeed, which occurred pretty frequently, in consequence of the inquiries which his friends, who came to see him, naturally made concerning the state of his health. The conversation which I mentioned above, and which passed on Thursday the 8th of August, was the last, except one, that I ever had with him. He had now become so very weak, that the company of his most intimate friends fatigued him; for his cheerfulness was still so great, his complaisance and social disposition were still so entire, that when any friend was with him, he could not help talking more, and with greater exertion, than suited the weakness of his body. At his own desire, therefore, I agreed to leave Edinburgh, where I was staying partly upon his account, and returned to my mother's house here, at Kirkaldy, upon condition that he would send for me whenever he wished to see me; the physician who saw him most frequently, Doctor Black, undertaking in the meantime to write me occasionally an account of the state of his health.

On the 22d of August, the Doctor wrote me the following letter:

"Since my last, Mr. Hume has passed his time pretty easily, but is much weaker. He sits up, goes down stairs once a day, and amuses himself with reading, but seldom sees any body. He finds, that the conversation of his most intimate friends fatigues and oppress him; and it is happy that he does not need it, for he is quite free from anxiety, impatience, or low spirits, and passes his time very well with the assistance of amusing books."

I received the day after a letter from Mr. Hume himself, of which the following is an extract:

"My dearest Friend,

Edinburgh, Aug. 23, 1776.

I am obliged to make use of my nephew's hand in writing to you, as I do not rise to-day.

I go very fast to decline, and last night had a small fever, which I hoped might put a quicker period to this tedious illness; but unluckily it has in a great measure gone off. I cannot submit to your coming over here on my account, as it is possible for me to see you so small a part of the day, but Dr. Black can better inform you concerning the degree of strength which may from time to time remain with me. Adieu, &c.

Three days after, I received the following letter from Doctor Black:

"Dear Sir,

Edinburgh, Monday, Aug. 26, 1776.

"Yesterday, about four o'clock afternoon, Mr. Hume expired. The near approach of his death became evident in the night between Thursday and Friday, when his disease became excessive, and soon weakened him so much, that he could no longer rise out of his bed. He continued to the last perfectly sensible, and free from much pain or feelings of distress. He never dropped the smallest expression of impatience; but when he had occasion to speak to the people about him, always did it with affection and tenderness. I thought it improper to write to bring you over, especially as I heard that he had dictated a letter to you, desiring you not to come. When he became very weak, it cost him an effort to speak, and he died in such a happy composure of mind that nothing could exceed it."

Thus died our most excellent and never to be forgotten friend; concerning whose philosophical opinions men will no doubt judge variously, every one approving or condemning them, according as they happen to coincide or disagree with his own? but concerning whose character and conduct there can scarce be a difference of opinion. His temper, indeed, seemed to be more happily balanced, if I may be allowed such an expression, than that perhaps of any other man I have ever known. Even in the lowest state of his fortune, his great and necessary frugality never hindered him from exercising, upon proper occasions, acts both of charity and generosity. It was a frugality founded not upon avarice, but upon the love of independency. The extreme gentleness of his nature never weakened either the firmness of his mind or the steadiness of his resolutions. His constant pleasantry was the genuine effusion of good nature and good humour, tempered with delicacy and modesty, and without even the slightest tincture of malignity, so frequently the disagreeable source of what is called wit in other men. It never was the meaning of his raillery to mortify; and therefore, far from offending, it seldom failed to please and delight, even those who were the objects of it. To his friends, who were frequently the objects of it, there was not perhaps one of all his great and amiable qualities which contributed more to endear his conversation. And that gaiety of temper, so agreeable in society, but which is so often accompanied with frivolous and superficial qualities, was in him certainly attended with the most severe application, the most extensive learning, the greatest depth of thought, and a capacity in every respect the most comprehensive. Upon the whole, I have always considered him, both in his life-time and since his death, as approaching as nearly to the idea of a perfectly wise and virtuous man as perhaps the nature of human frailty will permit.

I ever am, dear Sir,

Most affectionately yours,

ADAM SMITH.

CHAPTER I.

THE BRITONS.

The curiosity entertained by all civilized nations, of insinuating into the exploits and adventures of their ancestors, commonly excites a regret that the history of remote ages should always be so much involved in obscurity, uncertainty, and contradiction. Ingenious men, possessed of leisure, are apt to push their researches beyond the period in which literary monuments are framed or preserved; without reflecting, that the history of past events is immediately lost or disfigured when intrusted to memory and oral tradition, and that the adventures of barbarous nations, even if they were recorded, could afford little or no entertainment to men born in a more cultivated age. The convulsions of a civilized state usually compose the most instructive and most interesting part of its history; but the sudden, violent, and unprepared revolutions incident to barbarians, are so much guided by caprice and terminate so often in cruelty, that they disgust us by the uniformity of their appearance; and it is rather fortunate for letters that they are buried in silence and oblivion. The only certain means by which nations can indulge their curiosity in researches concerning their remote origin, is to consider the language, manners, and customs of their ancestors, and to compare them with those of the neighbouring nations. The fables which are commonly employed to supply the place of true history, ought entirely to be disregarded; or if any exception be admitted to this general rule, it can only be in favour of the ancient Grecian fictions, which are so celebrated and so agreeable, that they will ever be the objects of the attention of mankind. Neglecting, therefore, all traditions, or rather tales, concerning the more early history of Britain, we shall only consider the state of the inhabitants as it appeared to the Romans on their invasion of this country; we shall briefly run over the events which attended the conquest made by that empire, as belonging more to Roman than British story; we shall hasten through the obscure and uninteresting period of Saxon annals: and shall reserve a more full narration for those times when the truth is both so well ascertained and so complete as to promise entertainment and instruction to the reader.

All ancient writers agree in representing the first inhabitants of Britain as a tribe of the Gauls or Celts, who peopled that island from the neighbouring continent. Their language was the same; their manners, their government, their superstition, varied only by those small differences, which time or a communication with the bordering nations must necessarily introduce. The inhabitants of Gaul, especially in those parts which lie contiguous to Italy, had acquired, from a commerce with their southern neighbours, some refinement in the arts, which gradually diffused themselves northwards, and spread but a very faint light over this island. The Greek and Roman navigators or merchants (for there were scarcely any other travellers in those ages) brought back the most shocking accounts of the ferocity of the people, which they magnified, as usual, in order to excite the admiration of their countrymen. The south-east parts, however, of Britain, had already, before the age of Caesar, made the first and most requisite step towards a civil settlement; and the Britons, by tillage and agriculture, had these increased to a great multitude. The other inhabitants of the island still maintained themselves by pasture: they were clothed with skins of beasts. They dwelt in huts, which they reared in the forests and marshes, with which the country was covered: they shifted easily their habitation, when actuated either by the hopes of plunder, or the fear of an enemy: the convenience of feeding their cattle was even a sufficient motive for removing their seats: and as they were ignorant of all the refinements of life, their wants and their possessions were equally scanty and limited.

The Britons were divided into many small nations or tribes; and being a military people, whose sole property was their arms and their cattle, it was impossible, after they had acquired a relish for liberty, for their princes or chief men to establish any despotic authority over them. Their governments, though monarchical, were free, as well as those of all the Celtic nations; and the common people seem even to have enjoyed more liberty among them, than among the nations of Gaul, from whom they were descended. Each state was divided into factions within itself: it was agitated with jealousy or animosity against the neighbouring states: and while the arts of peace were yet unknown, wars were the chief occupation, and formed the chief object of ambition, among the people.

The religion of the Britons was one of the most considerate parts of their government; and the Druids, who were their priests, possessed great authority among them. Besides ministering at the altar, and directing all religious duties, they presided over the education of youth; they enjoyed an immunity from wars and taxes; they possessed both the civil and criminal jurisdiction; they decided all controversies among states as well as among private persons, and whoever refused to submit to their decree was exposed to the most severe penalties. The sentence of excommunication was pronounced against him: he was forbidden access to the sacrifices or public worship; he was debarred all intercourse with his fellow-citizens, even in the common affairs of life: his company was universally shunned, as profane and dangerous: he was refused the protection of law: and death itself became an inevitable issue from the misery and infamy to which he was exposed. Thus, the bands of government, which were naturally loose among that rude and turbulent people, were happily corbelled by the terrors of their superstition.

No species of superstition was ever more terrible than that of the Druids. Besides the severe penalties, which it was in the power of the ecclesiastics to inflict in this world, they insinuated the eternal transmigration of souls; and thereby extended their authority as far as the fears of their timorous vassals. They practised their rites in dark groves or other secret recesses; and in order to throw a greater mystery over their religion, they communicated their doctrines only to the initiated, and strictly forbade the committing of them to writing; lest they should at any time be exposed to the examination of the profane vulgar. Human sacrifices were practised among them: the spoils of war were often devoted to their divinities; and they punished with the severest tortures whoever dared to secrete any part of the consecrated offerings. These treasures they kept in woods and forests, secured by no other guard than that of their religion; but this steady guard over human art and may be regarded as more signal than their prompting men to the most extraordinary and most violent effects. No idolatrous worship ever attained such an ascendant over mankind as that of the ancient Gauls and Britons; and the Romans, after their conquest, finding it impossible to reconcile those nations to the laws and institutions of their masters, while it maintained its authority, were at last obliged to abolish it by penal statutes; a violence which, in any other instance, has been practised by those tolerating conquerors

The ROMANS.

The Britons had long remained in this rude but independent state, when Cæsar, having overrun all Gaul by his victories, first cast his eye on their island. He was not allure either by its riches or its renown, but being ambitious of carrying the Roman arms into a new world, then mostly unknown, he took advantage of a short interval in his Gaulic wars, and made an invasion on Britain. He appointed certain vessels, informed of the excellence of the unequal contest, and endeavoured to appease him by submissions, which, however, retarded not the execution of his design. After some receipts of some sacrifices, which the Britons decreed to their gods, and having obtained several advantages over the Britons, and obliged them to promise hostages for their future obedience, he was constrained, by the necessity of his affairs, and the approach of winter, to withdraw his forces into Gaul. The Britons, relieved from the terror of his arms, neglected the performance of their stipulations; and that haughty conqueror resolved next summer to chastise them for this breach of treaty. He landed with a greater force; and though he found a more regular resistance from the Britons, who had united under Cassivelaunus, one of their petty princes, he demolished them in every action. He advanced into the country, passed the Thames, and having obviated the means of the enemy, as who had been the capital of Cassivelaunus; established his ally, Mandubrius, in the sovereignty of the Trinobantes; and having obliged the inhabitants to make new submissions, he again retired with the mastery and infamy in all his army, and left the authority of the Romans more nominal than real in this island.

The civil wars which ensued, and which prepared the way for the triumph of monarchy in Rome, swept away the Britons from that yoke which was ready to be imposed upon them. Augustus, the successor of Cæsar, content with the victory obtained over the liberties of his own country, was little ambitious of acquiring fame by foreign wars; and being apprehensive lest the same unlimited extent of dominion, which had subverted the republic, might also overwhelm the empire, he recommended it to his successors never to enlarge the territories of the Romans. Tiberius, jealous of the fame which might be acquired by his generals, made this advice of Augustus a pretext for such modern wars as that of Calgula, in which he menaced Britain with an invasion, served only to expose himself and the empire to ridicule: and the Britons had now, during almost a century, enjoyed their liberty. But when the Romans, after the reign of Claudius, began to think seriously of reducing them under their dominion. Without seeking any more justifiable reasons of hostility than were employed by the late Europeans in subjecting the Africans and Americans, they sent over an army under the command of Plautius, an able general, who punished some victories, and made a considerable progress in subduing the inhabitants. Claudius himself, finding matters sufficiently prepared for his reception, made a journey into Britain, and received the submission of several British states, the Cantii, Atrebates, Regni, and Trinobantes, who inhabited the south-east parts of the island, and whom their powerful neighbour easily subverted. Notwithstanding these misfortunes, the Britons were not subdued; and this island was regarded by the ambitious Romans as a field in which military honour might still be acquired. Under the reign of Nero, Suetonius Paulinus was invested with the command, and prepared to signalize his name by victories over those barbarians. Finding that the island of Mona, now Anglesey, was the chief seat of the Druids, he resolved to attack it, and to subject a place which was the centre of their superstition, and which afforded protection to all their rebellious forces. The Britons endeavoured to obstruct his landing on this sacred island, both by the force of numbers and by personal resistance; and women and priests were intermingled with the soldiers upon the shore; and running about with flaming torches in their hands, and tossing their dishevelled hair, they struck ghastly scenes, composed, at once, of mourning, execration, and the real danger from the armed forces was able to inspire. But Suetonius, exhorting his troops to despise the monaces of a superstition which they despised, impelled them to the attack, drove the Britons off the field, burned the Druids in the same fires which those priests had prepared for their captive enemies, destroyed all the consecrated groves and altars; and, having thus triumphed over the religion of the Britons, as well as over his Roman soldiery, but in reducing the people to submission. But he was disappointed in his expectations. The Britons, taking advantage of his absence, were all in arms; and headed by Boadicea, queen of the Iceni, arrested the march of the Romans and all strangers, to the number of 70,000, were every where put to the sword without distinction; and the Britons, by rendering the war thus bloody, seemed determined to cut off all hopes of peace or composition with the enemy. But this cruelty was revenged by Sestos n in a great and decisive battle, where 80,000 of the Britons are said to have perished; and Beadoea herself, rather than fall into the hands of the enraged victors, put an end to her own life by poison.3

Nero soon after recalled Sestonius from a government, where, by suffering and inflicting so many severities, he was judged improper for conducting so important a war. The same year he established the dominion of the Romans in this island, was Julius Agricola, who governed it in the reigns of Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian, and distinguished himself in that scene of action.

This great commander formed a regular plan for subduing Britain, and rendering the acquisition useful to the conquerors. He carried his victorious arms northwards, defeated the Britons in every encounter, pierced into the northern forests and mountains of Caledonia, reduced

ev every state to subjection in the southern part of the island, and chased before him all the men of fiercer and more intractable spirits, who deemed war and death itself insufficient to terrify them; and, having at last defeated them in a decisive action, which they fought under Galgacus, their leader; and having fixed a chain of garrisons between the frifs of Clyde and Forth, thereby cut off communication with their incursions, and driven the Romano-Celtic into the more remote districts, he secured the Roman province from the incursions of the barbarous inhabitants.4

During these military enterprises, he neglected not the arts of peace. He improved laws and civility among the Britons; he sought to desire and raise all the consequences of life, reconciled them to the Roman language and manners, instructed them in letters and science, and employed every expedient to render those laws which he had made more easy and desirable to them. The inhabitants, having experienced how unequal their own force was to resist that of the Romans, acquiesced in the dominion of their masters, and were gradually incorporated as a part of that mighty empire.

This was the last durable conquest made by the Romans; and Britain, once subdued, gave no further inquietude to the victor. Caledonia alone, defended by its ice-bound forests and mountains, and the Romans, tired of it, sometimes infested the more cultivated parts of the island by the incursions of its inhabitants. The better to secure the frontiers of the empire, Adrian, who visited this island in a autumn, built the river Tyne to the sea, opposite to the mouth of Solway, Lollis Urbicet, and Antoninus Pius, erected one in the place where Agricola had formerly established his garrisons: Severus, who made an expedition into Britain, and carried his arms to the most northern extremity of it, added new fortifications to the wall of Adrian: and, during the reigns of all the Roman emperors, such a profound tranquility prevailed in Britain, that little mention is made of the affairs of that island by any historian. The only incidents which occur, are some seditions or rebellions of the Roman legions quartered there, and some usurpations of the imperial dignity by the governors. The natives, dispirited, and submissive, had lost all desire, and even ideas, of their former liberty and independence.5

But the period was now come when that enormous fabric of the Roman empire, which had diffused slavery and oppression, together with peace and civility, over so considerable a part of the globe, was approaching towards its final dissolution. Italy and the centre of the empire, removed, during so many ages, from all concern in the wars, had entirely lost the military spirit, and were peopled by an enervated and alarmed body of inhabitants. At last, the emperor Figet had, by the division into provinces, and the appointment of vicars and praetors, more or less, to the provinces, them with the Roman province, where dwelling freely, and theoretically submersed and new seats, to infest the Roman province by piracy and rapine.6 These tribes, finding their more populous neighbours exposed to invasion, soon broke over the Roman borders or places, where the provincial Britons called Scots or Scotla; a name which was probably used as a form of reproach, and which their conquerors bestowed themselves as they acknowledged no other. We may infer from the history of the Roman province in Caledonia, and another in his history, had the chief seat of the Scots in Ireland. That same part of the island, the island of Ireland, of the Irish freemen, and the reference of the English to the name of Scots, as seems to have been the case with the Britons also, in the name of Scota, and isolated, with so many names of other Britons and Roman legions quartered there, and some usurpations of the imperial dignity by the governors. The natives, dispirited, and submissive, had lost all desire, and even ideas, of their former liberty and independence.5

But the period was now come when that enormous fabric of the Roman empire, which had diffused slavery and oppression, together with peace and civility, over so considerable a part of the globe, was approaching towards its final dissolution. Italy and the centre of the empire, removed, during so many ages, from all concern in the wars, had entirely lost the military spirit, and were peopled by an enervated and alarmed body of inhabitants. At last, the emperor Figet had, by the division into provinces, and the appointment of vicars and praetors, more or less, to the provinces, them with the Roman province, where dwelling freely, and theoretically submersed and new seats, to infest the Roman province by piracy and rapine.6 These tribes, finding their more populous neighbours exposed to invasion, soon broke over the Roman wall, no longer defended by the Roman arms; and, though a contumible enemy in themselves, met with no resistance from the unwarlike inhabitants. The Britons, accustomed to have recourse to the emperors for defence as well as government, made supplications to Rome; and one legion was sent over for their protection. This force was an overmatch for the barbarians, repelled their invasion, routed them in every engagement, and having chased them into their ancient limits, returned in triumph to the defence of the southern provinces of the empire. Their retreat brought on a new invasion of the enemy. The Britons made again an application to Rome, and again obtained the assistance of a legion, which proved effectual for their relief; but the Romans, reduced to extremities at home, and fatigued with those distant expeditions, informed the Britons that they must no longer look to them for succour, exhorted them to arm in their own defence, and urged as they were now their own masters, it became them to protect by their valour that independence which their ancient forefathers had conferred upon them. That they might leave the island with the better grace, the Romans assisted them in erecting new the wall of Severus, which was built entirely of stone, and which the Britons had not at that time artificers skilful enough to repair. And having done this last good office to them, they left a small number of their soldiers, about the year 448; after being masters of the more considerable part of it during the course of near four centuries.

THE BRITONS.

The chief Britons regarded this present of liberty as fatal to them; and were in no condition to put in practice the protection given them by the Romans, to arm in their own defence. Unacquainted both to the perils of war and to the cares of civil government, they found themselves incapable of forming or executing any measures for resisting the incursions of the barbarians. Gratian also did not consider the Britons, who, a little before, had assumed the purple in Britain, had carried over to the continent the flower of the British youth; and having perished in their unsuccessful attempts on the imperial throne, they deserted the idea. The Britons who, in their desperate extremity, were best able to defend it. The Piets and Scots, finding that the Romans had finally relinquished Britain, now regarded the whole as their prey, and attacked the northern wall with redoubled forces. The Britons, already subdued by their own fears, found the ramparts but a weak defence for them; and deserting their station, left the country entirely open to the incursions of the Saxons. The invasion proved devastating and ruin along with them; and exerted to the utmost their native ferocity, which was not mitigated by the helpless condition and submissive behaviour of the inhabitants. The unhappy Britons had a third time recourse to Rome, which had declared its resolution for ever to abandon them. But, with the patience, which was as well, the discipline, of their ancestors. The British ambassadors carried to him the letter of their courtiers, which was inscribed, the Grown of the Britons. The tenor of the epistle was suitable to its superscription. The barbarian, say they, on the one hand, drive us into the sea; the sea, on the other, throw us back upon the barbarians; and we have only the hard choice left us, of perishing by the sword or by the waves. But, with the assurance of the British ambassadors, that the greatest and most terrible energy of the British empire, had no leisure to attend to the complaints of allies, whom generosity alone could induce him to assist. The Britons, thus rejected, were reduced to despair, independent of their country: yet, in no more distant period than ten years after the departure of the Roman legions, a small body of English, led by a few private noblemen. All history is full of such events. The Irish revolt, as an example of two nations, was the subject of a small force, which disregarded the greater part of the northern and eastern provinces of England, led by a few noble inhabitants, too late and too small to settle on North Britain, though we can neither among the Britons. The battles that have taken place between great nations and races of men, have often occasioned the overthrow of those mighty powers, which, a little before, have flourished in the world. The assemblies of a few people, who have been the only instruments of the most magnificent triumphs.
THE SAXONS.

of or overrun by other German tribes, found it easy to persuade their countrymen to embrace the sole enterprise which promised a favourable opportunity of displaying their valour and gratifying their avarice. They embarked their troops in three vessels, and about the year 449 or 450, carried over 1600 men, who landed in the isle of Thanet, and immediately marched to the defence of the Britons against the northern invaders. The Scots and Picts were unable to resist the valour of these auxiliaries; and finding that 3000 men of their race, who had the Saxons, hoped thenceforth to enjoy peace and security under the powerful protection of that warlike people.

But Hengist and Horsa, perceiving, from their easy victory over the Scots and Picts, with what facility they might subdue the Britons themselves, who had not been able to resist those feeble invaders, were determined to conquer and fight for their own ground, not for the defence of their degenerate allies. They sent intelligence to Saxony of the fertility and riches of Britain; and represented as certain the subjection of a people so long disused to arms, who, being now cut off from the Roman empire, of which they had been a province during so many ages, had not yet acquired any union among themselves, and were destitute of all affection to their new liberties, and of all national attachments and regards. The vices and misfortunes of their race were so dear to them, and the ground of hope; and the Saxons in Germany, following such agreeable prospects, soon reinforced Hengist and Horsa with 5000 men, who came over in seventeen vessels. The Britons now endeavoured to extricate themselves, whose numbers they found continually augmenting; but thought of no remedy, except a passive submission and compliance. This weak expedition soon failed them. The Saxons were next quoted, by complaining that their subsidies were ill paid, and their demands drawn; and immediately taking off the mask, they formed an alliance with the Picts and Scots, and proceeded to open hostility against the Britons.

The Britons, impelled by these violent extremities, and roused to indignation against their treacherous auxiliaries, were necessitated to take arms; and having deposed Vortigern, who had become odious from his vices, and from the bad event of his rash expeditions, they put themselves under the command of his son, Vortimer. They fought many battles with their enemies; and though the victories in these actions were disputed between the British and Saxon annalists, it appears certain that the latter prove that the advantage was commonly on their side. In one battle, however, fought at Eaglesford, now Alsford, Horsa, the Saxon general, was slain, and left the sole command over his countrymen in the hands of Hengist. This active general was visibly marked by fresh numbers from Germany, carried devastation into the most remote corners of Britain; and being chiefly anxious to spread the terror of his arms, he spared neither age, nor sex, nor condition, wherever he marched with his victorious forces. The private and public edifices of the Britons were reduced to ashes: the priests were slaughtered on the altars by those inhuman ravagers: the bishops and nobility shared the fate of the vulgar: the people, flying to the mountains and deserts, were intercepted and butchered in heaps; some were glad to accept of life and servitude under their victors: others, despairing of their native country, took shelter among the Gallic, or even the German people; when their first leaders, Known in any true history, were believed by them to be the fourth in descent from a fabulous deity, or from a man exalted by ignorance into that character. The English, however, by a sort of antiquities, led by imaginary analogies of names, or by uncertain traditions, would in vain attempt to pierce into that deep obscurity which covers the remote history of those nations.

These two brothers, observing the other provinces of Britain, and being occupied by a warlike and neglectful people, and the rich provinces of Gaul already conquered the people in their great councils; and though regard was paid to nobility in the choice, their personal qualities, chiefly their valour, procured them from the suffrages of their fellow-citizens that honourable but dangerous distinction. The warriors of each tribe attached themselves to their leader with the most devoted affection and most unshaken constancy. They attended him as his ornament in peace, as his defence in war, as his council in the administration of justice. Their constant emulation in military expeditions, and their readiness to receive that inviolable friendship which they professed to their chief, and to each other:

to die for the honour of their band was their chief ambition: to survive its disgrace, or the death of their leader, was an irremediable misfortune. They gloried in the field of their women and children, who adopted all the martial sentiments of the men: and being thus impelled by every human motive, they were inviolable; where they were not opposed either by the similar manners and institutions of the neighbouring Germans, or by the superior discipline, arms, and numbers of the Romans. The leaders and their military companions were maintained by the labour of their slaves, or by that of the warlike less wealthy part of the community, whom they defended. The contributions which they levied went not beyond a bare subsistence; and the honours, acquired by a superior rank, were the only reward of their superior danger. The famous arts of life were unknown among the Germans; tillage itself was almost wholly neglected: they seem to have been anxious to prevent any improvements of that nature; and the leaders seem to have encouraged the inhabitants of each village, kept them from attaching themselves to particular possessions, or making such prosp- in agriculture as might divert their attention from military expeditions, the chief occupation of the community.

The Saxons had been for some time regarded as one of the warlike tribes of this fierce people, and had become the terror of the neighbouring nations. They had diffused themselves from the northern parts of Germany and the Cimbrian Chersonesus, and had taken possession of all the sea-coast from the mouth of the Rhine to Jutland; whence they had long infested by their piracies all the eastern and southern parts of Britain, and the northern part of Gaul. In order to oppose their inroads, the Romans had established an officer, whom they called Count of the Saxons above, and as the naval arts could flourish among a civilized people, the Romans regarded the Saxons as a useful auxiliary in repelling the Saxons, than any of the other barbarians by whom they were invaded. The dissolution of the Roman power invited them to renew their inroads; and, it was an habitual circumstance, that the deputies of the Britons appeared much more anxious than prompt to send them to undertake an enterprise, to which they were of themselves sufficiently inclined.

Hengist and Horsa, two brothers, possessed great credit among the Saxons, and were much celebrated both for their valour and nobility. They were reputed, as most of the Saxon princes, to be sprung from Woden, who was worshipped as a god among those nations, and they are said to be his great grandsons; a circumstance which added much to their authority. We shall not attempt to trace any higher the origin of those princes and nations. It is evident what fruitless labour it must be to search, in their barbarous annals, for the history of a people, when their first leaders, Known in any true history, were believed by them to be the fourth in descent from a fabulous deity, or from a man exalted by ignorance into that character. The dark indistinct outline of antiquities, led by imaginary analogies of names, or by uncertain traditions, would in vain attempt to pierce into that deep obscurity which covers the remote history of those nations.

or exerted such valour and perseverance in pushing their conquests. Cerdic was even obliged to call for the assistance of his countrymen from the kingdoms of Kent and Sussex, as well as from Germany, and he was therefore joined by a fresh army under the command of Porte, and of his sons Bleda and Megla. Strengthened by these succours, he fought, in the year 508, a desperate battle with the Britons, commanded by Nana-Leod, who was victorious, and not without much success, to unite them in their resistance against the Saxons. These contests increased the animosity between the two nations, and roused the military spirit of the ancient inhabitants, who rose up before their last battle of lethargy. Hengist, however, notwithstanding their opposition, still maintained his ground in Britain; and in order to divide the forces and attention of the natives, he called over a new tribe of Saxons, under the command of his brother Octa, and of Elissa, the son of Octa; and he settled them in Northumberland. He himself remained in the southern parts of the island, and laid the foundation of the kingdom of Kent, comprehending the county of that name, Middlesex, Essex, and part of Surrey. He fixed his royal seat at Canterbury; where he governed about forty years, and he died in or near the year 488; leaving his new-acquired dominions to his posterity.

The success of Hengist excited the avidity of the other northern Germans; and at different times, and under different leaders, they flokked over in multitudes to the invasion of this island. These conquerors were chiefly composed of the Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, who all passed under the common appellation, sometimes of Saxons, sometimes of Angles; and speaking the same language, and being governed by the same institutions, they were therefore united, and from these enemies, on their common interest, unite themselves against the ascendant inhabitants. The resistance, however, though unequal, was still maintained by the Britons; but became ever more desperate; and their countrymen admitted them for a few intervals, till they were driven into Cornwall and Wales, and received protection from the remote situation or inaccessible mountains of those countries.

The Britons, after that of Kent, which was established in Britain, was the kingdom of South Saxony. In the year 477, Ella, a Saxon chief, brought over an army from Germany; and landing on the southern coast, proceeded to take possession of the neighbouring territory. The Britons, now armed, did not tuneily abandon their pos sessions; nor were they expelled, till defeated in many battles by their warlike invaders. The most memorable action, mentioned by historians, is that of Verulam in which the Saxons won the victory, they suffered so considerable a loss, as somewhat retarded the progress of their conquests. But Ella, reinforced by fresh numbers of his countrymen, again took the field against the Britons, and laid siege to Andred easter, which was defended by the garrison and inhabitants with desperate valor. The Saxons, enraged by this resistance, and by the fatigue and dangers which they had sustained, redoubled their efforts against the place, and when masters of it, put all their enemies to the sword without distinction. This decisive advantage secured the conquests of Ella, who assumed the name of king, and extended his dominion over Sussex and a great part of Surrey. He was stopped in his progress to the east by the kingdom of Kent: in that to the west by another tribe of Saxons, who had taken possession of that territory. The Britons, in the meantime, retired to the northern country in which they settled, were called the West Saxons, and landed in the year 493, under the command of Cerdic, and of his son Kenna. The Britons were, by past experience, so much on their guard, and so well prepared to receive the enemy, that they gave battle, and the very day of their landing; and though vanquished, still defended, for some time, their liberties against the invaders. None of the other tribes of Saxons met with such vigorous resistance, having conquered Lancashire, and the greater part of Yorkshirc, received the appellation of king of Deiri. These two kingdoms were united in the person of Edwin, grandson of Illa, who married Aethelflaed, and expelling her brother Edwin, established one of the most powerful of the Saxon kingdoms, by the title of Northumberland. How far his dominions extended into the country now called Scotland, is uncertain; but it cannot be doubted, that all the kingdoms, especially the eastern coast of that country, were peopled in a great measure from Germany; though the expeditions made by the several Saxon adventurers have escaped the records of history. The language spoken in those countries, which is purely Saxon, is a stronger proof of this event than can be opposed by the imperfect, or rather fabulous, annals, which are obviated on us by the Scottish historians.

THE HEPTARCHY.

This was established, after a violent contest of near a hundred and fifty years, the Heptarchy, or seven Saxon kingdoms in Britain; and the whole southern part of the island, except Wales and Cornwall, had totally changed its inhabitants, language, customs, and political institutions. The Britons, under the Roman dominion, had made such suitable improvements, that the ancient inhabitants, who had twenty-eight considerable cities within their province, besides a great number of villages and country seats. But the fierce conquerors, by whom they were overthrown, were not content with the theory of bar- barity; and those few natives who were not either massacred or expelled their habitations, were reduced to the most abject slavery. None of the other northern conquerors, the Franks, Goths, Vandals, or Burgundians, though they overran the southern provinces of the empire like a mighty torrent, made such devastations as the conquered territories, or were inflamed into so violent an animosity against the ancient inhabitants. The Saxons, who came over at intervals in separate bodies, the Britons, however at first unwilling, were tempted to make resistance; and hostilities being thereby prolonged, proved more destructive to both parties, especially to the vanquished. The first invader from Germany, instead of excluding other adventurers, who must share with them the spoils of ancient inhabitants, were obliged to solicit fresh supplies from their own country; and a total extermination of the Britons became the sole expedient for providing a settlement and subsistence to the new planters. Hence there have been found in history few conquests more ruinous than that of the Saxons; and few revolutions in the course of human affairs more desolating.

So long as the contest was maintained with the natives, the several Saxon princes preserved a union of counsels and interests; but after the Britons were shut up in the barren counties of Cornwall and Wales, and gave no further disturbance to the conquerors, the band of alliances was in a great measure dissolved among the princes of the Heptarchy. Though one prince seems still to have been allowed, or to have assumed, an ascendant over the whole, his authority, if it ought ever to be deemed regular or legal, was extremely limited; and each state acted as if it had been independent, and wholly separate from the rest. Wars, therefore, and revolutions and dissensions, were unavoidable among a turbulent and military population; and these events, however intricate or confused, ought now to become the objects of our attention. But, added to the difficulty of carrying on at once the history of seven independent kingdoms, there is a discouragement to the writer, arising from the uncertainty, at least bareness, of the accounts transmitted to us. The monks, who were the only annalists during those ages, lived remote from public affairs, considered the civil transactions as entirely subordinate to ecclesiastical, and therefore discoursed of their ignorance and barbarity which were then universal, were strongly infected with credulity, with the love of wonder, and with a propensity to imposture; races almost insensible to the claims of an ancient family, and which have in the...

consequence, became their supreme deity, and the chief object of their religious worship. They believed, that, if they obtained the favor of this divinity by their valor, (for they made less account of the other virtues,) they should be admitted after their death into his hall; and, reposing on couches, should squatiate themselves with ale from the skulls of their enemies whom they had slain in battle. For this idea of paradise, which grounded at once the passion of revenge and that of intermixture, the ruling inclinations of barbarians, they despised the dangers of war, and increased their nature ferocity against the vanquished by their religious prejudices. We know little of the religious tenets of the Saxons; we only learn that they were polytheists; that they worshipped the sun and moon; that they adored the god thunder under the name of Thor; that they had images in their temples; that they practiced sacrifices; believed firmly in spells and enchantments; and admitted in general a system of doctrines which they held as sacred, but which, like all other superstitions, must carry the air of the wildest extravagance, if propounded to those who are not familiarized to it from their earliest infancy.

The constant hostilities which the Saxons maintained against the Britons, would naturally indispose them for receiving the Christian faith, when proposed to them by such invertebrate enemies; and perhaps the Britons, as is objected to them by Gildas and Hede, were not over fond of communicating to their cruel invaders the doctrine of eternal life and salvation. But as a civilized people, however, the Saxons were superior to the barbarous and ignorant nations, all the other northern conquerors of Europe had been already induced to embrace the Christian faith, which they found established in the empire; and it was impossible but the Saxons, informed of this event, must have regarded with some degree of veneration a doctrine which had acquired the ascendant over all their brethren. However limited to the Britons, in the beginning of the 3rd century, the cultivation of the southern countries beyond what they themselves possessed; and it was natural for in to yield to that superior knowledge, as well as zeal, by which the innumerable host of the Christian kingdoms were even at that time distinguished.

But these causes might long have failed of producing any considerable effect, had not a favourable incident precipitated the means of introducing Christianity into Kent. Ethelbert, in his father's lifetime, had married Bertha, the only daughter of Carlit, king of Paris, one of the descendants of Clovis, the conqueror of Gaul; but before he was admitted to this alliance, he was obliged to stipulate an article, that he should enjoy his own religion; a concession not difficult to be obtained from the idolatrous Saxons. Bertha brought over a French bishop to the court of Canterbury; and being abroad the propagator of the gospel in that region, she had been very assiduous in her devotional exercises, and supported the credit of her faith by an unapproachable conduct, and had employed every art of persuasion and address to reconcile her husband to her religious principles. Her popularity in the court, and her influence over Ethelbert, had so well paved the way for the reception of the Christian doctrine, that Gregory, summoned the Great, then Heman pontiff, began to entertain hopes of effecting a project, which he himself, before he mounted the imperial throne, had once embraced, of converting the British Saxons.

It happened, that this prelate, at that time in a private situation, had observed in the market-place of Home some Saxon youth exposed to sale, whom the Roman merchants, in their trading voyages to Britain, had bought of their mercenary parents. Strengthened with the beauty of their fair complexions and blooming countenances, Gregory assiduously approached them, and, Without their being Angels, he replied, that they ought more properly to be denominated angels: it were a pity that the Prince of Darkness should enjoy so fair a prey, and that so beauti-ful a frontispiece should ever a mind destitute of internal grace and righteousness. Inquiring further concerning the name of their province, he was informed that it was Deira, a district of Northumberland: Dei(r) replied he, that is a good! They are called to the mercy of God from his anger, De in. But what is the name of the king of that province? He was told it was £alla or Alia: Alleluia, cried he: we are now arrived at the province and of the Saxon nation in their country. Moved by these allusions, which appeared to him so happy, he determined to undertake himself a mission into Britain; and having obtained the pope's approbation, he prepared for that perilous journey; but his journey in the home was still attended with the same misfortunes. By the violence of these peoples, he was exposed to dangers, his design being of such a nature that the Christians, unwilling to expose him to such dangers, opposed his design; and he was obliged, for the present, to lay aside all further thoughts of executing that pious purpose.

The controversy between the pagans and the Christians was not entirely cooled in that age; and no point, before Gregory, had ever carried to greater excess an intemperate zeal against the former religion. He had waged war with all the precious monuments of the ancients, and even with their writings, which, as appears from the strain of his own wit, as well as from the style of his compositions, he had not taste or genius sufficient to comprehend.

Amidst the fury with which the adherents of the British Saxons, he pitched on Augustine, a Roman monk, and sent him with forty associates to preach the gospel in this island. These missionaries, termed with the dangers which might attend their proposing a new doctrine to the Britons, if not to the Saxons, they were ignorant, stopped some time in France, and sent back Augustine to lay the hazards and difficulties before the pope, and crave his permission to desist from the undertaking. But Gregory exhorted them to persevere in their design, advised them to choose some interpreters from among the Franks, who still spoke the same language with the Saxons; and recommended them to the good offices of Hild, who, as a powerful monarch, possessed the sovereign power in France. This process, though stained with every vice of treachery and cruelty, either possessed or pretended great zeal for the cause; and Gregory acknowledged that to her friendly assistance was, in a great measure, owing the success of that undertaking.

Augustine, on his arrival in Kent in the year 597, found the danger much less than he had apprehended. Ethelbert, already well disposed towards the Christian faith, assigned him a habitation in the isle of Thanet; and soon after admitted him to a conference. Apprehensive, however, lest spells or enchantments might be employed against him, or his exercise of the sacred worship from a distant country, he had the precaution to receive them in the open air, where he believed the force of their magic would be more easily dissipated. Here Augustine, who found in his intercourse with him, the tenets of the Christian faith, and promised him eternal joys above, and a kingdom in heaven without end, if he would be persuaded to receive that salutary doctrine. Your words and promises, replied Ethelbert, are fair; but because they are new and uncertain, I cannot entirely yield to them, and relinquish the principles which I and my ancestors have so long maintained. You are welcome, however, to remain here in peace; and as you have undertaken so long a journey, safely, as you have desired for what you believe to be for our advantage, I will supply you with all necessary, and permit you to deliver your doctrine to my subjects.

Augustine, encouraged by this favourable reception, and seeing now a prospect of success, proceeded with doubled zeal to preach the gospel to the Kentish Saxons. He attracted their attention by the austerity of his manners, by the exercise of his gifts, by the adoration he paid himself, by the abstinence and self-denial which he practised; and having excited their wonder by a course of life which appeared so contrary to nature, he procured more easily their belief of miracles, which, it was pretended, he wrought for their conversion. Influenced by these motives, and by the declared favour of the court, numbers of the Kentish men were baptized; and the king himself was persuaded to submit to that rite of Christianity. His example had great influence with his subjects; but he employed no force to bring them over to the new doctrine. Augustine thought proper, in the commencement of his mission, to assume the appearance of the greatest lenity; he told Ethelbert, that the service of Christ must be entirely voluntary, and that no one was bound to conform to it against their will. The king, in consequence, employed no force to bring his subjects over to the new doctrine.

Augustine thought proper, in the commencement of his mission, to assume the appearance of the greatest lenity; he told Ethelbert, that the service of Christ must be entirely voluntary, and that no one was bound to conform to it against their will. The king, in consequence, employed no force to bring his subjects over to the new doctrine.

Augustine wrote a letter to Ethelbert, in which, after informing him that the end of the world was approaching, he exhorted him to display his zeal in the conversion of his subjects, to extirpate against the worship of idols, and to build up the good work of holiness by every expedient of exhortation, terror, blasphe- mation, or correction; a doctrine more suitable to that age, and to the usual maxims, than the tolerating principles which Augustine had thought it prudent to inculcate. The pontiff also answered some questions which the missionary had put concerning the government of the new church of Kent. Peremptorily, and at length, Augustine asked, Whether cousin-german might be allowed to marry? Gregory answered, that that liberty had indeed been formerly granted by the Roman law; but that the laws of the Church had not retained it, though it was derived from such marriages; and he therefore prohibited them. Augustine asked, Whether a woman pregnant might be baptized? Gregory answered that he saw no objection. How soon after the birth the child might receive baptism? It was answered, Immediately, if necessary. How soon after the birth the child might receive baptism? It was answered, Immediately, if necessary. How soon after the birth the child might receive baptism? It was answered, Immediately, if necessary. How soon after the birth the child might receive baptism? It was answered, Immediately, if necessary. Whether a man might have commerce with his wife after her delivery? Not till she had given suck to her child: a practice to which the proceeds of some poor man might enter the church, or receive the sacrament, after having had commerce with his wife? It was replied, that unless he had approached her without desire, merely for the sake of propagating his species, he was not without sin; but in all cases it was requisite for him, before he entered the church, or communicated, to purge himself by prayer and abstinence; and he ought not, even after using these precautions, to participate immediately of the sacred mystery. There are many other questions which Augustine raised, and which Gregory answered; and making a progress with the ignorant and barbarous Saxons.

The more to facilitate the reception of Christianity, Gregory enjoined Augustine to remove the idols from the heathen altars, but not to destroy the images themselves; because the people, he said, would be allured to frequent the Christian worship, when they found it placed in a place which they were accustomed to reverre. And as the pagans practised sacrifices, and feasted with the priests on their offerings, he also exhorted the missionary to persuade them, on Christian festivals, to kill their cattle in the neighbourhood of the church, and to indulge themselves in those cheerful entertainments, to which they had been habituated; and in some other religious and civil ceremonies, showing that notwithstanding his ignorance and prejudices, he was not unacquainted with the arts of governing mankind. Augustine was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury, and was endowed with all the temporal and spiritual rights of the old church of Rome. He received the pall, a badge of ecclesiastical honour, from Rome. Gregory also advised him not to be too much elated with his gift of working miracles; and as Augustine, proud of the success of his mission, seemed to think himself entitled to extend his authority over the bishops of Gaul, the pope informed him, that they lay entirely without the bounds of his jurisdiction.

The marriage of Ethelbert with Bertha, and much more his embraces of Christianity, opened a subject to the King of France, in order to escape the mortification of preaching the gospel without fruit to the infidels. M Eliud and Justus, who had been consecrated bishops of London and Rochester, had already departed the kingdom; when Laurentius, before he should entirely abandon his dignity, made one effort to reclaim the king. He appeared before one of the councils, and, melting into his eyes, showed his body all torn with bruises and stripes, which he had received. He advised, hoping that any man should have dared to treat in that manner a person of his rank, to be on him; and that his conduct was a sufficient reproof for the chastisement from St. Peter, the prince of the apostles, who had appeared to him in a vision, and, severely reproving him for his intention to desert his charge, had inflicted on him these visible marks of his displeasure; Whether Eadbald was struck with the miracle, or inflamed by some other motive, he divorced himself from his mother-in-law, and returned to the profession of Christianity; his wife being allowed to keep her faith. He afterwards reached not the fame or authority of his father, and died in 640, after a reign of twenty-five years; leaving two sons, Erminfrid and Eocombert.

Eocombert, though the younger son, by Emma, a French princess, found means to mount the throne. He was consecrated by Bede for two exploits, for establishing the fast of Lent in his kingdom, and for utterly extirpating idolatry; which, notwithstanding the prevalence of Christianity, had hitherto been tolerated by the two preceding monarchs. He ruled twenty-four years; and left the crown to Ecgbert, his son, who reigned nine years. This prince is renowned for his encouragement of learning; but infamous for his great thirst of riches, and for the innovations of Erminfrid, his uncle. The ecclesiastical writers praise him for bestowing on his sister, Domnuna, some lands in the isle of Thanet, where she founded a monastery. The bloody precipitation of Ecgbert could not fix the crown on the head of his son, Edric. L with the deceased prince, took possession of the kingdom; and, in order to secure the power in his family, he associated with him Richard, his son, in the administration of the government. Edric, the possessed princes, had recourse to Edwulf, king of Sussex, for assistance; and being supported by that prince, fought a battle with his uncle, who was defeated and slain. Richard fled into Germany, and afterwards died of fever, in the city of Paris. The prelates of Malmesbury ascribes Lothair's hate to two crimes, his concurrence in the murder of his cousins, and his contempt for relics.

Lothair reigned three years; Edric, his successor, only two. Upon the death of the latter, which happened in 686, Widred, the brother, obtained possession of the crown. But as the succession had been of late so much disputed by revolutions and usurpations, faction began... to prevail among the nobility; which invited Ceddwalla, king of Wessex, with his brother Mollo, to attack the kingdom. These invaders committed great devastations in Kent; but the death of Mollo, who was slain in a skirmish, gave a short breathing time to that kingdom. Widred restored the affairs of Kent; and, after a reign of thirty-two years, left the crown to his postercy. Eadbért, Ethelbert, and Alne, his successors, succcssively mounted the throne of Kent. A bloody war, which happened between them, in the year 794, the royal family of Kent was extinguished; and every fanatical leader who could entertain hopes of ascending the throne, threw the state into confusion. ¹ Egbert, who had been rejected by the crown, took the hand of the king, who, after a troublesome and precarious reign, he was, in the year 827, expelled by Egbert, king of Wessex, who dissolved the Saxon Heptarchy, and united the several kingdoms under his dominion.

THE KINGDOM OF NORTHBURGIA.

Adelfrid, king of Bernicia, having married Aecus, the daughter of Ælla, king of Deirii, and expelled her infant brother, Edwin, had united all the counties north of Heavenly's dominions, and acquired a great ascendency in the Heptarchy. He also spread the terror of the Saxon arms to the neighbouring people, and by his victories over the Scotts and Picts, as well as Welsh, extended on all sides of his dominions. Having learned the siege to Chester, the Britons marched out with all their forces to engage them; and they were attended by a body of 1250 monks from the monastery of Bangor, who stood at their post. Edwin was obliged to surrender; and Adelfrid, pursuing his victory, made himself master of Bangor, and entirely demolished the monastery; a building so extensive, that there was a mile's distance from one gate of it to another, and it contained two thousand one hundred monks, who are said to have been there maintained by their own labour. ²

Notwithstanding Adelfrid's success in war, he lived in ignorance to the account of young Etelrich, who had unjustly dispossessed the crown of Deirii. This prince was now grown to man's estate, wandered from place to place in continual danger from the attempts of Adelfrid; and received at last protection in the court of Redwald, king of the East Angles; where his engaging and gallant deportment procured him general esteem and affection. Redwald, however, was strongly solicited by the king of Northburghia to kill or deliver up his guest; rich presents were promised him if he would comply; and war denounced against him in case of his refusal. After rejecting several messages of this kind, his generosity began to yield to the motives of interest; and he retained the last ambassador, till he should come to a resolution in a case of such importance. Edwin, informed of his friend's perplexity, was yet determined at all hazards to remain in East Anglia; and thought, that if the protection of that court failed him, it were better to die, than prolong a life so much exposed to the persecutions of his powerful rival. This confidence in Redwald's honour and friendship, with his other accomplishments, engaged the queen on his side; and she effectually represented to her husband the importance of coming up to certain destruction their royal guest, who had fled to them for protection against his cruel and jealous enemies. ³ Redwald, embracing more Edwin's cousin-german, established himself in Deiri, the inheritance of his family; but to which the sons of Edwin had a preferable title. Eanfrid, the elder surviving son, fled to Penda, by whom he was treacherously slain. The younger son, Eadfrid, with Yfli, the grandson of Edwin, by Osfrid, son of Edwin, and his wife, who brought themselves in safety there, retired into France to King Dagobert, where they died. Osric, king of Deiri, and Eanfrid, of Bernicia, returned to the north of England; and the Saxons did not find them; with them; since Paulinus, who was the first archbishop of York, and who had converted them, thought proper to retire with Ethelburga, the queen Dowager, into Kent. Both these Northumbrian kings perished, the first in battle against Ceddwalla, the Briton; the second, by the treachery of that prince. Oswald, the brother of Eanfrid, of the race of Bernicia, united again the kingdom of Northumberland in the year 654, and restored the Christian religion in his dominions. He gained a bloody and well-disputed battle against Ceddwalla; the last vigorous effort which the Britons made against the Saxons. Oswald is much celebrated for his sanctity and charity by the monkish historians; and they pretend that his relics wrought miracles, particularly the curing of a sick horse, which had approached the place of his interment.

He died in battle against Penda, king of Mercia, and was not hurried by him for fifty years of age, before the metempsychosis assigned him in the government of the whole Northumbrian kingdom, by putting to death Oswin, the son of Osric, the last king of the race of Deiri. His son Ecgfrid succeeded him, and in by his invincible and victorious wars, secured his peace, without leaving any children, because Adelethric, his wife, refused to violate her vow of chastity. Alfred, his natural brother, acquired possession of the kingdom, which he governed for nineteen years; and he left it to Osred, his son, a boy of eight years of age. This prince, after a reign of eleven years, was murdered by Kenred his kinsman, who, after enjoying the crown only a year, perished by a like fate. Oswin, son of Osred, was slain in a sedition, a year after his accession to the crown; and Molle, who was not of the royal family, seized the crown. He perished by the treachery of Aelfred, a prince of the blood; and Alfred, having succeeded in his design upon the throne, was soon after expelled by his subjects. Ethelred, his successor, the son of Mollc, underwent a like fate. Ceolwold, the next king, the brother of Alfred, was deposed and slain by the people, and his place was filled by his son, Ecgfrid, who, after four years, was made way for Ethelbert, another son of Mollc, whose death was equally tragic with that of almost all his predecessors. After Ethelbert's death a universal anarchy prevailed in Northumberland; and the people having, by so many fatal revolutions, lost all attachment to their government and princes, were well prepared for submission to a foreign yoke; which Egbert, king of Wessex, finally imposed on them.

THE KINGDOM OF EAST ANGLIA.

The history of this kingdom contains nothing memorable, except the conversion of Easwine, the fourth king, and great-grandson of Iffla, the founder of the monarchy. The authority of Edwin, king of Northumberland, on whom that prince entirely depended, engaged him to take this son; but soon after, his wife, who was an idolaress, brought him back to her religion; and he was found unable to resist those allurements which had seduced the wast of mankind. After his death, which was violent, like that of most of the Saxon princes, that did not early retire into monasteries, Sigeberht, his successor, and half-brother, who had been educated in France, restored Christianity, and introduced learning among the East Angles. Some pretend that he founded the university of Cambridge, or rather some schools in that place. It is impossible, and quite needless, to be more particular in relating the transactions of the East Angles. What instruction or entertainment can it give the reader, to bear a long bead-roll of barbarous names, Egrea, Annas, Ethelbert, Ethelwald, Aldulf, Eofwald, Eorled, Ethelbert, who successively murdered, expelled, or inherited from each other, and obscurely filled the throne of that kingdom? Ethelbert, the last of these princes, was treacherously murdered by Offa, king of Mercia; and thus died the year 792, and his state was thenceforward united with that of Offa, as we shall relate presently.

THE KINGDOM OF MERCIA.

Mercia, the largest, if not the most powerful, kingdom of the Heptarchy, comprehended all the middle counties of England; and as its frontiers extended to those of all the other six kingdoms, as well as to Wales, it received its name from that circumstance. Wibba, the son of Cridu, founder of the monarchy, being placed on the throne by Ethelbert, king of Kent, governed his paternal dominions by a precarious authority; and after his death, Ceorl, his kinsman, was, by the influence of the Kentish monarch, preferred to his son Penda, whose turbulent character appeared dangerous to that prince. Penda was not born before the marriage of his father, and by his temerity and restless disposition were found nowise abated by time, experience, or reflection. He engaged in continual hostilities against all the neighbouring states, and thus exposed Mercia, his kingdom, to the incursions of the Irish and of the Northumbrians. He had never ceased to drift between the two factions, and, consequently, was not of a mind entirely equal to the influence of his own subjects and to strangers. Sigeberht, Egrea, and Annas, three kings of East Anglia, perished successively in battle against him; as did also Edwin and Oswald, the two greatest princes that had ever reigned over Northumberland. At last, Oswy, brother to Oswald, having defeated and slain him in a decisive battle, freed the world from this sanguinary tyrant. Penda, his son, mounted the throne: and after, and died the year 795, and lived under the protection of Oswy, whose daughter he had espoused. This prince was educated in the Christian faith, and she employed her influence with success, in converting her husband and his subjects to that religion. Thus the fair sex have had the merit of introducing the Christian doctrine into all the most considerable kingdoms of the Saxon Heptarchy. Penda died a violent death. His son, Wulhere, succeeded to the government; and, after having reduced to fictitious naught the crown of East Anglia, he left the crown to his brother Ethelred, who, though a lover of peace, showed himself not unfit for military enterprises. Besides making a successful expedition against the Frisians, and reducing to subjection into Kent the province of Essex, he made way for Ethelbert, another son of Mollc, whose death was equally tragic with that of almost all his predecessors. After Ethelbert's death a universal anarchy prevailed in Northumberland; and the people having, by so many fatal revolutions, lost all attachment to their government and princes, were well prepared for submission to a foreign yoke; which Egbert, king of Wessex, finally imposed on them.

THE KINGDOM OF NORTHUMBRIA.

Northumbria, the largest of the seven kingdoms of this island, comprehended the whole country of modern England, from the eastern part of York northward, to the sea; and included the kingdom of Mercia, beyond the river Humber. It comprised the ancient kingdom of Northumberland, and was a sort of semisupranational state, consisting of the three ancient provinces of Deiri, Bernicia, and Deira.
young prince, who is said to have possessed great merit, had paid his addresses to Eelfrida, the daughter of Offa, and was invited with all his retinue to Hereford, in order to solemnize the nuptials. Amidst the joy and festivity of these entertainments, he was seized by Offa, and secretly beheaded: and though Eelfrida, who abhorred her father's treachery, had time to give warning to the East Anglian nobility, who escaped into their own country, Offa, having extinguished the royal family, succeeded in his design of subduing that kingdom.8 The perfidious prince, desirous of re-establishing his character in the world, and perhaps of appeasing the remorses of his own conscience, sent his highest courtiers to the clergy, and practised all the monkish devotion so much esteemed in that ignorant and superstitious age. He gave the tenth of his goods to the church;9 bestowed rich donations on the cathedral of Hereford; and even made a pilgrimage to Rome, where his great power and riches could not fail of procuring him the papal absolution. The better to ingratiate himself with the sovereign pontiff, he engaged to pay him a yearly donation for the support of an English college at Rome; and in order to raise the sum, he imposed the tax of a penny on each house possessed of thirty pence a year. This imposition being afterwards levied on all England, was commonly denominated Peter's Pence:10 and though contrary to the spirit of the Roman pontiff, was afterwards raised as a tribute by the Roman pontiff. Carrying his hypocrisy still further, Offa, feigning to be directed by a vision from heaven, discovered at Venulam the relics of St. Alban, the martyr, and consecrated an magnificent monastery on that place.11 Moved by these acts of piety, Malmesbury, one of the best of the old English historians, declares himself at a loss to determine whether the merits or crimes of this prince preponderated. Offa died after a reign of thirty-nine years, in 794.12

This prince was become so considerable in the Heptarchy, that the Emperor Charlemagne entered into an alliance and friendship with him; a circumstance which did honour to this distant prince, who rarely had received so much little communication with each other. That emperor being a great lover of learning and learned men, in an age very barren of that ornament, Offa, at his desire, sent him over his Aelian, a clergyman, much celebrated for his knowledge, who received great honours from Charlemagne, and even became his preceptor in the sciences. The chief reason why he had at first desired the company of Aelian, was, that he might oppose his learning to the heresy of Felix, Bishop of Uergel in Catalonia; who maintained that Jesus Christ, considered in his human nature, could, more properly, be denominated the adoptive, than that of the Logos. This heresy was condemned in the council of Frankfort, held in 794, and consisting of 300 bishops. Such were the questions which were agitated in that age, and which employed the attention not only of elocutior scholars, but of the wisest and greatest princes.13

Ecgbert succeeded to his father Offa, but survived him only five months:14 when he made way for Kenulph, a descendant of the royal family. This prince waged war against Kent; and taking Egbert the king prisoner, he cut off his hands, and put out his eyes; leaving Cuthred, his own brother, in possession of the crown of that kingdom. Kenulph was killed in an insurrection of the East Anglians, whose crown his predecessor, Offa, had usurped. He had his son, Kenelm, a miner; who was afterwards, in the same year by his sister, Quendrake, who had entertained the ambitious views of assuming the government.15 But she was supplanted by her uncle, Ceolulf; who, two years after, was first assassinated by his own burn. The reign of that usurper, who was not of the royal family, was short and unfortunate: he was defeated by the West Saxons, and killed by his own subjects, the East Angles.16 Ludician, his son, and one of the leading men of Wessex, and Wigluff, who mounted this unstable throne, and fountain of impostures and of the utmost confusion, could not withstand the fortune of Egbert, who united all the Saxon kingdoms into one great monarchy.

THE KINGDOM OF ESSEX.

This kingdom made no great figure in the Heptarchy; and the history of it is very imperfect. Sleada succeeded to his father, Erkingwin, the founder of the monarchy; and made way for his son, Seberht, who, being nephew to Edbelbert, King of Kent, was persuaded by that prince to embrace the Christian faith.17 His sons and conjunct successors, Sextred and Seward, expelled into idolatry, and were soon after slain in a battle against the West Saxons. To show the rude manner of living in that age, Bede tells us,18 that these two kings expressed great desire to eat the white bread, distributed by Mellitus, the bishop, at the communion. But on his refusing them, unless they would submit to be baptized, they expelled him and their dominion. The names of the other princes who reigned successively in Essex, are Sigered the Little, Sigered the Good, who restored Christianity, Swinelm, Siger, Offa. This last prince having made a vow of chastity, notwithstanding his marriage with Keneswith, a Mercian princess, daughter to Penda, went in pilgrimage to Rome, and shut himself up during the rest of his life in a cloister. Selred, his successor, was killed at the battle of Maldon, in 994, by the Saxons, who had invaded his kingdom. For an account of his reign, and of the death of this king, see the history of England.21

THE KINGDOM OF SUSSEX.

The history of this kingdom, the smallest in the Heptarchy, is still more imperfect than that of Essex. Alla, who was, the founder of the monarchy, was slain in a battle against the Britons, who were possessed of this titular sovereignty. Adevalph, the last of them, was subdued in battle by Ceadwalla, King of Wessex, and was slain in the action, leaving two infant sons, who, falling into the hands of the conquerors, were murdered by him. The Abbot of Retford opposed the order for this execution; but could only prevail on Ceadwalla to suspend it till they should be baptized. But on their return, they were executed by order of the Briton, his son, Kenrie, who had fought many successful, and some unsuccessful, battles against the natives; and the martial spirit, common to all the Saxons, was, by means of these hostilities, carried to the greatest height among this tribe. Ceasulm, who was the son and successor of Kenrie, and who began his reign in 650, was still more ambitious and enterprising than his predecessors; and by waging continual war against the Britons, he added a great part of the counties of Mercia to the kingdom of Wessex. Of his other dominions. Carried along by the tide of success, he invaded the other Saxon states in his neighbourhood, and becoming terrible to all, he provoked a general contention against him. This alliance proved successful under the conduct of Ethelbert, King of Kent; and Cædwalla, who had lost the aforesaid of his own subjects by his violent death, and having a new accession of misfortunes, was expelled the throne, and died in exile and misery. Cædwinne and Cæthwine, his sons, governed jointly the kingdom, till the expulsion of the latter in 591, and the death of the former in 592. Cædwalla, by whom succeeded Ceoldred in 593, by whose death, which happened in 611, Kyneheard inherited the crown. This prince embraced Christianity, through the persuasion of Oswiu, King of Northumbria, who had married his daughter, and who had attained a great ascendancy in the Heptarchy. Kenwulf next succeeded to the monarchy, and dying in 672, left the succession so much disputed, that Sexburga, his widow, a woman of spirit, kept possession of the crown, and though he was disturbed by some risings, which happened two years after. Escwein then peaceably acquired the crown; and, after a short reign of two years, made way for Kentwulf, who governed nine years. Ceodwalla, his successor, mounted not the throne with opposition; but proved a great prince according to the ideas of those times; that is, he was enterprising, warlike, and successful. He entirely subdued the kingdom of Sussex, and annexed it to his dominion. At the same time he had met with resistance from Wredred, the king, who proved successful against Murolo, brother to Ceodwalla, and slew him in a skirmish. Ceodwalla, at last, tried with wars and battles; but he was finally overthrown by several endowments on the church; and made a pilgrimage to Rome, where he received baptism, and died in 689. Ina, his successor, inherited the military virtues of his ancestors; he acquired an ascendency which enabled him to make such a shining figure on the throne. And familiarizing himself to the manners of the French, who, as Malmsbury observes, were eminent both for valour and civility above all the western nations, he learned to polish the radius and surplus of the Christian observer. His early misfortunes thus proved of singular advantage to him.

It was not long ere Egbert had opportunities of displaying his natural and acquired talents. Britric, King of Wessex, had married Eadburga, natural daughter of Offa, King of Mercia, a profligate woman, equally infamous for cruelty and for inconstancy. Having great influence over her husband, she contrived to obtain his death, and adopted her brother Albin, who was several times the object of her jealousy: but, unfortunately, the king drank of the fatal cup along with his favourite, and so soon after expired. This tragical incident, it seems, was the cause of so many things, rendered Edburga so odious, that she was obliged to fly into France; whence Egbert was at the same time recalled by the nobility, in order to ascend the throne of his ancestors. He attained that dignity in the last year of the eighth century.

In the kingdoms of the Heptarchy, an exact rule of succession was either unknown or not strictly observed; and thence the reigning prince was continually agitated with jealousy against the princes of the blood, whom he still considered as rivals, and whose death alone could give him entire security in his possession of the throne. From this fatal cause, together with the admiration of the monastic life, and the opinion of merit and chivalry, preservation of chastity even in a married state, the royal families had been entirely extinguished in all the kingdoms except that of Wessex; and the emulations, suspicions, and conspiracies, which had formerly been confined to the princes of the blood alone, were now diffused among all the nobility in the several Saxon states. Egbert was the sole descendant of those first conquerors who subdued Britain, and who enhanced the glory of their country by claiming a pedigree from Woden, the supreme divinity of their ancestors. But that prince, though invited by this favourable circumstance to make attempts on the neighbouring Saxons, gave them for some time no disturbance, and rather chose to turn his arms against the Britons in Cornwall, whom he defeated in several battles. He was called from the conquest of that country by an invasion made upon his dominions by Bernulf, king of Mercia. The Mercians, before the accession of Egbert, had very nearly attained the absolute sovereignty in the Heptarchy; they had reduced the East Angles under subjection, and established tributary princes in the kingdoms of Kent and Essex. Northumbria was involved in anarchy; and most of the other provinces submitted to that of Wessex, which, much inferior in extent to Mercia, was supported solely by the great qualities of its sovereign. Egbert led his army against the invaders; and encountering them at Ellandun in Wiltshire, obtained a complete victory, and by the great slaughter which he made of them in their flight, gave a mortal blow to the power of the Mercians. Whilst he himself, in prosecution of his victory, entered their country on the side of Oxfordshire, and threatened the heart of their dominions; he sent an army into Kent, commanded by Ethelwolph, his eldest son,* and expelling Baldred, the tributary king, soon made himself master of that country. The kingdom of Essex was conquered with the same promptitude; and the East Angles, from the hatred to the Mercian government, which had been established over them by treachery and violence, and probably exercised with tyranny, immediately rose in arms, and craved the protection of Egbert. If the Mercian king, instead of attacking them, was defeated and slain in two years after, Ludican, his successor, met with the same fate. These surrenders and capitulations facilitated the enterprises of Egbert, who advanced into the centre of the kingdom of Kent, and placed mercenaries, and dispirited and divided people. In order to engage them more easily to submission, he allowed Wiglaf, their countryman, to retain the title of king, while he himself exercised all the powers of sovereignty. The anarchy which prevailed in Northumbria, tempted him to carry still further his victorious arms; and the inhabitants, unable to resist his power, and desirous of possessing some established form of government, were forward, on his first appearance, to send deputies, who submitted to his authority, and swore allegiance to him as their sovereign. Egbert, however, still allowed to Northumbria, as he had done to Mercia and East Anglia, the power of electing a king of their own. This act was independent of the See.

Thus were united all the kingdoms of the Heptarchy in one great state, near four hundred years after the first arrival of the Saxons in Britain; and the fortunate arms and prudent and general policy of Egbert at length reflected what had been so often attempted in vain by so many princes. Kent, Northumbria, and Mercia, which had successively aspired to general dominion, were now incorporated in his empire, and the other subordinate kingdoms seemed willing to share the same fate. His territories were nearly of the same extent with what is now properly called England; and a favourable prospect was afforded to the Anglo Saxons, of establishing a civilized monarchy, possessed of tranquillity within itself, and secure against foreign invasion. This great event happened in the year 827.9

The Saxons, though they had been so long settled in the island, had not as yet to have been much improved beyond their German ancestors, either in arts, industry, knowledge, humanity, justice, or obedience to the laws. Even Christianity, though it opened the way to connections between them and the more polished states of Europe, had not hitherto been very effectual in banishing their ignorance, or soothing their barbarous manners. As they received that doctrine through the corrupted channels of Rome, it carried along with it a great mixture of credibility and superstition, equally destructive to the understanding and to morals. The reverence towards saints and relics seemed to have almost supplanted the adoration of the Supreme Being. Monastic observances were esteemed more meritorious than the active virtues; the knowledge of natural causes was neglected from the universal belief of miraculous interpositions and judgments: bounty to the church atoned for every violence against society; and the remorses for cruelty, murder, treachery, assassination, and the mere robbery, were appeased, not by amendment of life, but by penances, servility to the monks, and an abject and illiberal devotion. The reverence for the clergy had been carried to such a degree as to deprive them of all that is peculiar to the sacred habit, though, on the highway, the people flocked around him; and, showing him all marks of profound respect, revered every word he uttered as the most sacred oracle. Even the military virtues, so inherent in all the Saxon tribes, began to be neglected; and the nobility, preferring the security and sloth of the cloister to the tumults and glory of war, valued themselves chiefly on endowing monasteries, of which they assumed the government. Of several kings, too, being extremely impoverished by continual benefactions to the church, to which the states of their kingdoms had weakly asentted, could bestow no rewards on valour or military services, and had even been sufficient influence to support their government.

Another inconvenience which attended this corrupt species of Christianity, was the superstitious attachment to Rome, and the gradual subjection of the kingdom to a foreign prelacy. Egbert, who had been consecrated by the Roman pontiff, had conducted all the ecclesiastical government by his domestic synods and councils;* but the Saxons, receiving their religion from Roman monks, were taught at the same time a profound reverence for that see, and were naturally led to regard it as the capital of their religion. Pilgrimages to Rome were represented as the most meritorious acts of devotion. Not only noblemen and ladies of rank undertook this tedious journey, but kings themselves, abdicating their crowns, sought for a secure passport to heaven at the feet of the Roman pontiff. New reliques perpetually sent from the endless miracles of imagination, and magnified by lying miracles invented in convents, operated on the astonished minds of the multitude. And every prince has attained the eulogies of the monks, the only historians of those ages, not in proportion to his civil and military success, but his inclinations towards his order, and his superstitious reverence for Rome.

The Sovereign pontiff, encouraged by this blindness and superstition among the people, advanced a third day in his encroachments on the independence of the English churches. Wilfrid, bishop of Lindsey, the sole prelate of the Northumbrian kingdom, increased this subjection in the eighth century, by his making an appeal to Rome against the decisions of an English synod, which had abridged his diocese by the erection of some new bishoprics. Agatho, the pope, readily embraced this precedent of an appeal to his court; and Wilfrid, though the haughtiest and most luxurious prelate of his age, having obtained with the people the character of sanctity, was thus able to lay the foundation of this papal pretension.

The great topic by which Wilfrid confounded the imagination of men was that St. Peter, to whose custody the keys of heaven were intrusted, would certainly refuse admittance to every one who should be wanting in respect to his successor. This conceit, well suited to vulgar conceptions, made great impression on some persons for several ages; and has not even at present lost all influence in the Catholic countries.

Had this abject superstition produced general peace and were wholly Saxons, and almost as ignorant and barbarous as the last. They received the church, little to the improvement of society in knowledge or the arts. 41 Chron. Sax. p. 69. 51. 2 1 ibid. 63. 1 3 E. Halevel. Lib. 5. cap. 2. 54 Histor. Sax. p. 71. 61 The same; according to the Sax. chronicles, but the priests in Italy, Spain, and Gaul, made some attempt for them, by other means. 7 11 For the most ancient ages, they had almost all Romans, or, in other words, the ancient nations; and they were all clerks, or the seeds of the Roman, in the very greatest divinity. But the priests in the Heptarchy, after the first monarchies, triumph, it had made some atonement for the ill attending it; but besides the usual avidity of men for power and riches, frivolous controversies in theology were engendered by it, which were so much the more fatal, as they admitted not, like the others, of any final determination from established possession. The disputes excited were of the most ridiculous kind, and entirely worthy of those ignorant and barbarous ages. There were some intricacies, observed by all the Christian churches, in adjusting the day of keeping Easter; which depended upon the most considered decision of the course of the sun and moon; and it happened that the missionaries, who had converted the Scots and Britons, had followed a different calendar from that which was observed in Rome in the age when Augustine had resided there. The priests also of all the Christian churches were accustomed to shave part of their head; but the form given to this tonsure was different in the former from what was practised in the latter. The Scots and Britons pleaded the antiquity of their usage, the Romans, and their churches, insisted on the universality of theirs. That Easter must necessarily be kept by a rule, which comprehended both of the year and age of the moon, was agreed by all; that the tonsure of the head, as a mark of their own impiety, was a point undisputed; but the Romans and Saxons called their antagonists schismatics; because they celebrated Easter on the very day of the full moon in March, if that day came on a Sunday, instead of the Sunday following; and because they shaved the forepart of their head from ear to ear, instead of making that tonsure on the crown of the head, and in a circular form. In order to render their antagonists odious, they affirmed that, once in seven years, they concurred with the Jews in the time of celebrating that festival. And that they might recommend their own form of tonsure, they maintained, that it immolated symbolically the crown of thorns worn by Christ in his passion; whereas the other form was invented by Simon Magus, without any regard to that representation. These controversies had, from the beginning, excited such animosity between the British and Roman priests, that, instead of conciliating in their endeavours to convert the idolatrous Saxons, they refused all communion together, and each regarded his opponent as no better than a pagan. The dispute lasted more than a century; and was at last finished, not by men's discovering the folly of it, which would have been too great an effort for human reason to accomplish, but by the entire prevalence of the Roman rite over the Scottish and British. Wilfrid, Bishop of Lindisfarne, acquired great merit, both with the council held at York, and with the synod held in Britain, by endeavouring to put down the quaterdecimian schism, as it was called, from the Northumbrian kingdom, into which the neighbourhood of the Scots had formerly introduced it. The Saxons were, in a great measure, a wild and savage people. Any one, called, in the year 680, a synod at Hatfield, consisting of all the bishops in Britain, where was accepted and ratified the decree of the Lateran council, summoned by Martin, against the heresies of the Monothelites. The council and synod maintained, in opposition to these heretics, that, though the divine and human nature in Christ made but one person, yet had they different inclinations, wills, acts, and sentiments, and that the unity of the person implied not any unity of consciousness. This opinion it seems somewhat difficult to comprehend; and no one, unacquainted with the ecclesiastical history of those ages, could imagine the height of zeal and violence with which it was then inculcated. The decree of the Lateran council calls the Monothelites impious, execrable, wicked, abominable, and even diabolical; and curses and anathematizes them at all eternity.

The Saxons, from the first introduction of Christianity among them, had admitted the use of images; and perhaps, that religion, without some of those exterior ornaments, had not made so quick a progress with these idolaters: but they had not paid any species of worship or address to images; and this abuse never prevailed among Christians, till it received the sanction of the second council of Nice. —

CHAP. II.

EGEBERT.

The kingdoms of the Heptarchy, though united by so recent a conquest, seemed to be firmly cemented by the same energetic bonds under Egbert; and the inhabitants of the several provinces had lost all desire of revolting from that monarch, or of restoring their former independent governments. Their language was everywhere nearly the same, their customs, laws, institutions, civil and religious; and as the race of the ancient kings was totally extinct in all the subject states, the people readily transferred their allegiance to a prince, who seemed to merit it, by the splendour of his victories, the vigour of his energies, and the superiority of his birth. A union also in government opened to them the agreeable prospect of future tranquillity; and it appeared more probable that they would thenceforth become formidable to their neighbours, than be exposed to their inroads and devastations. But these flattering views were soon overcast by the appearance of the Danes, who, during some centuries, kept the Anglo-Saxons in perpetual inquietude, committed the most barbarous ravages upon them, and at last reduced them to grievous servitude.

The Emperor Charlemagne, though naturally generous and humane, had been induced by bigotry to exercise strict vigilance over the pagan Saxons in Germany, whom he subdued; and besides often ravaging their country with fire and sword, he had in cool blood decimated all the inhabitants for their revolts, and had obliged them, by the most rigorous edicts, to make a seeming compliance with the Christian doctrine. That religion, which had easily made its way among the British Saxons by insinuation and address, appeared shocking to their German brethren, when imposed on them by the violence of Charlemagne; and the more generous and warlike of these pagans had fled northward into Jutland, in order to escape the fury of his persecutions. Meeting there with a people of similar manners, they were readily received by them, and by them were cajoled, by regarding the refugees as their conquerors, and by affording subsistence to those numerous inhabitants with which the northern countries were now overburdened. They invaded the provinces of France, which were exposed by the degeneracy and dissensions of Charlemagne's posterity; and being there known under the general name of Normans, which they received from their northern situation, they became the terror of all the maritime and even of the inland countries. They were also tempted to visit England in their frequent excursions; and being able, by sudden inroads, to make great progress over a people who were not defended by any naval force, who had relaxed their military institutions, and who were sunk into a superstition which had become odious to the Danes and ancient Saxons, they made no distinction in their hostilities between the French and English kingdoms. Their first appearance in this island was in the year 789, when Ethelbert, King of Wessex. A small body of them landed in that kingdom, with a view of learning the state of the country; and when the magistrate of the place questioned them concerning their enterprise, and summoned them to appear before the King, and account for their intentions, they killed him, and flying to their ships, escaped into their own country. The next alarm was given to Northumberland in the year 794, when a body of these pirates pillaged a monastery:... but their ships being much damaged by a storm, and their leader slain in a skirmish, they were at last defeated by the inhabitants, and the remainder of them put to the sword. A. D. 822. Five years after Egbert had established his monarchy over England, the Danes landed in the Isle of Sheppey, and having pillaged it, escaped with impunity. They were not so fortunate in their next year's enterprise, when they disembarked from thirty-five ships, and were encountered by Egbert, at Charmouth, in Dorsetshire. The battle was bloody; but though the Danes lost great numbers, they maintained the post they had taken, and thence made good their retreat to their ships. Having learned by experience, that they must expect withstood from this wars and.removeAttribute, they entered into an alliance with the Britons of Cornwall; and landing two years after in that country, made an inroad with their confederates into the county of Devon; but were met at Hengestouw by Egbert, and totally defeated. While England remained in this state of anxiety, and defended itself more by temporary expedients than by any regular plan of administration, Egbert, A. D. 836. who alone was able to provide effectually against this new evil, unfortunately died; and left the government to his son Ethelwulf.

ETHELWOLF.

This prince had neither the abilities nor the vigour of his father; and was better qualified for governing a convent than a kingdom. He began his reign with making a pilgrimage, and spending over to the French his eldest son, Athelstan, the new-conquered provinces of Essex, Kent, and Sussex. But no inconveniences seem to have arisen from this partition; as the continual terror of the Danish invasions prevented all domestic dissen.sion. A. Fleet of these ravagers, consisting of thirty-three vessels, appeared at Southampton; but were repulsed with loss by Wulfhere, governor of the neighbouring county. The same year, Ethelhelm, governor of Dorsetshire, routed another band which had disembarked at Portsmouth; but he obtained the victory after a furious engagement, and he bought with his life the loss of his life. Next year the Danes made several inroads into England; and fought battles or rather skirmishes in East Anglia and Lindsey and Kent; where, though they were sometimes repulsed and defeated, they always obtained their end of committing spoil upon the country, and carrying off their booty. They avoided combats to a great degree, and was not suited to their plan of operations. Their vessels were small, and ran easily up the creeks and rivers; where they drew them ashore, and having formed an encampment round them, which they guarded with part of their number, they plundered wherever they went, and carrying off the inhabitants and cattle and goods, they hastened to their ships and quickly disappeared. If the military force of the county were assembl.ed, (for there was no time for troops to March from a distance,) the Danes either were able to repulse them, and to continue their ravages with impunity, or they betook themselves to their vessels; and setting sail, suddenly invaded some distant quarter, which was not prepared for their reception. Part of England was held in continual alarm; and the inhabitants of one county durst not give assistance to those of another, lest their own families and property should be the first time exposed to the fury of these barbarous ravagers. All orders of men were involved in this calamity; and the priests and monks, who had been commonly spared in the domestic quarrels of the Heptarchy, were the chief objects on which the Danish invaders exercised their rage and animosity. Every season of the year was dangerous; and the absence of the enemy was no reason why any man could esteem himself a moment in safety. These incursions had now become almost annual, when the Danes, encouraged by their successes against France as well as England, (for both kingdoms were alike exposed to this dreadful calamity,) invaded the last in so numerous a body, as seemed to threaten it with universal subjection. But the English, more military than the Britons, whom a few centuries before the Danes had defeated with little resistance, routed them with a vigour proportioned to the exigency. Ceorl, governor of Devonshire, fought a battle with one body of the Danes at Wigmerough, and put them to route with great slaughter. King Eadred attacked another at sea near Sandwich, sunk nine of their ships, and put the rest to flight. A body of them, however, ventured, for the first time, to take up winter-quarters in England; and receiving in the next year a reception such as the Danes in 350 vessels, they advanced from the Isle of Thanet, where they had stationed themselves; burnt the cities of London and Canterbury; and having put to flight Birchen, who now governed Mercia under the title of King, they marched into the heart of Sussex, and laid every place waste around them. Ethelwolf, impelled by the urgency of the danger, marched against them at the head of the West Saxons; and carrying with him his second son, Ethelbald, gave them battle at Olney, and in a bloody victory over them. This advantage procured but a short respite to the English. The Danes still maintained their settlement in the Isle of Thanet; and being attacked by Ethelhelm, governor of Kent, and being, though defeated in the beginning of the action, they finally repulsed the assailants, and killed both the governors. They removed thence to the Isle of Wight, and there took up winter-quarters, that they might further extend their devastations and ravages.

This unsettled state of England hindered not Ethelwolf from making a pilgrimage to Rome; whither he carried his fourth and youngest son, Alfred, and in the following year six years of age. He passed there a twelvemonth in exercises of devotion; and failed not in that most essential part of devotion, liberality to the church of Rome. Besides giving presents to the more distinguished ecclesiastics, he made a perpetual grant of three hundred munces a year to that church; one third to support the lamps of St. Peter's, another of those of St. Paul's, a third to the pope himself. In his return home, he married Judith, daughter of the emperor, Charles the Bald; but on his landing in England, he met with an opposition which he little looked for. His eldest son Athelstan, being dead, Ethelbald, his second son, had assumed the government, kind in conjunction with many of the nobles, the project of excluding his father from a throne, which his weakness and superstition seemed to have rendered him so ill qualified to fill. The people were divided between the two princes; and a bloody and bloody conflict ensued. Whether the Danes, which the English laboured, appeared inevitable; when Ethelwolf had the facility to yield to the greater part of his son's pretensions. He made with him a partition of the kingdom; and taking to himself the eastern part, which was always at that time esteemed the least considerable, as well as the most exposed, he delivered over to Ethelbald the sovereignty of the western. Immediately after, he summoned the states of the whole kingdom, and with the same facility conferred a perpetual and important donation on the church.

The ecclesiastics, in those days of ignorance, made rapid advances, with the loss of their property and liberty; and quaking at the denunciation of the church, and intercalating the most absurd and most interested doctrines, though they sometimes met, from the contrary interests of the laity, with an opposition, which it required time and address to overcome, they found no obstacle in their reason or understanding. Not content with this description of land made them by the Saxon princes and nobles, and with temporary oblations from the devotion of the people, they had cast a wistful eye on a vast revenue, which they claimed to be belonging to them by a constitutional and venerable title. However little versed in the Scriptures, they had been able to discover, that under the Jewish law, a tenth of all the produce of land was conferred on the priesthood; and forgetting, what they themselves taught, that the moral part only of that law was obligatory on Christians, they made this donation confer a perpetual property, inherent by divine right in those who officiated at the altar. During some centuries, the whole scope of sermons and homilies was directed to this purpose; and one would have imagined, from the general tenor of these discourses, that all the practical parts of Christianity were comprised in the exact and faithful performance of titles to the clergy. Encouraged by their success in inculcating these doctrines, they ventured further than they were warranted by the Levitical law, and pretended to draw the tenth of all industry, merchandise, wages of labourers, and pay of soldiers; yea, some canonists went so far as to affirm, that the clergy were entitled to the tithes of the profits made by courtesans in the exercise of their profession. Though parishes had been instituted in England by Honorius, Archbishop of Canterbury, near two centuries before, the ecclesiastics had never yet been able to get possession of the tithes: they therefore seized the present favourable opportunity of making that acquisition, when a weak, superstitious prince filled the throne, and when the people, discouraged by their losses from the Danes, and terrified with the fear of future invasions, were ready to give any action the appearance of religion. So menacious was this conception deemed by the English, that, trusting entirely to supernatural assistance, they neglected the ordinary means of safety; and agreed, even in the present desperate extremity, that the revenues of the church should be exempted from all burthen, though imposed for national defence and security.

ETHELBAJD AND ETHELBERT.

A.D. 697.

ETHELBALD lived only two years after making this grant; and by his will he shared England between his two eldest sons, Ethelbald and Ethelbert; the west being assigned to the former, the east to the latter. Ethelbald was a prophetic prince; and marrying Judith, his mother-in-law, gave great offence to the people; but, moved by the remonstrances of Swithin, Bishop of Winchester, he was at last prevailed on to divorce her. His reign was short; and Ethelbert, his brother, succeeding to the government, behaved himself, during a reign of five years, in a manner more worthy of his birth and station. The kingdom, however, was still infested by the Danes, who made an inroad and sacked Winchester, but were there defeated by Ethelbert, who, after their retreat, was shut up in the Isle of Thanet, having deceived the English by a treaty, unexpectedly broke into Kent, and committed great outrages.

ETHERED.

A.D. 666.

ETHERED was succeeded by his brother Ethelred, who, though he defended himself with bravery, enjoyed, during his whole reign, no tranquility from those Danish invasions. His younger brother, Alfred, seconded him in all his enterprises; and generously sacrificed to the public good all resentment which might arise on his opponents, who were seduced by Ethelred from a large patrimony which had been left him by his father. The first landing of the Danes in the reign of Ethelred was not without the aid of his enemies. They were discredited by the Saxons persons, who, by their present safety than for the common interest, entered into a separate treaty with the enemy; and furnished them with horses, which enabled them to make an irruption by land in the kingdom of Northumberland. There they surprised the city of York, and defeated it at Gisburn and Elua, two Northumbrian princes, who perished in the assault. Encouraged by these successes, and by the superiority which they had acquired in arms, they now ventured, under the command of Hunnag and Hubba, to leave the sea-coast, and penetrating into Mercia, they took several of their winter-quarters at Nottingham, where they threatened the kingdom with a final subjection. The Mercians, in this extremity, applied to Ethelred for succour; and that prince, with his brother Alfred, conducting a great army to Nottingham, obliged the enemy to dis- lend, and to accept the assistance of Northumbrians. Their restless disposition, and their avidity for plunder, allowed them not to remain long in those quarters: they broke into East Anglia, defeated and took prisoner Eardred, the king of that country, whom they afterwards murdered in cool blood; and committing the most barbarous ravages on the people, particularly on the monasteries, they gave the East Angles cause to regret the temporary relief which they had obtained by assuring the common enemy.

The next station of the Danes was at Reading; whence they infested the neighbouring country by their incursions. The Mercians, desirous of shaking off their dependence on Ethelred, refused to join him with their forces; and that prince, attended by Alfred, was obliged to march against the enemy with the West Saxons alone, his hereditary subjects. The Danes, being defeated in the second battle of their garrison; but quickly making thence an irruption, they routed the West Saxons, and obliged them to raise the siege. An action soon after ensued at Aston, in Berkshire, where, in the beginning of the day, they were in danger of a total defeat. Alfred advancing with one division of the army, was surrounded by the enemy in disadvantageous ground; and Ethelred, who was at that time hearing mass refused to march to his assistance; so that prayers should be finished; but as he afterwards obtained the victory, this success, not the danger of Alfred, was ascribed by the monks to the piety of that monarch. This battle of Aston did not terminate the war; another battle was a little after fought at Hastings, where the Danes were more successful; and being reinforced by a new army from their own country, they became every day more terrible to the English. Amidst these confusions, Ethelred died of a wound which he received in an action with the Danes; and left the inheritance of his cares and misfortunes, rather than of his grandeur, to his brother, Alfred, who was now twenty-two years of age.

ALFRED.

This prince gave very early marks of that great virtue and elevating talent which, during the most difficult times, he saved his country from utter ruin and subversion. Ethelwolf, his father, the year after his return with Alfred from Rome, had again sent the young prince thither with a numerous retinue; and a report being spread of the king's death, the pope, Leo III., gave Alfred the royal election; whether prognosticating his future greatness from the appearances of his pregnant genius, or willing to pretend, even in that age, to the right of conferring kingdoms. Alfred, on his return home, became every day more the object of his father's affection; but being indulged in all youthful pleasures, he was much neglected in his education; and he had barely reached his twelfth year, when he was yet totally ignorant of the lowest elements of literature. His genius was first roused by the recital of Saxon poems, in which the Queen took delight; and this art, which in some respects has made considerable progress even among barbarians, expanded those noble and elevated sentiments which he had received from nature. Encouraged by the Queen, and stimulated by her own ardent inclination, he soon began to read those compositions; and in that action, shew his zeal to acquire the knowledge of the Latin tongue, in which he met with body had landed, and having collected all the scattered troops of their countrymen, had surprised Chippenham, then a considerable town, and were exercising their usual ravages all around them.

This last incident quite broke the spirit of the Saxons, and removed all temptation to resistance. Finding that, after all the miserable havoc which they had undergone in their persons and in their property; after all the vigorous actions which they had exerted in their own defence; a new band, equally as numerous and disordered as any that had preceded them, had now fallen among them; they believed themselves abandoned by Heaven to destruction, and delivered over to those swarms of robbers, which the fertile north thus incessantly poured forth against them. Some left their country and retired into Wales, or fled beyond sea: others submitted to the conquerors, in hopes of appeasing their fury by a servile obedience. And every man's attention being now engrossed in concern for his own preservation, no one would hearken to the exhortations of the king, who summoned them to make, under his conduct, one effort more in defence of their prince, their country, and their liberties. Alfred himself was obliged to relinquish the emblems of his dignity, to dismiss his servants, and to seek shelter, in the meanest disguises, from the pursuit and fury of his enemies. He concealed himself under a peasant's habit, and hid himself in a forest, where he had been intrusted with the care of some of his cows. There passed here an incident, which has been recorded by all the historians, and was long preserved by popular tradition; though it contains nothing memorable, except so far as every circumstance is interesting which attends so much virtue and dignity reduced to such distress. The wife of the next-herd was ignorant of the condition of her royal guest; and observing him one day busy with the axe, which he had taken against his wretchedness, and which he had been desired him to take to care of some cakes which were toasting, while she was employed elsewhere in other domestic affairs. But Alfred, whose thoughts were otherwise engaged, was not aware of this injunction; for tho' the good woman, on her return, finding her cakes all burnt, rated the king very severely, and upbraided him, that he always seemed very well pleased to cut her warm cakes, though he was thus negligent in tracing them.

By degrees, Alfred, as he found the search of the enemy become more remiss, collected some of his retainers, and retired into the centre of a bog, formed by the stagnating waters of the Thane and Parret, in Somersetshire. Here he found two acres of firm ground; and building a habitation on them, rendered himself secure by its fortifications, and still more by the unknown and inaccessible roads which were continually crossed by the wondrous machine, with which it was every way environed. This place he called Edelingay, or the Isle of Nobles; and it now bears the name of Athelney. He thence made frequent sallies, and undertook, with the vigour of his arm, and knew not from what quarter the blow came. He subsisted himself and his followers by the Mudder which he acquired; he procured them consolation by revenge; and from small successes he opened their minds to hope, that notwithstanding his present low condition, more important victories might at length attend his valour.

Alfred lay here concealed, but not inactive; during a twelvemonth, when the news of a prosperous event reached his ears, and called him to the field. Hubba, the Dane, having spread devastation, fire, and slaughter over Wales, had landed in Devonshire from twenty-three vessels, and had seized some castles in Cornwall, a part situated near the mouth of the small river Taw. Oddine, Earl of Devonshire, with his followers, had taken shelter there; and being ill supplied with provisions, and even with water, he determined, by some vigorous hostilities, to extort the necessity of submitting to the barbarous enemy. He made a sudden Sally on the Danes before sun-rising; and taking them unprepared, he put them to rout, pursued authors that better prompted his heroic spirit, and directed his generous views. Absorbed in these elegant pursuits, he regarded his accession to royalty rather as an object of regret than of triumph; but being called to the throne, in preference to his brother's children, as well by the will of God as by the weight of circumstance which, with the Anglo-Saxons, as by the vows of the whole nation, and the urgency of public affairs, he shook off his literary indolence, and exerted himself in the defence of his subject, and soon showed his brother, when he was obliged to take the field, in order to oppose the Danes, who had seized Wilton, and were exercising their usual ravages on the countries around. He marched against them with the few troops which he could assemble on a sudden; and giving them battle, gained at first an advantage, but by his pursuing the victory too far, the superiority of the enemy's numbers prevailed, and recaptured the country. This for that purpose they were conducted to London, and allowed to take up winter-quarters there; but, careless of their engagements, they immediately set themselves to the committing of spoil on the neighbouring county of Sussex, whose territories London was situated, made a new stipulation with them, and engaged them, by presents of money, to remove to Lindsey, in Lincolnshire; a country which they had already reduced to ruin and desolation. Finding therefore no object in that place, either for their rapine or violence, they suddenly turned back upon Mercia, in a quarter where they expected to find it without defence; and fixing their station at Repton, in Derbyshire, they laid the whole country desolate with fire and sword. Burned, despairing of success against an enemy whom no force could resist, and no treaties bind, abandoned his kingdom, and flying to Rome, took shelter in a cloister. He was bereaved of his Alfred, and the last who bore the title of King in Mercia.

The West Saxons were now the only remaining power in England; and though supported by the vigour and abilities of Alfred, they were unable to sustain in the effeminacy of those ravagers, who from all quarters invaded them. A new swarm of Danes came over this year under three princes, Guthrum, Oscelel, and Amond; and having first joined their countrymen at Repton, they soon found the necessity of separating, in order to provide for their subsistence. Part of them, under the command of Haldene, their chiefban, marched into Bedfordshire, where they and their quarter were the only relics to the observance of the treaty; not that he expected they would pay any veneration to the relics; but he hoped, that, if they now violated this oath, their impolicy would infallibly draw down upon them the vengeance of Heaven. But the Danes, little apprehensive of the danger, suddenly, without waiting for their presence, fell upon Alfred's army; and having put it to rout, marched westward, and took possession of Exeter.

The prince collected new forces, and exerted such vigour, that he fought in one year eight battles with the enemy, and reduced them to the utmost extremity. He heartened however to new proposals of peace; and was satisfied to stipulate with them, that they would settle somewhere in England; and would not permit the entrance of more ravagers into the kingdom. But while he was expecting the execution of this treaty, which it seemed the interest of the Danes themselves to fulfill, he heard that another them with great slaughter, killed Hubba himself, and got possession of the famous Reufen, or ensconced standard, as which the Danes put great confidence. It contained the figure of a raven, which had been inwoven by the three sisters of Hingaur and Hubba, with many magical incantations, and which, by its different movements, prognosticated, as the Danes believed, the good or bad success of any enterprise. When Alfred observed this symptom of successful resistance in his subjects, he left his retreat; but before he would assemble and, p. s. e by the men. »nd king, by atment, He subdued, to conducted whom received their camp under the disguise of a harper, and passed unsuspected through every quarter. He so entertained them with his music and facetious humour, that he met with a welcome reception; and was even introduced to the tent of Guthrum, their prince, where he remained some days. He remarked the supine security of the Danes, their contempt of the English, their negligence in foraging and plundering, and their absolute want of that which they gained by rape and violence. Encouraged by these favourable appearances, he secretly sent emissaries to the most considerable of his subjects, and summoned them to a rendezvous, attended by their warlike followers, at Brixton, near London, as a sort of conference, for the purpose of endeavoring to put an end to their calamities by service submission, conqueror their reception, which, had hoped to put an end to their calamities by service submission, now found the insolence and rapine of the conqueror more intolerable than all past fatigues and dangers; and, at the appointed day, they joyfully returned to their prince. On this appearance, they received him with shouts of applause; and could not satiate their eyes with the sight of this beloved monarch, whom they had long regarded as dead, and who now, with such a view of the defence of the kingdom, had hesitated to call them to liberty and to vengeance. He instantly conducted them to Eddington, where the Danes were encamped; and taking advantage of his previous knowledge of the place, he directed his attack against the most ungoverned quarter of the enemy. The Danes, surprised to see an army of English, whom they considered as totally subdues, and still more astonished to hear that Alfred was at their head, made but a faint resistance, notwithstanding their superior number, and were soon put to flight with great slaughter. The remainder of the routed army, with their prince, was besieged by Alfred in a fortified camp to which they retired; but being detained by extremity by want and hunger, they had recourse to the submission of the victor, and offered to submit on any conditions. The king, no less generous than brave, gave them their lives; and even formed a scheme for converting them, from numerous, to a smaller army, which he conducted to fair commerce. He knew that the kingdoms of East Anglia and Northumberland were totally desolated by the frequent incursions of the Danes, and he now proposed to relieve them, by settling there Guthrum and his followers. He hoped that the new planters would at last betake themselves to industry, when, by reason of his resistance, and the exhausted condition of the country, they could no longer subsist by plunder; and that they might serve him as a rampart against any future incursions of their countrymen. But before he ratified these mild conditions with the Danes, he required that they should give him one pledge of their sincerity, and of their intention to incorporate with the English, by declaring their conversion to Christianity. Guthrum, and his army, had no avercion to the proposal; and without much instruction, or argument, or conference, they were all admitted to baptism. The king answered for Guthrum at the same time, gave him the name of Athelstan, and received him as his adopted son. a d. 860. The success of this expedient seemed to correspond to Alfred's hopes: the greater part of the Danes settled peaceably in their new quarters; some smaller bodies of the same nation, which were preserved in Mercia, were distributed into the five cities of Derby, Leicester, Stamford, Lincoln, and Nottingham, and were thence called the Fif or Five-burgers. The more turbulent and unquiet made an expedition into France, under the command of Hasting; and, coming by a short incursion of Danes, who sailed up the Thames, and landed at Fulham, but suddenly retreated to their ships on finding the country in a posture of defence, Alfred was not for some years infested by the incursions of those barbarians. The king employed this interval of tranquillity in restoring order to the state, which had been shaken by so many violent conccssions, in establishing civil and military institutions; in composing the minds of men to industry and justice; and in providing against the return of like calamities. He was, more properly than his grandfather Egbert, the sole monarch of the English, (for the Saxons were now universally called,) because the kingdom of Mercia was at last incorporated in his state, and was governed by Ethelbert, his brother-in-law, who bore the title of earl; and though the Danes, who peopled East Anglia and Northumberland, were for some time ruled immediately by their own princes, they all acknowledged a submission to Alfred, and submitted to his superior authority. As equality among subjects is the foundation of a just absolute monarchy, Alfred gave the same laws to the Danes and English, and put them entirely on a like footing in the administration both of civil and criminal justice. The fine for the murder of a Dane was the same with that for the murder of an Englishman; the great symbol of equality in those states. The king, after rebuilding the ruined cities, particularly London, which had been destroyed by the Danes in the reign of Ethelwulf, established a regular militia for the defence of the kingdom, and in case of an attack on his person, he should be armed and registered; he assigned them a regular rotation of duty; he distributed part into the castles and fortresses which he built at proper places; he required another part to take the field on any alarm, and to assemble at stated places of rendezvous; and he left a sufficient number at home, who were employed in the cultivation of the land, and who afterwards took their turn in military service. The whole kingdom was like one great garrison; and the Danes could no sooner appear in one place, than a sufficient number was assembled to oppose them, without leaving the other quarters defenceless or disarmed. But Alfred, sensible that the proper method of subduing an enemy who made incursions by sea, was to meet them on their own element, took care to provide himself with a naval force, which, though the most natural defence of an island, had hitherto been totally neglected by the English. He increased the shipping of his kingdom both in number and strength, and trained his subjects in the practice, as well of sailing as of naval action. He distributed his armed vessels in proper stations around the island, and was sure to meet the Danish ships either before or after they had landed their troops, and to pursue them in all their incursions. Though the Danes might suddenly, by surprise, disembark on the coast, which was generally become desolate by their frequent ravages, they were encountered by the English fleet in their retreat; and escaped not, as formerly, by abandoning their booty, but paid, by their total destruction, the penalty of the disorders which they had raised. In this manner Alfred repelled several invasions of these piratical Danes, and maintained his kingdom, during some years, in safety and tranquillity. A fleet of a hundred and twenty ships of war was stationed upon the coast; and being provided with warlike engines, as well as with expert seamen, both Frisians and English, (for Alfred supplied the defects of his own subjects by engaging able foreigners in his service,) maintained a supe-HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

The Danes had now a certainty, together with the excellent posture of defence established every where, restored full tranquillity in England, and provided for the future security of the government. The East-Anghian and Northumbrian Danes, on the first appearance of Alfred upon the field of battle, were disarmed and dishonoured, and reduced to the condition of mere neutrals.

The merit of this prince, both in private and public life, may with advantage be set in opposition to that of any monarch or citizen which the annals of any age or nation can present to us. The virtues of that perfect character, which, under the denomination of a sage or wise man, philosophers have been fond of delineating, rather as a fiction of their imagination, than in hopes of ever seeing it really existing: so happily were they blended; and so powerfully did each prevent the other from excelling its proper boundaries! He knew how to reconcile the most enterprising spirit with the coolest moderation; the most obstinate perseverance with the easiest facility; the most severe justice with the gentlest lenity; the greatest vigour in commanding with the most perfect affability of deportment; the highest capacity and inclination for science; and that most laudable talent of his countrymen and his military virtues are almost equally the objects of our admiration; excepting only, that the former, being more rare among princes, as well as more useful, seem equal. The Danes well knew that it was not in the sight of the fair ones that his skill should be set in the fairest light, but bestowed on him every bodily accomplishments, either of limbs, dignity of shape and air, with a pleasing, engaging, and open countenance. Fortune alone, by throwing him into that barbarous age, deprived him of historians worthy to transmit his fame to posterity; and we wish to see him delineated in more lasting characters, and with more particular strokes, than we can apprehend. He may at least perceive some of those small specks and blemishes, from which, as a man, it is impossible he could be entirely exempted.

But he should give but an imperfect idea of Alfred's merit, were we to confine our narration to his military exploits, and were not more particular in our account of his institutions for the execution of justice, and of his zeal for the administration of that justice.

After Alfred had subdued, and had settled or expelled, the Danes, he found the kingdom in the most wretched condition; desolated by the ravages of those barbarians, and torn into disorders which were calculated to pervert its misery. Though the great armies of the Danes were broken, the country was full of straggling troops of that nation, who, being accustomed to live by plunder, were become incapable of industry, and who, from the natural ferocity of their manners, indulged themselves in committing violence, even beyond what was requisite to supply their necessities. The English themselves, reduced to the most extreme indigence by these continued depredations, had shaken off the yoke of the life district; for fear of their neighbours, and those who had been plundered to-day, betook themselves next day to the like disorderly life, and, from despair, joined the robbers in pillaging and ruining their fellow-citizens. We must therefore believe that the delivery and activity of Alfred should provide for his own benefit, but it could not without the warrant or certificate from the bonor of the thing to which he belonged.

When any person in any tithing or decennary was guilty of a crime, the bonor of the thing was summoned to answer for him; and if he were not willing to be surety for his apprehension, he was committed to prison, and there detained till his trial. If he fled, before or after finding sureties, the bonor and decennary became liable to inquiry, and were exposed to the penalties of the statute. Thirty-one days were allowed them for producing the criminal; and if that time elapsed without their being able to find him, the bonor, with two other members of the decennary, was obliged to appear, and, together with three chief members of the three neighbouring decennaries, (making twelve in all,) to swear that his decennary was free from all privity both of the crime committed, and of the escape of the criminal. If the bonor could not find such a number to answer for their apprehension, he was committed to prison, and there detained till his trial. He could not be committed to prison, or detained till his trial, and he could not make satisfaction to the king, according to the degree of the offence. By this institution, every man was obliged from his own interest to keep a watchful eye over the conduct of his neighbours, and to exert himself for the behaviour of those who were placed under the division to which he belonged, for these decennaries received the name of frank-pledges.

In the regular distribution of the people, with such a vast confusion in their habitations, may not be necessary in times when men are more inclined to obedience and justice; and it might perhaps be regarded as destructive of liberty and commerce in a polished state; but it was well calculated to reduce that fierce and licentious people under the salutary restraint of law and government. But Alfred took care to temper these rigours by other institutions favourable to the freedom of the citizens; and nothing could be more popular and beloved than his plan of the administration of justice. The bonor summoned together his whole decennary to assist him in deciding any lesser difference which occurred among the members of this small community. In affairs of greater moment, he had an appeal from the decennary, or in controversies arising between members of different decennaries, the cause was brought before the hundred, which consisted of ten decennaries, or a hundred members of the nation, which was regularly assembled once in four weeks for the deciding of causes. Their method of decision desires to be noted, as being the origin of juries; an institution, admirable in itself, and the best calculated for the preservation of liberty and the administration of justice, that ever was devised by the wit of man. Twelve freeholders were chosen; who, having sworn, together with the hundredred, or presiding magistrate of that division, to administer impartial justice, proceeded to the examination of that cause which was submitted to their jurisdiction. And beside these monthly meetings of the hundred, there was an annual meeting, appointed for a more general inspection of the police of the hundred. He was to hear and decide of all the abuses in magistrates, and the obliging of every person to show the decennary in which he was registered. The people, in imitation of their ancestors, the ancient Germans, assembled there, to which the bishop and other men of high estate, or times called a wapentake, and its court served both for the support of military discipline, and for the administration of civil justice.

The first superior court to that of the hundred was the county-court, which met twice a year, after Michaelmas and Easter, and consisted of the freeholders of the county, who possessed an equal vote in the decision of causes. The bishop presided in this court, together with the alderman; and the proper object of the court was the receiving of appeals from the hundreds and decennaries, and the deciding of such controversies as arose between men of different hundred. Formerly, the alderman possessed both the civil and military authority; but Alfred, seeing that this conjunction of powers rendered the nobility dangerous and independent, appointed also a sheriff in each county, who enjoyed a co-ordinate authority with the former in the judicial part of it. He either conducted the meetings of the county, or altered from his guidance, and had them to guard the rights of the crown in the county, and to levy the fines imposed; which in that age formed no contemptible part of the public revenue.

There lay an appeal against orders of the county-court, from all these courts to the king himself in council; and as the people sensible of the equity and great talents of Alfred, placed their chief confidence in him, he was soon overwhelmed with appeals from all parts of England. He was intolerable in the despatch of these causes; but finding that his time must be entirely engrossed by this branch of duty, he resolved to obviate the inconvenience, by correcting the ignorance or corruption of the inferior magistrates, from which it arose. He took care to have his nobility instructed in letters and the laws. He chose the earls and sheriffs from among the men most celebrated for probity and knowledge. He punished severely all malversation in his officers. And on the other hand, he endeavoured to make satisfaction to the king, according to the degree of the offence. By this institution, every man was obliged from his own interest to keep a watchful eye over the conduct of his neighbours, and to exert himself for the behaviour of those who were placed under the division to which he belonged; for these decennaries received the name of frank-pledges.

The regular distribution of the people, with such a vast confusion in their habitations, may not be necessary in times when men are more inclined to obedience and justice; and it might perhaps be regarded as destructive similarity of these institutions to the customs of the ancient Germans, to the practice of the other northern conquerors, and to the Saxon laws during the Heptarchy, prevents us from regarding Alfred as the sole author of this plan of government; and leads us rather to think, that, like a wise man, he contented himself with reforming, extending, and executing the institutions which he found previously established. But, on the whole, such success attended his legislative exertions, that during his lifetime he suddenly met face to face in England robbery and iniquity, which invited the vigour of justice, this great prince preserved the most sacred regard to the liberty of his people; and it is a memorable sentiment preserved in his will, That it was just the English should for ever remain as free as their own thoughts.

As good morals and knowledge are almost inseparable in every age, though not in every individual, the care of Alfred for the encouragement of learning among his subjects was another useful branch of his legislation, and tended to reclaim the English from their former disordinate and ferocious manners; but the king was guided in this pursuit, less by political views, than by his natural bent and passions. When he came to the throne, he found the nation sunk into the grossest ignorance and barbarism, proceeding from the continued disorders in the government, and from the ravages of the Danes: the monarch, with energy, the monarch; the minister, with seized, their libraries burnt; and thus the only seats of education in those ages were totally subverted. Alfred himself complained, that on his accession he knew not one person, south of the Thames, who could so much as interpret the English service; and very few, in the northern parts, who had reached even that pitch of erudition. But this prince invited over the most celebrated scholars from all parts of Europe; he established schools every where for the insurrection of the young; he issued a most generous grant to the university of Oxford, and endowed it with many privileges, revenues, and immunities; he enjoined by law all freeholders possessed of two hides of land or more, to send their children to school for their instruction; he gave preferment both in church and state to such only as had made some proficiency in knowledge; and by all these experited he had the satisfaction, before his death, to see a great class in the face of affluence and in a work of his, which was still extant, he congratulates himself on the progress which learning, under his patronage, had already made in England.

The most effectual expedient employed by Alfred,
for the encouragement of learning, was his own example, and the constant assiduity with which, notwithstanding the multiplicity and urgency of his affairs, he employed himself in the pursuits of knowledge. He usually divided his life into three equal portions: one was employed in sleep; the other in the reflection of his body by diet and exercise; another in the business of business; a third in study and devotion; and that he might more exactly measure the hours, he made use of burning tapers of equal length, which he fixed in lindnors; an expedient suited to that rude age, when the guidance of dialling, and the mechanism of clocks and watches, were totally unknown. And by such a regular distribution of his time, though he often laboured under great bodily infirmities, this martial hero, who fought in person sixty-six battles by sea and land, was able, during a life of no extraordinary length, to acquire more knowledge, and ripest letters, of that part of the world than most of notable men, though blessed with the greatest luxury and ap-lithe, have, in more fortunate ages, made the object of their uninterrupted industry.

And that the people, at all times, especially, when their undertakings were obstructed by ignorance and bad education, are not so much susceptible of speculative instruction, Alfred endeavoured to convey his morality by apolo-gues, parables, stories, apothegms, couched in poetry; and besides propagating among his subjects former compositions of that kind, which he found in the Saxon tongue, he exercised his genius in inventing works of a like nature, as well as in translating from the Greek the elegant fables of Aesop. He also gave Saxon translations of Orosius's and Bede's histories; and of Bethius con-cremated. And he deemed it nowise derogatory from his other great characters of sovereign, legislator, warrior, and politician, thus to lead the way to his people in the pursuits of literature.

Meanwhile, this prince was not negligent in encouraging the events were touched with mechanical talent, in a more sensible, though not a closer, connexion with the interests of society. He invited, from all quarters, industrious foreigners to populate his country, which had been desolated by the ravages of the Danes. He introduced and encouraged manufactures of all kinds; and no inventor or improver of any ingenious art did he suffer to go unrewarded. He prompted men of activity to betake themselves to navigation, to push commerce into the most remote countries, and to acquire riches by propagating industry among their fellow-citizens. He set apart a seventh portion of his own revenue for maintaining a number of workmen in the several arts, especially of shipbuilding; which, in the ruined cities, castles, palaces, and monasteries

Even the elegances of life were brought to him from the Medi-Danean and the Indies; and his subjects, by these means, were taught to revere the virtues of justice and industry, from which alone they could arise. Both living and dead, Alfred was regarded by foreigners, no less than by his own subjects, as the greatest prince after Charles-magne that had appeared in Europe during several ages, and one of the wisest and best that had ever adorned the annals of any nation.

Alfred had, by his wife, Ethelwitha, daughter of a Merpec earl, three sons and three daughters. The eldest son, Edward, succeeded to his power; and passes by the appellation of Edward the Elder, being the first of that name who sat on the English throne.

EDWARD THE ELDER.
This prince, who equalled his father in military talents, though inferior to him in knowledge and erudition, found, immediately on his accession, a specimen of the political and social life to which all princes and even all individuals were exposed, in an age when men, less restrained by law or justice, and less occupied by industry, had no aliment for their iniquity, but wars, insurrections, revolutions, rapine, and despotism. Ethelred, his cousin-german, son of King Ethelbert, the elder brother of Alfred, insisted on his preferable title; and arming his partisans, took possession of Wincheste, where he seemed determined to defend himself to the last extremity, and to await the issue of his pretensions. But when the king approached the town with a great army, Ethelred, having the prospect of certain destruction, made his escape, and fled first into Normandy, and afterwards into Northumberland; when he rid of the people who had been recently subdued by Alfred, and who were impatient of peace, would, on the intelligence of that great prince's death, seize the first pretense or opportunity of rebellion. The employed in rebuilding his expectations: the Northumbrians declared for him; and Ethelred having thus connected his interests with the Danes, brought them beyond sea, and collected a body of these freebooters, he excited the hope of all those who had been long accustomed to submit to the yoke of Cnut, and burgers, who were seated in the heart of Mercia, began to put themselves in motion; and the English found that they were again menaced with those convulsions, from which the valour and policy of Alfred had so lately rescued them. The rebels, headed by Ethelwald, made an incursion into the counties of Gloucester, Oxford, and Wilts; and having exercised their ravages in these places, they retired with the booty, four thousand assemblage of men, who, able to approach them. Edward, however, who was determined that his preparations should not be fruitless, conducted his forces into East Anglia, and retaliated the injuries which the inhabitants had committed, by spreading the report of his preparations with reverse, and loaded with booty, he gave orders to retire: but the authority of those ancient kings, which was feebly in peace, was not much better established in the field; and the Kentish men, greedy of more spoil, ventured, contrary to repeated orders, to stay behind him, and to take up their quarters in Bury. This disobedience proved in the issue fortunate to Edward. The Danes assaulted the Kentish men; but met with so vigorous a resistance, that, though they gained the field of battle, they bought that advantage by the loss of their bravest leaders, and among the rest, by that of Ethelwald, who perished in the action. The king, from the fear of so dangerous a confederacy, must not, he thought, adventure with any concourse to the assistance of the Angles.

In order to restore England to such a state of tranquillity as it was then capable of attaining, nought was wanting but the subjection of the Northumbrians, who, according to the custom of their country, had supported the factions of the kingdom. The Danes, however, inveterate enemies of the English, continued with vigour to prosecute the cause; and their arms forced the invader to leave the island. The Northumbrians, to be the more easy and assiduous in serving him, might be represented as once inhabiting the bowels of the kingdom. Edward, in order to divert the force of these enemies, prepared a fleet to attack them by sea; hoping that, when his ships appeared on their coast, they must at least remain at home, to interfere in their defence. But the Northumbrians were less anxious to secure their own property, than greedy to commit spoil on their enemies; and concluding that the chief strength of the Danes was in their numbers, and what they had bought the opportunity favourable, and entered Edward's territories with all their forces. The king, who was prepared against this attack, attacked them on their return at Tetenhall, in the county of Stafford, put them to rout, recovered all the booty, and pursued them with great slaughter into their own country.

All the rest of Edward's reign was a scene of continued and successful action against the Northumbrians, the East Angles, the Five-burgers, and the foreign Danes who invaded him from Normandy and Brittany. Nor was he less provident in putting his kingdom in a posture of defence, than vigorous in assaulting the enemy. He fortified the town of Chester, which he was wont to call the city of Buckingham, Towcester, Maldon, Huntingdon, and Colchester. He fought two signal battles at Tensford and Maldon. He vanquished Thorkettill, a great Danish chief, and engaged, for the present, the dominion of that province: several tribes of the Britons were subjected by him; and even the Scots, who, during the reign of Egbert, had, under the conduct of Kenneth, their king, increased their power by the final success of the Picts, were nevertheless obliged to give him marks of submission. In all these fortunate achievements he was assisted by the activity and prudence of his sister Ethelfleda, who was widow of Ethelbert, Earl of Mercia, and, united with her husband's death, relented the government of that province. This princess, who had been reduced to extremity in child-bed, refused afterwards all commerce with her husband; not from any weak supposition, and reduced him to a state of degradation, which her own enemies thought unmerited of her masculine and ambitious spirit. She died before her brother; and Edward, during the remainder of his reign, took upon himself the immediate government of Mercia, which became... and animosities have place; and on that account, the Scotch historians, who, without having any more knowledge of the matter, strenuously deny the fact, seem more worthy of belief.

Constantine, whether he owed the retaining of his crown to the moderation of Athelstan, who was unwilling to employ all his advantages against him, or to the policy of that prince, who esteemed the humiliation of an enemy a ground for treating the subject than the subject of a discountenance and mutuous people, thought the behaviour of the English monarch more an object of resentment than of gratitude. He entered into a confederacy with Anlaf, who had been driven before that prince and his nobles during their recent stay, and contending for his forces, met the enemy near Brunsburh, in Northumberland, and defeated them in a general engagement. This victory was chiefly ascribed to the valor of Turketul, the English chancellor; for in those turbulent ages no one was so much occupied in civil employments, as wholly to lay aside the military character.

There is a circumstance not unworthy of notice, which his historians relate to the transactions of that war. Anlaf, on the approach of the English army, thought that he could not venture too much to ensure a fortunate event; and, employing the artifice formerly practised by Alfred against the Danes, he entered the enemy's camp in the night. The triumphant was for that time present attended with like success. He gave such satisfaction to the soldiers who flocked about him, that they introduced him to the king's tent; and Anlaf, having placed before that prince and his nobles during their recent stay, and contending for his forces, met the enemy near Brunsburh, in Northumberland, and defeated them in a general engagement. This victory was chiefly ascribed to the valor of Turketul, the English chancellor; for in those turbulent ages no one was so much occupied in civil employments, as wholly to lay aside the military character. He regarded this last action as a full proof of Anlaf's disingenuousness; and he immediately carried the intelligence to Athelstan, who blamed him for not sooner giving him information, that he might have seized his enemy. But the soldier told him, that, as he had formerly sworn fealty to Anlaf, he could never have pardoned himself the treachery of betraying and ruining his ancient master; and that Athelstan himself, after such an instance of his criminal conduct, had equal reason to distrust his allegiance. Athelstan, having praised the generosity of the soldier's principles, reflected on the incident, which he foresaw might be attended with important consequences. He removed his station to the enemy's camp; and as a bishop arrived that evening with a reinforcement of troops, for the ecclesiastics were then no less warlike than the civil magistrates, he occupied with his train that very place which had been left vacant by the king's removal. The presence of Athelstan was found prudent; for no sooner had darkness fallen, than Anlaf broke into the camp, and hastening directly to the place where he had left the king's tent, put the bishop to death before he had time to prepare for his defence.

There fell several Danish and Welsh princes in the action of Brunsburh; and Constantine and Anlaf made their escape with difficulty, leaving the greater part of their army on the field of battle. After this success, Athelstan enjoyed his crown in tranquility; and he is regarded as one of the ablest and most active of those ancient princes. He passed a remarkable law, which was calculated to encourage the courage of the commoners, and which it required some liberality of mind in that age to have devised; That a merchant, who had made three long voyages on his own account, should be admitted to the rank of a thane or gentleman. This prince died at Dunstan in the year 941, after a reign of sixteen years, and was succeeded by Edmund his legitimate brother.

EDMUND.

Edmund, on his accession, met with disturbances from the restless Northumbrians, who lay in wait for every opportunity of breaking into rebellion. But that more easily than ever he could before, he so overawed the rebels, that they endeavoured to appease him by the most humble submissions. In order to give him the sure pledge of their obedience, they offered to embrace any condition he should impose upon them. The English Danes had frequently professed, when reduced to difficulties, but which, for that very reason, they regarded as a badge of servitude, and shook off as soon as a favourable opportunity offered. Edmund, trusting little to their sincerity in this forced submission, used the precaution of removing the Five-burgers from the towns of Mercia, in which they had been allowed to settle; because it was always found, that they took advantage of every commotion, and introduced the rebellions or foreign Danes into the heart of the kingdom. He also conquered Cumberland from the Britons; and conferred that territory on Malcolm, King of Alkestan, and added, condition that he should do him homage for it, and protect the north from all future incursions of the Danes.

Edmund was young when he came to the crown; yet was his reign short, as his death was violent. One day, as he was solemnizing a festival in the county of Glastonbury, he remarked, that Leof, a notorious robber, whom he had sentenced to banishment, had yet the boldness to enter the hall where he himself dined, and to sit at table with his attendants. Enraged at this insolence, he ordered him to leave the room; but on his refusing to obey, the king, whose temper, naturally choleric, was inflamed by this additional insult, leaped on him himself, and seized him by the hair. The robber, in a fit of rage, drew his dagger, and gave Edmund a wound, of which he immediately expired. This event happened in the year 946, and in the sixth year of the king's reign. Edmund left male issue, but regal, trusting little to their sincerity in this forced submission, used the precaution of removing the Five-burgers from the towns of Mercia, in which they had been allowed to settle; because it was always found, that they took advantage of every commotion, and introduced the rebellions or foreign Danes into the heart of the kingdom. He also conquered Cumberland from the Britons; and conferred that territory on Malcolm, King of Alkestan, and added, condition that he should do him homage for it, and protect the north from all future incursions of the Danes.

EDRED.

The reign of this prince, as those of his predecessors, was disturbed by the rebellions and incursions of the Northumbrian Danes, who, though frequently subdued, yet that prince had never paid a sincere allegiance to the crown of England. The accession of a new king seemed to them a favourable opportunity for shaking off the yoke; but on Edred's appearance with an army, they made him their wanted submissions; and the king having wasted the country with fire and sword, as a punishment of their rebellion, obliged them to renew their oaths of allegiance; and he straight retired with his forces. The obedience of the Danes lasted no longer than the present terror. Provoked at the devastations of Edred, and even reduced by necessity to subist on plunder, they broke into a new rebellion, and were again subdued. But the king, now instructed by experience, took greater precautions against their future revolt. He fixed English garrisons in their most considerable towns; and placed over them an English governor, who might watch all their motions, and suppress any insurrection on its first appearance. He obliged also Malcolm, King of Scotland, to renew his homage for the lands which he held in England.

Edred, though not warlike, nor fit for active life by any account of his constitution, he blindly delivered over his conscience to the guidance of Dunstan, commonly called St. Dunstan, Abbot of Glastonbury, whom he advanced to the highest offices, and who covered, under the appearance of sanctity, the most violent and most insolent ambition. Taking advantage of the implicit confidence reposed in him by the king, this churchman imported into England a new order of monks, who much changed the state of ecclesiastical affairs, and even in their first establishment, the most violent com-

From the introduction of Christianity among the Saxons, there had been monasteries in England; and these establabishments had extremely multiplied, by the donations of the princes and nobles; whose superstition, derived from their ignorance and precarious life, and increased by remorse for the crimes into which they were so frequently betrayed, perceived that their Deity was a profuse liberality towards the ecclesiastics. But the monks had hitherto been a species of secular priests, who lived after the manner of the present canons or precentors, and were both intermingled, in some degree, with the world, and endeavoured to be useful to it. They were employed in the education of youth: they had the disposal of their own time and industry; they were not subjected to the rigid rules of an order, at one time, deprived of marriage; a fortunate policy, but at the same time an undertaking the most difficult of any, since he had the strongest propensities of human nature to encounter, and found, that the same contrivances, which in an ecclesiastic, or monkish life, were here disadvantageous to the success of his project. It is no wonder, therefore, that this master-stroke of art should have met with violent contradiction, and that the interests of the sober, in the institutions of the priests, being now placed in this singular opposition, should, notwithstanding the continued efforts of Rome, have retarded the execution of that bold scheme, during the course of near three centuries. As the bishops and parochial clergy lived apart with their families, and were more connected with the world, the hopes of success with them were fainter; and the present for making them renounce marriage was much less plausible. But the pope, having cast his eye on the monks at the basis of his authority, was determined to reduce them under strict rules of obedience, to procure them the credit of sanctity by an appearance of the most rigid mortifications, which might interfere with his spiritual policy. Under pretences, therefore, of reforming abuses, which were, in some degree, unavoidable in the ancient establishments, he had already reduced to the sober, in the ecclesiastics of Europe, some severe laws of the monastic life, and began to form attempts towards a like innovation in England. The favourable opportunity offered itself, and (it was greedily seized,) arising from and based upon St. Aidan, and St. Edfil, and the violent impetuous character of Dunstan.

Dunstan was born of noble parents in the west of England; and being educated under his uncle Aldhelm, then Archbishop of Canterbury, had betaken himself to the ecclesiastical life, and had acquired some character in the court of Edmund. He was, however, represented to him as a prince as a man of licentious manners; and finding his fortune blasted by these suspicions, his ardent ambition prompted him to repair his indiscretions by running into excesses opposite. He excluded himself entirely from the world; he framed a cell so small, that he could neither stand erect in it, nor stretch out his limbs during his repose; and he here employed himself perpetually either in devotion or in meditation. It was at this time that his head became gradually crazed by these solitary occupations, and that his head was filled with chimeras, which being beheld by himself and his stupid vassals, procured him the general character of madness among the people. He feared that the devil, among the freest inventions which he had paid him, was one day more earnest than usual in his temptations; till Dunstan, provoked at his importunity, seized him by the nose with a pair of red-hot pincers, its heat having done no ill effects, he put his hands so much disposed to work, that, where the malignant spirit made the whole neighbourhood res-sound with his bellowings. This notable exploit was seriously credited and extolled by the public: it is transmitted to posterity, by one of the compilers of the annals, which, as many, may pass for a writer of some elegance; and it insured to Dunstan a reputation which no real purity, much less virtue, could, even in the most enlightened period, have ever acquired with him. Supported by the character obtained in his retreat, Dunstan appeared again in the world; and gained such an ascendant over Edred, who had succeeded to the crown, in the surname of the red-haired, that he was made the director of that religion and science, and, as his counsellor in the most momentous affairs of government. He was placed at the head of the treasury, and being thus possessed both of power at court, and of credit with the people, he was every way a benefactor to his country. Finding that his advancement had been owing to the opinion of his austere, he professed himself a partisan of the rigid monastic rules; and after introducing that reformation into the convents of Glastonbury and Abingdon, he endeavoured to render it universal in the kingdom.

The minds of men were already well prepared for this innovation. The prurses of an inviolable chastity had been carried to the highest extravagance by some of the first preachers of Christianity among the Saxons: the pleasures of love had been represented as incompatible with Christian perfection; and a total abstinence from all carnal gratification was deemed by them a subject of dev-erence, as was sufficient to atone for the greatest enormities. The consequence seemed natural, that those, at least, who officiated at the altar, should be clear of this corruption; and that the clergy and the rest of the people should, in their intercourse with marriage, be still more removed from it; and that the law of the marriage and of the divorce, which was now creeping in, was once fully established, the reverence to the real body of Christ in the eucharist bestowed on this argument an additional force and influence. The monks knew how to avail themselves of all these popular topics, and to set off their own character to the best advantage. They affected the greatest austerity of life and manners; they indulged themselves in the highest degree of luxury, and pretended by the vices and pretended luxury of the age: they were particularly vehement against the dissolute lives of the secular clergy, their rivals: every instance of libertinism in any individual of that order was represented as a general corruption: and when a particular case was brought to the notice wanting, their marriage became a sure subject of invective, and their wives received the name of concubine, or other more opprobrious appellation. The secular clergy on the other hand, whilst they were not the more licentious, and practitioners of the ecclesiastical dignities, defended themselves with vigour, and endeavoured to retaliate upon their adversaries. The people were thrown into agitation; and few instances occur of more violent disputes between the most most different classes in religion, or rather by the most frivolous; since it is a just remark, that the more affinity there is between theological parties, the greater community is their animosity.

The progress of the monks, which was become considerable, was somewhat retarded by the death of Edred, their partisan, who expired after a reign of nine years. " He left children; but as they were infants, his nephew, Edwy, son of Edmund, was placed on the throne.

EDWY.

A.D. 953.

Edwy, at the time of his accession, was not above sixteen or seventeen years of age, was possessed of the most amiable figure, and was even endued, according to authentic accounts, with the most promising virtues. He would have been the favourite of his people, had he not unhappily, at the commencement of his reign, been engaged in a controversy with the monks, whose rage, neither the graces of the body nor virtues of the mind could mitigate, and who have pursued his memory with the same unrelenting vengeance which they exercised against his person and dignity during his short and unfortunate reign. There was a beautiful princess of the royal blood, called Elgiva, who had made impression on the tender heart of Edwy; and as she was of an age when the force of the passions first begins to be felt, he had ventured, contrary to the advice of his gravest counsellors, and the remonstrances of the more discreet, to espouse her; though she was within the degrees of affinity prohibited by the canon law. As the austerity affected by the monks made them particularly violent on this occasion, Edwy entertained a strong apprehension against them; and seemed, on that account, determined not to second their project of expelling the seculars from all the convents, and of possessing themselves of those rich establishments. War was therefore declared between the king and the monks; and the former, by the reason of his age, and the smallness of his retinue, was without powerful enemies. On the day of his coronation, his nobility were assembled in a great hall, and were indulging themselves in that riot and disorder, which, from the example of their German ancestors, had become habitual to the English; when Edwy, affected by softer pleasures, retired into the queen's apartment, and in that privacy gave reins to his fondness towards his wife, which was only checked by the presence of her mother. Dunstan conjectured the reason of the king's retreat; and carrying along with him Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury, over whom he had gained an absolute and undisputed ascendancy, he espied the young prince with his lasciviousness, probably bestowed on the queen, the most opprobrious epithet that can be applied to her sex, and taming her from her arms, pushed him back, in a disgraceful manner, into the bosom of the nunnery. Edwy, alarmed, and reproved by the people, found an opportunity of taking revenge for this public insult. He questioned Dunstan concerning the administration of the treasury during the reign of his predecessor; and when that minister refused to give any account of money expended, as he affirmed, by orders of the late king, he accused him of malversation in his office, and banished him from the kingdom. But Dunstan's casel was not inactive during his absence: they filled the public with high panegyrics on his sanctity: they exclaimed against the impurity of the king and queen; and having poisoned the minds of the people by these declamations, they proceeded to still more outrageous acts of violence against the royal authority. Archbishop Odo sent into the palace a party of soldiers, who seized the queen; and having burned her face with a red-hot iron, in order to destroy that fatal beauty which had seduced Edwy, they carried her by force into Ireland, there to remain in perpetual exile. Edwy, finding it in vain to resist, was obliged to consent to his divorce, which was pronounced by Odo; and the unhappy Edgiva was left behind with the unhappy Elgiva. That amiable princess, being cursed of her wounds, and having even obliterated the scars with which Odo had hoped to deface her beauty, returned into England, and was looking to the embraces of the king, whom she still regarded as her husband; when she fell into the hands of a party, whom the primate had sent to intercept her. Nothing but her death could now give security to Odo and the monks; and the most cruel death was requisite to extirpate their vengeance. She was harried and starved; and expired a few days after at Gloucester, in the most acute torments.

The English, blinded with superstition, instead of being shocked with this inhumanity, exclaimed that the misfortunes of Edwy and his consort were a just judgment for their dissolute contempt of the ecclesiastical statutes. They even proceeded to rebellion against their sovereign; and having invested Edwy at their head, the young princess, Edwy, a boy of thirteen years of age, they soon put him in possession of Mercia, Northumberland, East Anglia; and chased Edwy into the southern counties. That it might be a greater assistance to his revolt, Dunstan undertook, Dunstan returned into England, and intrusted upon him the government of Edgar and his party. He was first installed in the see of Worcester, then in that of London, and, on Odo's death, and the violent expulsion of Brithefuld, his successor, in that of Bath, which he left untainted by any which he long kept possession. Odo is transmitted to us by the monks under the character of a man of piety; Dunstan was even canonized; and is one of those numerous saints that popery has assumed to promise eternal felicity to the souls of the pious.

Meanwhile the unhappy Edwy was excommunicated, and pursued with unrelenting vengeance; but his death, which happened soon after, freed his enemies from all further inequities, and gave Edgar peaceable possession of the government.

EDGAR.

This prince, who mounted the throne in such early youth, soon discovered an excellent capacity in the administration of affairs; and his reign is one of the most fortunate periods in the history of a brilliant English history. He shewed no avarice to war; he kept the wisest preparations against invaders; and by this vigour and foresight he was enabled, without any danger of suffering insults, to indulge his inclination towards peace, and to employ himself in supporting and maintaining the power and government of his kingdom. He maintained a body of disciplined troops; which he quartered in the north, in order to keep the mutinous Northumbrians in subjection, and to repel the incursions of the Scots. He built and supported a powerful navy; and that he might retain the seamen in the practice of their duty, and always present a formidable armament to his enemies, he stationed three squadrons on the coast, and ordered them to make, from time to time, the circuit of his dominions. The foreign Danes dared not to approach a country which appeared in such a posture of defence: the domestic Danes saw inevitable destruction to be the consequence of their tumults and

In there was no uniform contract in his will, which owed to some circumstances in the story of Elgiva and Edwy. It is said that Elgiva died after the death of Edwy. This is Dr. F. 1067. Edwy, and had a daughter by him, who was born during his reign. He was called the child of a woman who married him, though within the degrees prohibited by the canon law. It is true, he had a daughter by a woman of the name of Edwy, and that the baby was afterwards treated with the singular bashfulness observed in all children in cases of this sort. But it is not certain how she call her husband, not his wife, as she is said to be at Walthambury. But this difference is easily reconciled: for if Edwy married his contrary to the canon, the monks would be sure to depop prox to her, and would insist that she could not be nothing, but a perfect woman. Therefore, while we may esteem this representation of the matter as certain, at least, as far as to faith and custom, if it is true, in Walthambury, Edwy and Elgiva, when they were married, within the degrees prohibited by the canon law. It is true, he had a daughter by a woman of the name of Edwy, and that the baby was afterwards treated with the singular bashfulness observed in all children in cases of this sort. But it is not certain how she called her husband, not his wife, as she is said to be at Walthambury. But this difference is easily reconciled: for if Edwy married his contrary to the canon, the monks would be sure to depop insurrections: the neighbouring sovereigns, the King of Scotland, the Prince of Wales, of the Isle of Man, of the Orkneys, and even of Ireland, were reduced to pay submission to so formidable a monarch. He carried his supernatural and more immediate power so far that his enemies, and indeed all men, were so far afraid of his power as to venture combination against him, had not his power been so well established as to deprive his enemies of all hopes of killing it. As, that residing once at Chester, and having purposed to go by water to the Abbey of St. John in the city, he alighted eight of his ministerial princes to row him in a barge upon the Dee. The English historians are fond of mentioning the name of Reineth III., King of Scots, among the number. The Scottish historians of that day do not mention it; and even, after ever he acknowledged himself a vassal to Edgar, did him homage, not for his crown, but for the dominions which he held in England.

But the chief means by which Edgar maintained his authority, and preserved public peace, was the paying of court to Dunstan, and the monks who had at first placed him on the throne, and who, by their pretensions to superior sanctity and purity of manners, had acquired an ascendant over the people. He favoured their scheme for dispossessing the secular canons of all the monasteries; he bestowed prebend upon none but their prelates; he allowed Dunstan to resign the see of Worcester into the hands of Abbot Edbelswold, and to transfer the Commission of his court to Abbot Edbelswold, another of them, in that of Winchester; he consulted these prelates in the administration of all ecclesiastical, and even in that of many civil affairs; and authorised his offices of rod and sceptre to be performed by them, and, not being implicitly guided by them, the king and the bishops found such advantages in their mutual agreement, that they always acted in concert, and united their influence in presenting the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom.

In order to place the great work of the reformation in the new order of monks in all the convents, Edgar summoned a general council of the prelates and the heads of the religious orders. He here inveighed against the dissolute lives of the secular clergy, and the smallness of their stations, which, it is probable, maintained no longer any resemblance to the crown of thorns; their negligence in attending the exercise of their function; their mixing with the lusty in the pleasures of gaming, hunting, dancing, and singing; and their openly living with concubines, by which it is commonly supposed he meant their wives. He then turned himself to Dunstan, the privy; and in the manner of King Edred, whom he supposed to look down from heaven with indignation against all those enormities, he addressed him; "It is you, Dunstan, by whose advice I founded monasteries, built churches, and expended my treasure in the support of religion and religious persons in counsel and in the exercises of all my schemes. You were the director of my conscience.
To you I was obedient in all things. When did you call for supplies which I refused you? Was my assistance ever wanting to the poor? Did I deny support and establishments to the clergy and the convents? Did I not hearken to your instructions, who told me that these charities were, of all others, the most grateful to my Makers, and fixed a perpetual fund for the support of religion? And are all our pious endeavours now frustrated by the dissolute lives of the priests? Not that I throw any blame on you. You have reason, besought, united, inveighed; but it now behoves you to use sharper and more vigorous remedies; and conjuring your spiritual authority with the civil power, to purge effect-ally the temple of God from thieves and intruders." It is easy to imagine, that this harangue had the desired effect; and that when the king and prelates thus concurred with the popular prejudices, it was not long before the monks prevailed, and established their new discipline without all the convicts.

We may remark, that the declamations against the secular clergy are, both here and in all the historians, conveyed in general terms; and as that order of men are commonly restrained by the decency of their character, it is difficult to believe that the complaints against their dissolute manners could be so universal as is intended.
It is more probable that the monks paid court to the populace by an affected austerity of life; and representing the most innocent liberties, taken by the other orders, as gross enormities, they may have prepared the way for the increase of their own power and influence. Edgar, however, like a true politician, concerned with the prevailing party; and he even indulged them in pretensions, which, though they might, when complied with, engage the monks to support royal authority during his own reign, proved afterwards dangerous to his successors, and gave disturbance to the whole civil power. He seconded the policy of the court of Rome, in granting to some monasteries an exemption from episcopal jurisdiction. He allowed the convents, even those of royal foundation, to usurp the election of their own abbots; and he admitted their forgeries of ancient charters, by which, from the pretended grant of former kings, they assumed many privileges and immunities. These merits of Edgar have procured him the highest panegyrics from the monks, and he is transmitted to us, not only under the character of a consummate statesman and an active prince, but also of an enlightened and moderate monarch, who, being justly, but not unjustly, considered as basing such eulogies on his piety, than the usual tenor of his conduct, which was licentious to the highest degree, and violated every law, human and divine. Yet these very monks, who, as we are told by Ingulf, a very strict historian, had no idea of any moral or religious merit, except chastity and obedience, not only connived at his e Normandies, but loaded him with the greatest praises.
History, however, has preserved some instances of his acts, from which, as from a specimen, we may form a courage of the rest.

Edgar broke into a convent, carried off Editha, a nun, by force, and even committed violence on her person. For this act of sacrilege he was reprimanded by Dunstan; and that he might reconcile himself to the church, he was obliged, not to separate from his mistress, but to abstain from wearing her crown during seven years, and to deprive himself so long of that vain ornament; a punishment very unequal to that which had been inflicted on the unfortunate Edwy, who, for a marriage which, in the strictest sense, could only deserve the name of irregular, was expelled his kingdom, and even trodden to the dust by a regular barbarity, was loaded with calumnies, and has been represented to us under the most odious colours.
Such is the ascendant which may be attained, by hypocrisy and cabal, over mankind.

There was another mistress of Edgar's, with whom he first formed a connexion by a kind of accident. Passing one day by Andover, he lodged in the house of a nobleman, whose daughter, being endowed with all the graces of person and behaviour, inflamed him at first sight with the highest desire; and he resolved by any expedient to gratify it. As he had not leisure to employ courtship or address for attaining his purpose, he went directly to her mother, declared his sentiments, and told her that the young lady might be allowed to pass that very night with him. The mother was a woman of virtue, and determined not to dishonour her daughter and her family by compliance; but being well acquainted with the petulancy of the King's temper, she thought it would be easier, as well as safer, to deceive than refuse him. She feigned therefore a submission to his will: but secretly ordered a waiting-maid, of no disgraceful figure, to steal into the king's bed, after all the company should be retired to rest. In the morning, before day-break, the damsel, agreeably to the injunctions of her mistress, offered to retire; but Edgar, who had no reserve in his pleasures, and whose love to his bed-fellow was rather inflamed by enjoyment, consented, and employed force and entreaties to detain her. Elfrida, (for that was the name of the maid,) trusting to her own charms, and to the love with which, she hoped, she had now inspired the king, made a fruitless attempt to conclude the return; but, at length, discovered the deceit to Edgar. He had passed a night so much to his satisfaction, that he expressed no displeasure with the old lady on account of her fraud; but love was transferred to Elfrida; she became his favourite mistress; and maintained her ascendancy over him till his marriage with Elfrida.

The circumstances of his marriage with this lady were more singular and more criminal. Elfrida was daughter and heiress of Otho, Earl of Devonshire; and though she had been educated in the country, and had never appeared at court, she had filled all England with the reputation of her beauty. Edgar himself, who was indifferent to no accounts of this nature, found her curiosity excited by the frequent panegyrics which he heard of Elfrida; and reflecting on her noble birth, he resolved, if he found her charms answerable to their fame, to obtain possession of her person. He communicated his intention to Earl Athelwold, his favourite; but used the precaution, before he made any advances to her parents, to order that nobleman, on some pretence, to pay them a visit, and to bring him a certain account of the beauty of the lady. Athelwold, when he received this intelligence, found general report to have fallen short of the truth; and being actuated by the most vehement love, he determined to sacrifice to this new passion his fidelity to his master, and to the trust reposed in him. He returned to Edgar, and told him, that the riches alone, and high quality of Elfrida, had been the ground of the admiration paid her, and that her charms, far from being anywise exaggerated, had been overestimated in a woman's inferior station. When he had, by this deceit, diverted the king from his purpose, he took an opportunity, after some interval, of turning again the conversation on Elfrida; he remarked, that though the parentage and fortune of the lady had not produced on him, as on others, any illusion with regard to her beauty, he could not forbear reflecting, that she would, on the whole, be an advantageous match for him, and might, by her birth and riches, make him the most contented for the happiness of her person. If the king, therefore, gave his approbation, he was determined to make proposals in his own behalf to the Earl of Devonshire, and doubted not of obtaining the young lady consent to the marriage. Edgar, pleased with an expedient for establishing his favourite's fortune, not only exhorted him to execute his purpose, but forwarded his success by his recommendations to the parents of Elfrida; and Athelwold was soon made happy in the possession of his mistress. Dreading, however, the detection of the artifice, he employed every pretence for detaining Elfrida in the country, and for keeping her at a distance from Edgar.

The violent passion of Athelwold had rendered him blind to the necessary consequences which must attend his conduct, and the advantages which the numerous enemies that always pursue a royal favourite, would, by its marriage, produce. He made him the most respectable of all the other nobility, and informed of the truth; but before he would execute vengeance on Athelwold's treachery, he resolved to satisfy himself with his own eyes of the certainty and full extent of the fraud, and he was induced to pay him a visit in his castle, and be introduced to the acquaintance of his new-married wife; and Athelwold, as he could not refuse the honour, only craved leave to go before him a few hours, that he might the better prepare every thing for his reception. He then discovered to the whole matter to Elfrida; and begged her, if she had any regard, either to her own honour or his life, to conceal from Edgar, by every circumstance of dress and behaviour, that fatal beauty, which had seduced him from fidelity to his friend, and had betrayed him into so many falsehoods. Elfrida promised compliance, though nothing was further from her intentions. She deceived him in his wish to Athelwold for a passion which had deprived her of a crown; and knowing the force of her own charms, she did not despair even of reaching that dignity, of which her husband's artifice had deprived her. She appeared before the king with all the advantages which the richest attire and the most engaging air could bestow upon her, and she excited at once in his bosom the highest love towards herself, and the most famous desire of revenge against Athelwold. The Earl had learned to entertain with these passions; and seducing Athelwold into a wood, on pretence of hunting, he stabbed him with his own hand, and soon after publicly espoused Elfrida.

Before we concludes our account of this reign, we must mention two circumstances, which are remarked by historians. The reputation of Edgar allured a great number of foreigners to visit his court; and he gave them encouragement to settle in England. We are told that they imported all the vices of their respective countries, and contributed to corrupt the simple manners of the nature. But as the simplicity of manners, so luckily and often so perniciously, extends itself by the force of tradition, we may account for the many brutal and servile manners to which islanders are often subject.

Another remarkable incident of this reign was the extirpation of wolves from England. This advantage was attained by the industrious policy of Edgar. He took great pains in hunting and pursuing those ravenous animals; and when he found that all that escaped him had taken shelter in the mountains and forests of Wales, he changed his expedience. He then invited the Prince of Wales, Athelstan, his predecessor, into an annual tribute of three hundred heads of wolves; which produced such diligence in hunting them, that the animal has been no more seen in this island.

Edgar died after a reign of sixteen years, and in the thirty-third of his age. He was succeeded by Edward, whom he had by his first marriage with the daughter of Earl Ordmer.

EDWARD THE MARTYR.

The succession of this prince, who was only A.D. 907. fifteen years of age at his father's death, did not take place without much difficulty and opposition. Elfrida, his step-mother, had a son, Ethelred, seven years old, whom she attempted to raise to the throne: she affirmed that Edgar's marriage with the mother of Edward was exposed to insuperable objections; and as she had possessed great credit with her husband, she had found means to acquire partisans, who seconded all her pretensions. But the title of Edward was supported by many advantages. He was appointed successor by the will of his father; he was approaching to man's estate, and might soon be able to take into his own hands the reins of government; the principal nobility, dreading the impious temerity of Ethelred, were averting their countenances from him; his aunts must enlarge her authority, and probably put her in possession of the regency; above all, Dunstan, whose character of sanctity had given him the highest credit with the people, espoused the cause of Edward, over whom he had already acquired a great ascendancy; and he was determined to execute the will of Edgar in his favour. To cut off all opposite pretensions, Dunstan resolutely animadverted and crowned the young prince at Kingston; and the whole kingdom, without further dispute, submitted to him.

It was of great importance to Dunstan and the monks, to place on the throne a king favourable to their cause; the secular clergy had still partisans in England, who wished to support them in the possession of the convents, and of the ecclesiastical authority. On the first intelligence of Edgar's death, Alfken, Duke of Mercia, espoused the new orders of monks from all the monasteries which lay within his jurisdiction; but Elfwyn, Duke of East Anglia, and Brithnoth, Duke of the East Saxons, protected these within their territories, and insisted on the execution of the late laws enacted in their favour. In order to settle this controversy, there were summoned several synods, which, according to the practice of those times, consisted partly of ecclesiastical members, partly of the lay nobility. The members who were able to prevail in these assemblies; though, as it appears, contrary to the secret wishes, if not of the declared inclination, of the leading men in the nation; they had more invention in forming miracles to support their cause; or, having been so fortunate as to obtain, by their pretended austerities, the character of pietty, their miracles were more credited by the populace.

In one synod, Dunstan, finding the majority of votes against him, rose up and informed the audience, that he had that instant received an immediate revelation on behalf of the monks: the assembly was so astonished at this interjection, that they were soon convinced by the populace that they proceeded no further in their deliberations. In another synod, a voice issued from the crucifix, and informed the members that the establishment of the monks was wrought from their own contrivance, and was being proposed without impolicy. But the miracle performed in the third synod was still more alarming. The floor of the hall in which the assembly met sunk of a sudden, and a great number of the members were either bruised or killed by the fall. It was remarked, that Dunstan had that day prevented the king from attending the synod, and that the beam, on which his own chair stood, was the only one that did not sink under the weight of the assembly. But these appearances, and the other tumults of the synod, which were different on the same contrivance, were regarded as the surest proof of the immediate interposition of Providence, in behalf of those favourites of Heaven.

Elfred lived four years after his accession, and there passed nothing memorable during his reign. His death alone was memorable and tragical. This young prince was endowed with the most amiable innocence of manners; and as his own intentions were always pure, he was capable of entertaining any suspicion against others. Though his step-mother had opposed his succession, and had raised a party in favour of her own son, he always showed himself opposite to her, and showed it more on some occasions, the most tender affection towards his brother. He was hunting one day in Dorsetshire; and being led by the chase near Corfe-castle, where Elfrida resided, he took the opportunity of paying her a visit, unattended by any of his retinue, and be thereby presented her with the opportunity which she had long wished for. After he had mounted his horse, he desired some liquor to be brought him; while he was holding the cup to his head, a servant of Elfrida approached him, and gave him a stab behind. The prince, finding himself wounded, put spurs to his horse; but becoming faint by loss of blood, he fell from the saddle, but stood in the stirrup, and he was dragged along by his unruly horse till he expired. Being tracked by the blood, his body was found, and was privately interred at Wareham by his servants.

The youth and innocence of this prince, with his tragical death, begot such compassion on the populace, that they believed miracles to be wrought at his tomb; and they gave him the appellation of Martyr, though his murder had no connexion with any religious principle or operation. Dunstan, himself, performed many penances, in order to atone for her guilt; but this never, by all her hypocrisy or remorse, recover the good opinion of the public, though so easily deluded in those ignorant ages.

ETHELRED.

CHAP. III.

The freedom which England had so long enjoyed from the depredations of the Danes, seems to have proceeded, partly from the establishments which that piratical nation had obtained in the north of France, and which employed all their superfluous hands to people and maintain them; partly from the vices and worldlike spirit of a long race of English princes, who preserved the kingdom in a posture of defence by sea and land, and either prevented or repelled every attempt of the invaders. But a new generation of men was now spring up in the northern regions, who could no longer drain themselves on Normandy; the English had reason to dread that the Danes would again visit an island to which they were invited, both by the memory of their past successes, and by the expectation of assistance from their countries, who, though long established in the kingdom, were not yet thoroughly incorporated with the natives, nor had enticed them into their invertebrate habits of war and depredation. And as the reigning prince was a minor, and even when he attained to man's estate, never discovered either courage or capacity sufficient to govern his own subjects, which less to repel a formidable enemy, the people must justly apprehend the worst calamities from so dangerous a crisis.

The Danes, before they durst attempt any important enterprise against England, made an inconceivable descent by way of traid, and having landed from seven vessels near Southampton, they ravaged the country, enriched themselves by spoil, and departed with impunity. Six years after, they made a like attempt in another quarter, and having landed from seven vessels near Southampton, they ravaged the country, enriched themselves by spoil, and departed with impunity. vasals, and to the public calamities, which he thought must, in every revolution, render his assistance necessary. Having fixed this resolution, he determined to prevent all such successes as might establish the royal authority, or render his own situation dependent or precarious; and the English had formed the plan of surrounding and destroying the Danish fleet in harbour, he privily informed the enemy of their danger; and when they put to sea, in consequence of this intelligence, he despatched to them, with the squadron under his command, the night before the engagement, and thereby disappointed all the efforts of his countrymen.\(^b\) Ethelred, enraged at his perfidy, seized him, forced his brother to order his forces out of the camp; but his action was not the power of Alife, that he again forced himself into authority; and though he had given this specimen of his character, and received this grievous provocation, it was unnecessary to intract him anew with the government of Mercia. This conduct of the court, which in all its circumstances is so barbarous, weak, and imprudent, both merited and prognosticated the most grievous calamities.

A. D. 973.

The northern invaders, now well acquainted ed with the defenceless condition of England, made a powerful descent under the command of Sweyn, King of Denmark, and Olave, King of Norway; and sailing up the Humber, spread on all sides their destructive frenzy. Lindesay was burned; the Irish, who had retired to the island, was destroyed; and all the Northumbrians, though mostly of Danish descent, were constituted either to join the invaders, or to suffer under their depredations. A powerful armament was prepared to repel the invaders, and a general engagement ensued; but the English were defeated in the battle, from the cowardice or treachery of their three leaders, all of them men of Danish race, Frena, Frithegis, and Godwin, who gave the example of a shameful flight to the troops under their command.

Encouraged by this success, and still more by the contempt with which it inspired for their enemy, the pirates ventured to attack the whole of the kingdom; and entering the Thames in twenty-four vessels, landed siege to London, and threatened it with total destruction. But the citizens, alarmed at the danger, and firmly united among themselves, made a bold defence than the cowardice of the nobility and gentry gave the invaders reason to apprehend; and the besiegers, after suffering the greatest hardships, were finally frustrated in their attempt. In order to revenge themselves, they laid waste Essex, Sussex, and Hampshire; and having there procured horses, they were thereby enabled to spread, through the more inland counties, the fury of their depredations. In this extremity, Ethelred and his nobles had recourse to the former ex- pection, the training of an army; and when two northern kings, they promised them subsistence and tribute, on condition they would, for the present, put an end to their ravages, and soon after depart the kingdom. Sweyn and Olave agreed on these terms, and presently took up their quarters at Southamptou, where the sum of sixteen thousand pounds was paid to them. Olave even made a journey to Andover, where Ethelred resided, and he received the right of confirmation from the English bishops, as well as many rich presents from the king. He here promised that he would never more infringe the English territories; and he faithfully fulfilled the engagement. This prince receives the appellation of St. Olave from the church of Rouen; and notwithstanding the general presumption which lies either against the understanding or morals of every one who in those ignorant ages was dignified with that title, he seems to have been a man of merit and of various Sweyn, though he was always thought less cruel than Olave, was in some measure constrained, upon the departure of the Norwegian prince, to evacuate also the kingdom with all his followers.

A. D. 974.

This composition brought only a short intermission to the ravages of the Danes. The Danish pirates appeared soon after in the Severn; and having committed spoil in Wales, as well as in Cornwall and Devonshire, they sailed round to the south coast, and entering the Thames, completed the devastation of these two counties. They then returned to the Bristol Channel; and penetrating into the country by the Avon, spread themselves over all that neighbourhood, and carried fire and sword even into Dorsetshire. They next changed the seat of war; and after ravaging the Isle of Wight, they entered the Thames and Medway, and laid siege to Rochester, where they defeated the Kentish men in a pitched battle. After this victory, the whole province of Kent was made a scene of slaughter, fire, and devastation. The extremity of these events forced the English into councils for common defence both by sea and land; but the weakness of the king, the divisions among the nobility, the treachery of some, the cowardice of others, and the incapacity of all, put an end to this effort: their fleets and armies either came too late to attack the enemy, or were repulsed with dishonour; and the people were thus equally ruined by resistance or by submission. The English therefore, destitute of both prudence and manuminy in council of courage and conduct in the field, had recourse to the same weak expedient which by experience they had already found so ineffectual; they offered the Danes to buy peace, by paying them a large sum of money. These ravagers rose continually in their demands; and now required the payment of 12,000 pounds, to which the English were so mean and imprudent as to submit.\(^\) The departure of the Danes was procured in this manner; but they made full use of the terms, enjoyed as if it were to be perpetual, without making any effectual preparations for a more vigorous resistance upon the next return of the enemy.

Desiring peace, the Danes were engaged by another motive to depart a kingdom which appeared so little in a situation to resist their efforts: they were invited by their countrymen in Normandy, who at this time were hard pressed by the arms of Robert, King of France, and who found it difficult to defend the settlement, which, with so much advantage to themselves and glory to their nation, they had made in that country. It is probable, also, that Ethelred, observing the close connexion thus maintained among all the Danes, however divided in government or situation, was desirous of forming an alliance with that formidable people; for this purpose, being now a widower, he made his addresses to Emma, sister to Richard II. Duke of Normandy, and he soon succeeded in his negotiation. The princess came over this year to England, and was married to Ethelred.\(^c\) In the end of the ninth and beginning of the tenth century, when the North, not yet exhausted by that multitude of people, or rather nations, which she had successively emitted, sent forth a new race of invaders, the hot of which was the Earl of York, whose ancestors were one of the Welsh princes, who infested the countries possessed by her once warlike sons; lived Rollo, a petty prince or chieftain in Denmark, whose valour and abilities soon engaged the attention of his countrymen, and procured him the place of earl, or the affectionate appellation of the king of Denmark, who attacked his small but independent principality; and who, being foil'd in every assault, had recourse at last to perforify for effecting his purpose, which he had often attempted in vain by force of arms: he called Rollo into security by an insidious peace; and falling suddenly upon him, murdered his brother and his bravest officers, and forced him to fly for safety into Scandinavia. Here many of his ancient subjects, inclining partly by affection to their prince, and partly by the oppressions of the Danish monarch, ranged themselves under his standard, and offered to follow him in every enterprise. Rollo, instead of attempting to recover his patrimonial dominions, whom he must expect a very strong resistance from the Danes, determined to pursue an easier but more important undertaking, and to make his fortune, in imitation of his countrymen, by pillaging the richer and more civilized parts of England. The Danes, by the body of troops, which, like that of all those ravagers, was composed of Norwegians, Swedes, Frisians, Danes, and adventurers of all nations, who, being accustomed to a roving unsettled life, took delight in nothing but war and plunder. His reputation brought him associates from all quarters; and a vision, which he pretended to have appeared to him in his sleep, and which, according to his interpretation of it, prognosticated the greatest successes, proved also a powerful incentive with those ignorant and apathetic people.

The first attempt made by Rollo was on England, near the end of Alfred's reign; when that great monarch, having settled Guthrum and his followers in East Anglia, and other ill-disposed nations at the order, and defending his realm against the Danes, who, having restored peace to his harassed country, had established the most excellent military as well as civil institutions among the English. The prudent Dane, finding that no engineer, no general, over such a prince, governed by such a prince, soon turned his enterprises against France, which he found more exposed to his inroads; and during the reigns of Eudes, an usurper, and of Charles the Simple, a weak prince, he committed the most destructive ravages both on the inland and maritime provinces of that kingdom. The French, having no means of defence against a leader who united all the valor of his countrymen with the policy of more civilized nations, were obliged to submit to the expedition practised by Alfred, and to offer the invaders a settlement in some of those provinces which they had depopulated by their arms.

The reason why the Danes for many years pursued measures so different from those which had been embraced by the Goths, Vandals, Franks, Burgundians, Lombards, and other northern conquerors, was the great difference in the method of attack which was practised by these several nations. The Danes, on the contrary, invented situations necessarily confined them. The latter tribes, living in an inland country, made incursions by land upon the Roman empire; and when they entered far into the frontiers, they were obliged to carry along with them their wives and families, whom they had no hopes of soon revisiting, and who could not otherwise partake of their plunder. This circumstance quickly made them think of forsaking that country, and of exposing themselves to the incursions of the Saracens; and these barbarians, spreading themselves over the country, found an interest in protecting the property and industry of the people whom they had subdued. But the Danes and Norwegians, invited by their maritime situation, and obliged to maintain themselves in their un cultivated country by fishing, had acquired some experience of navigation; and in their military excursions pursued the method practised against the Roman empire by the more early nations. They made descent in small bodies from their ships, or rather boats, and ravaging the coasts, returned with their booty to their families, whom they could not conveniently carry along with them in those hazardous enterprises. The Danes had made incursions into the inland countries, and found it safer to remain longer in the midst of the enfeebled enemy, they had been accustomed to crowd their vessels with their wives and children; and having no longer any temptation to return to their own country, they willingly embraced an opportunity of settling in the warm climates and cultivated fields of the South.

Affairs were in this situation with Rollo and his followers, when Charles proposed to relinquish to them part of the province formerly called Neustria, and to purchase peace on these hard conditions. After all the terms were fully settled, there appeared only one circumstance shocking to the minds of the English; that the Danes were invited to Charles for this province, and to put himself in that humiliating posture imposed on vassals by the rites of the feudal law. He long refused to submit to this indignity; but being unwilling to lose such momentous advantages for a mere ceremony, he made a sacrifice of his pride to his interest, and acknowledged himself, in form, the vassal of the French monarch. Charles gave him his daughter, Gala, in marriage; and, that he might be enabled to follow his interests, made him a donation of a considerable territory, besides that which he was obliged to surrender to him by his stipulations. When some of the French nobles informed him, that in return for so generous a present it was expected that he should throw himself at the king's feet, and make suitable acknowledgments for his bounty; Rollo replied, that he would rather drink a cup of poison than submit to such dishonourable a posture, causing Charles by the foot, and pretending to carry it to his mouth, that he might kiss it, overthrew him before all his courtiers. The French, sensible of their present weakness, found it prudent to treat the usual terms. Rollo, who was now in the decline of life, and was tired of wars and depredations, applied himself, with mature counsels, to the settlement of his new-acquired territory, which was thenceforth called Normandy; and he parceled it out among his captains and followers. He followed, in this partition, the customs of the feudal law, which was then universally established in the southern countries of Europe, and which suited the peculiar circumstances of that age. He treated the French subjects, who submitted to him, with mildness and justice; he reclaimed his ancient followers from their ferocious violence, he established law and order throughout his state; and after a life spent in tumults and ravages, he died in a good old age, and left his dominions to his posterior.

William I. who succeeded him, governed the Duchy twenty-five years; and, during that time, the Normans were thoroughly intermingled with the French, who had acquired and united the territories which they had made such progress towards cultivation, that on the death of William, his son Richard, through a minor, in inherited his dominions: a sure proof that the Normans were not what advanced in civility, and that their government could now rest secure on its laws and civil institutions, and was not wholly sustained by the abilities of the sovereign. Richard, after a long reign of fifty-four years, was succeeded by his son Henry, in the year 996; which was eighty-five years after the first establishment of the Normans in France. This was the duke who gave his sister Emma in marriage to Ethelred, King of England, and who thereby formed connexions with a country which his posteriority was so soon after destined to subdue.

The Danes had been established during a longer period in England than in France; and though the similarity of their original language to that of the Saxons, and their invitation to them to a more early coalition with the natives, they had hitherto found so little example of civilized manners among the English, that they retained all their ancient ferocity, and valued themselves only on the portrait of military bravery. The recent as well as more ancient achievements of their countrymen tended to support this idea; and the English princes, particularly Athelstan and Edgar, sensible of that superiority, had been accustomed to keep in pay bodies of Danish troops, who were quartered about the country, and committed many violence upon the inhabitants. These mercenaries had attained to such a height of luxury, according to the old English writers, that theycombed their hair once a day, bathed themselves once a week, changed their clothes frequently; and by all these arts of effeminacy, as well as by their military character, had rendered themselves so agreeable to the fair sex, that they debauched the English ladies and lassies, and converted them to their own religion. Ethelred, King of England, and his courtiers, were by no means unalarmed at this proceeding; they had only adopted it, as would be natural to others who lived in a sort of peace, and in the midst of a country which they had rendered absolutely impossible. Great resistance must have been made, and valiant despatched to commence the execution every where on the 30th day of that month; and the festival of St. Brice, which fell on a Sunday, the day on which the Danes usually bashed themselves, was chosen for that purpose.

It is needless to repeat the accounts transmitted concerning the barbarity of this massacre; the rage of the populace, excited by so many injuries, sanctioned by authority, and strengthened by deceit, did not permit that between uno-nence and guilt, spared neither sex nor age, and was not satisfied with the tortures as well as death of the unhappy victims. Even Guinilda, sister to the King of Denmark, who had married Earl Faling, and had embraced Christianity, had by the advice of her husband, who was seized, and condemned to death by Ethelred, after seeing her husband and children butchered before her face. This unhappy princess foretold, in the agonies of despair, that her murder would soon be avenged by the total ruin of the English nation.

A.D. 1003.

Never was prophecy better fulfilled; and never did barbarous policy prove more fatal to the authors. Sweyn and his Danes, who waited but a pretext for invading the English, appeared off the western coast, and threatened to take full revenge for the slaughter of their countrymen. Exeter fell first into their hands, from the negligence or treachery of Earl Hugh, a Norman, who had been made governor by the interest of Queen Emma. They began to spread their devastations over the country; when the English, sensible what outrages they must suffer after their barbarous assemblage, more early, and in greater numbers than usual, and made an appearance of vigorous resistance. But all these preparations were frustrated by the treachery of Duke Alfric, who was intrusted with the command, and who, feigning submission, the second of March, led the Danes, till it was disjunct, and at last dissipated, by his fatal misconduct. Alfric soon after died; and Edric, a greater traitor than he, who had married the king's daughter, and had murdered a total of three hundred men, succeeded Alfric in the government of Mercia, and in the command of the English armies. A great famine, proceeding partly from the bad seasons, partly from the decay of agriculture, added to the other miseries of the inhabitants. The country, wasted by the Danes, harassed by the fearlessexpeditions of its own forces, was reduced to the utmost desolation; and at last subjected to the insult of hostilities; and at last subjected to the insult of hostilities; and at last subjected to the insult of hostilities.

A.D. 1017.

The king, to the infamy of purchasing a precious peace from the enemy, by the payment of 30,000 pounds.

The English endeavoured to employ this interval in making preparations against the return of the Danes, which the king had soon seen to expect; ordering the proprietors of eight hides of land to provide each a horseman and a complete suit of armour; and those of 310 hides to equip a ship for the defence of the coast. When the vessels were assembled, which must have comprised of near eight hundred vessels, all hopes of its success were disappointed by the factions, animosities, and dissensions of the nobility. Ethelred had impelled his brother Brightred to procure a succession of treason against Wulfo-noth, governor of Sussex, the father of the fatuous Earl Godwin; and that nobleman, well acquainted with the malevolence as well as power of his enemy, found no means of safety but in deserte with twenty ships to the Danes. Brightred pursued him with a fleet of eighty sail; but his ships being shattering in a tempest, and stranded on the coast, he was suddenly attacked by Wulnoth, and all his vessels were burnt or destroyed. The inimicality of the king was little capable of repairing this misfortune; the treachery of Edric frustrated every plan for future defense; and the English navy, discouraged, discouraged, and divided, was at last scattered into its several harbours. It is almost impossible it should be repaired; and after this, particularly all the miseries to which the English were thereby exposed. We hear of nothing but the sackings and burning of towns; the devastation of the open country; the ravage and depredations of the Danes, who in twenty years were reduced; which was not the case. This account given by Walthingham, though not entirely, yet was admitted as the true one. We are told that they burnt, killed, and destroyed many villages, and other people's exposure came from the conduct of the Danes, who were put to flight.

But the English princes had been entirely masters of several dom; their cruel diligence in discovering any corner which had not been ransacked by their former violence. The broken and disjointed narration of the ancient historians is here well adapted to the nature of the war, which was conducted by such sudden inroads as would have been dangerous even to a united and well-governed kingdom, but proved fatal, where nothing but a general consternation and panic existed. But the conduct of Ethelred, the governors of one province refused to march to the assistance of another, and were at last terrified from assembling their forces for the defence of their own province. General councils were summoned; but either no resolution was taken, or the council was dissolved. Ethelred, Earl of Wiltshire, sent an expedition in which the English agreed, was the base and imprudent one of turning a new peace from the Danes, by the payment of 48,000 pounds. This measure did not bring them even that short interval of repose which they had expected from it. The Danes, disregarding all engagements, continued their devastations and hostilities; levied a new contribution of 38,000 pounds upon the county of Kent alone; murdered the Archbishop of Canterbury, who had refused to countenance this exaction; and the English nobility found no other resource than that of falling among every where to the Danish monarch, swearing allegiance to him, and delivering up him hostages for his fidelity. Ethelred, equally afraid of the violence of the enemy and the treachrery of his subjects, and excluding from his council all that he had sent him Queen Emma, and her two sons, Alfred and Edward. Richard received his unhappy guests with a generosity that does honour to his memory. The king had not been above six weeks in Normandy when he was assassinated by his agents or murdered by his enemies.

Sweny, who expired at Gainsborough, before he had time to establish himself in his newly-acquired dominions. The English prelates and nobility, taking advantage of this event, for the first time over them, to express a desire of being again governed by their native prince, and intimating their hopes, that being now tutored by experience, they would avoid all those errors which had been attended with such misfortunes to himself and to his people. But the misconduct of Ethelred was incurable; and on his resuming the government, he discovered the same incapacity, bilo-ence, cowardice, and credulity, which had so speedily exposed him to the insults of his enemies. His son-in-law, Edric, notwithstanding his repeated treasons, retained such influence at court, as to instil into the king jealousies of Swefre and Morcar, two of the chief aches of Mervyn; Edric, and both of them. The king was then, in his mind, hated them; while Ethelred participated in the infamy of the action, by confiscating their estates, and thrusting into a convent the widow of Swefre. She was a woman of singular interest and beauty, and a visit which was paid her, during her confinement, by Prince Edmond, the king's eldest son, she inspired him with so violent an affer ence, that he released her from the convent, and soon after married her, without the consent of his father.

Meanwhile the English found in Canute, the son and successor of Sweyn, an enemy no less terrible than the prince from whom death had so lately delivered them. He ravaged the eastern coast with merciless fury, and put to ashore all the English hostages at Sandwich, after having cut off their hands and noses. He was obliged, by the necessity of his affairs, to make a voyage to Denoaar; but returning soon after, he collected his dispirited army, and after some time to get the prince into his power, he found means to disperse the army; and he then openly deserted Canute with forty vessels. But the course of fortune, Edmond was not displeased, and only suspected a military corps of that nation. It seems probable, therefore, that it was these thanes only that were put to

c. These were 28,460 hides in England. Consequently the ships proposed on the 27th. The cavalry was 30,120 men.
concerted; but, assembling all the force of England, was in a condition to give battle to the enemy. The king had such frequent experience of perjury among his subjects, that he had lost all confidence in them: he remained at London, pretending sickness, but really from apprehensions that they intended to buy their peace, by delivering him into the hands of his enemies. The army called aloud for their sovereign to march at their head against the Danes, besides which the majority of the English had been discouraged, that those vast preparations became ineffectual for the defence of the kingdom. Edmund, deprived of all regular supplies to maintain his soldiers, was obliged to diminish their ranks; and, either to name them or to collect them by the Danes; and after making some fruitless expeditions into the north, which had submitted entirely to Canute's power, he retired to London, determined there to maintain, to the last extremity, the small remains of English liberty. He here found every thing in confusion by the death of the king, who expired after an unhappy and inglorious reign of thirty-five years. He left two sons by his first marriage, Edmund, who succeeded him, and Ethelred, whom Canute afterwards murdered. His two sons by the second marriage, Alfred and Edward, were immediately upon Ethelred's death conveyed into Normandy by Queen Emma.

EDMOND IRONSIDE.

This prince, who received the name of Ironside from his brave valour, possessed courage and abilities sufficient to have preserved his father's kingdom, but the calamities, and not to raise it from that abyss of misery into which it had already fallen. Among the other misfortunes of the English, treachery and dissipation had crept in among the nobility and gentry; and Edmund found no better expedient for stopping the further progress of these fatal evils, than to lead his army instantly into the field, and to employ them against the common enemy. After eleven or twelve weeks' campaign, when he prepared himself to decide, in one general engagement, the fate of his crown; and at Scoeteron, in the county of Gloucester, he offered battle to the enemy, who were commanded by Canute and Edric. For the beginning of the day, declared for him; but Edric, having cut off the head of one Osmer, whose countenance resembled that of Edmund, fixed it on a spear, carried it through the ranks in triumph, and called aloud to the English, that it was time to act, being now his only remaining hope. And though Edmond, observing the consternation of the troops, took off his helmet and showed himself to them, the utmost he could gain by his activity and valour was to leave the victory undecided. Edric took a surer method to ruin him, by pretending to desert to him; and as Edmund was well acquainted with his power, and probably knew no other of the chief nobility in whom he could repose more confidence, he was obliged, notwithstanding the repeated perjury of the man, to give him a considerable command in the army. A battle soon after ensued at Assington in Essex; where Edric, flying in the beginning of the day, occasioned the total defeat of the English, followed by a great slaughter of the nobility. The indefatigable Edmund, however, had still resources: assembling a new army at Gloucester, he was again in a condition to dispute the field; when the Danish and English nobility, equally deserted by their prince, desired, as long as their kings came to a compromise, and to divide the kingdom between them by treaty. Canute reserved to himself the northern division, consisting of Mercia, East Anglia, and Northumberland, which he had entirely subdued: the southern parts were left to Edmund. This prince survived the treaty about a month. He was murdered at Oxford by two of his chamberlains, accomplices of Edric, who thereby made way for the succession of Canute the Dane to the crown of England.

CANUTE.

The English, who had been unable to defend their country, and maintain their independence, under so active and brave a prince as Edmund, could, after his death, expect nothing but total subjection from Canute, who, active and brave himself, and at the head of a great force, was ready to take advantage of the majority of the Edric and Edmund, the two sons of Alfred. Yet this conqueror, who was commonly so little scrupulous, showed himself anxious to cover his injustice under plausible pretences: before he seized the dominions of the English, he summoned, and, without a dishonourable pretence, to the assembly of the states, in order to fix the succession of the kingdom. He here summoned some nobles to depose that, in the treaty of Gloucester, it had been verbally agreed to, in case of Edmund's death, to send the eldest son to Canute for successor to his dominions, or tutor to his children (for historians vary in this particular): and that evidence, supported by the great power of Canute, determined the states immediately to put the Danish monarch in possession of the government. Canute, jealous of the two pretenders, sensible that he should render himself extremely odious, if he ordered them to be despatched in England, sent them abroad to his ally, the King of Sweden, whom he desired, as soon as they arrived at his court, to free them by their death from all further anxiety. The Swedish monarch was too generous to comply with the request; but being afraid of drawing on himself a quarrel with Canute, by protecting the young princes, he sent them to Solomon, King of Hungary, to be educated in his court. The elder Edwin was afterwards married to the sister of the King of Hungary, but the English prince dying without issue, Solomon gave his sister-in-law, Agafia, daughter of the Emperor Henry his daughter-in-law; and, after three years, she bore him Edgar Atheling, Margaret, afterwards Queen of Scotland, and Christians, who retired into a convent.

Canute, though he had reached the great point of his ambition, in obtaining possession of the English crown, was obliged at first to make great sacrifices to it; and to gratify the chief of the nobility, by bestowing on them the most extensive grants of land. He himself, however, had prepared himself to decide, in one general engagement, the fate of his crown; and at Scoeteron, in the county of Gloucester, he offered battle to the enemy, who were commanded by Canute and Edric. For the beginning of the day, declared for him; but Edric, having cut off the head of one Osmer, whose countenance resembled that of Edmund, fixed it on a spear, carried it through the ranks in triumph, and called aloud to the English, that it was time to act, being now his only remaining hope. And though Edmond, observing the consternation of the troops, took off his helmet and showed himself to them, the utmost he could gain by his activity and valour was to leave the victory undecided. Edric took a surer method to ruin him, by pretending to desert to him; and as Edmund was well acquainted with his power, and probably knew no other of the chief nobility in whom he could repose more confidence, he was obliged, notwithstanding the repeated perjury of the man, to give him a considerable command in the army. A battle soon after ensued at Assington in Essex; where Edric, flying in the beginning of the day, occasioned the total defeat of the English, followed by a great slaughter of the nobility. The indefatigable Edmund, however, had still resources: assembling a new army at Gloucester, he was again in a condition to dispute the field; when the Danish and English nobility, equally deserted by their prince, desired, as long as their kings came to a compromise, and to divide the kingdom between them by treaty. Canute reserved to himself the northern division, consisting of Mercia, East Anglia, and Northumberland, which he had entirely subdued: the southern parts were left to Edmund. This prince survived the treaty about a month. He was murdered at Oxford by two of his chamberlains, accomplices of Edric, who thereby made way for the succession of Canute the Dane to the crown of England.

W. Malm., p. 76. In one of three sieges, Canute diverted the course of D no further anxiety, except with regard to Alfred and Edward, who were protected and supported by their uncle, Richard Duke of Normandy. Richard even fitted out a great fleet to restore the young English princes to the throne of their ancestors; and though the navy was dispersed by a storm, Canute saw the danger to which he was exposed from the enmity of a warlike people as the Normans. In order to acquire the friendship of the duke, he paid him the required homage to Queen Mathilda, sister of the prince; and promised that he would leave the children whom he should have by that marriage, in possession of the crown of England. Richard complied with his demand, and sent over Emma to England, where she was soon after married to Canute. The English, though they disapproved of her espousing the mortal enemy of her former husband and his family, were pleased to find at court a sovereign, to whom they were accustomed, and who had already formed connections with them: and thus Canute, besides securing by this marriage the alliance of Normandy, gradually acquired, by the same means, the confidence of his own subjects. The Norman prince did not long survive the marriage of Emma: and he left the inheritance of the duchy to his eldest son of the same name; who, dying a year after him without children, was succeeded by his brother Robert, a man of valour and ability.

Canute, having settled his power in England beyond all danger of a revolution, made a voyage to Denmark, in order to resist the attacks of the king of Sweden; and he came thither on a great body of men under the command of Earl Godwin. This nobleman had here an opportunity of performing a service, by which he both reconciled the king’s mind to the English nation, and, gaining to himself the friendship of his sovereign, laid the foundation of that immense fortune which he acquired to his family. He was stationed next the Swedish camp, and observing a favourable opportunity, which he was obliged suddenly to seize, he attacked the enemy in the night, before their tents were out of their trappings, pursued his advantage, and obtained a decisive victory over them. Next morning Canute, seeing the English camp entirely abandoned, imagined that those disaffected troops had deserted to the enemy; and he was egregiously surprised to find that they were at that time engaged in pursuit of the discomfited Swedes. He was so pleased with this success, and with the manner of obtaining it, that he bestowed his daughter in marriage upon Godwin, and treated him ever after with entire confidence and regard.

In another voyage, which he made afterwards to Denmark, he attacked Norway, and expelling the just but unwarlike Olaf, he put himself in possession of his kingdom till the death of that prince. He had now, by his conquests and valor, attained the utmost height of grandeur: having leisure from wars and intrigues, he felt the unsatisfactory nature of all human enjoyments; and, equally weary of the glories and tur- moils of this life, he began to cast his eye towards that future existence, which it is so natural for the human mind, whether satisfied by prosperity, or disgusted with adversity, to make the object of its attention. Unfortunately the spirit which prevailed in that age gave a wrong direction to his devotion: instead of making compensation to those whom he had injured by his former acts of violence, he employed himself entirely in those exercises of pietà which the monks represented as the most meritorious. He built churches, he endowed monasteries, he banished the ecclesiastics, and he bestowed revenues for the support of chansons at Axnington and other places; where he appointed prayers to be said for the souls of those who had died in battle against him. He even undertook a pilgrimage to Rome, where he spent a considerable time: besides obtaining from the Pope some privileges for the English school erected there, he engaged all the princes, through whose dominions he was obliged to pass, to desist from those beastly and cruel trials which they used to exact from the English pilgrims. By this spirit of devotion, no less than by his equable and politic administration, he gained, in a good measure, the affections of his subjects.

Canute was the greatest and most powerful monarch of his time, Sovereign of Denmark and Norway, as well as of England, could not fail of meeting with adulation from his courtiers; a tribute which is liberally paid even to the meanest and most obscure of his princes. Some courtiers, in one day in admiration of his greatness, exclaimed, that every thing was possible for him: upon which the monarch, it is said, ordered his chair to be set on the sea-shore, while the tide was rising; and as the waters approached, he commanded them to retire, and to obey the voice of him who was lord of the ocean. He refrained to sit some time in expectation of their submission; but when the sea still advanced towards him, and began to wash him with its billows, he turned to his courtiers, and remarked to them, that every creature in the universe was feeble and impotent, and that power resided with one alone, in whose hands were all the elements of nature, who could say to the ocean, Thus shalt thou go, and no farther; and who could level with his nod the most towering pikes of human pride and ambition.

The only memorable action which Canute performed after his return from Rome, was an expedition against Malcolm, King of Scotland. During the reign of Ethelred, a tax of a shilling a head had been imposed on all the lands of England. It was commonly called Denegelt; because the revenue had been employed either for the English navy, under the command of Ethelred himself, or for its preparations against the invasions of that hostile nation. That monarch had required that the same tax should be paid by Cumberland, which was held by the Scots; but Malcolm, a warlike prince, told him, that, as he was one of his ablest officers, he would neither submit to buy peace of his enemies, nor pay others for resisting them. Ethelred, offended at this reply, which contained a secret reproach on his own conduct, undertook an expedition against Cumberland; but though he committed ravages upon the country, he could never bring Malcolm to a temper more humble or submissive. Canute, after his accession, summoned the Scottish king to acknowledge himself a vassal for Cumberland to the crown of England; but Malcolm refused compliance, on pretence that he owed homage to those princes only who inherited that kingdom by right of blood. Canute was not of a temper to bear this insult; and the King of Scotland soon found that the sceptre was in very different hands from those of the feeble and irresolute Ethelred. Upon Canute’s appearing on the frontiers with a formidable army, Malcolm agreed that his grandson and heir, Duncan, who was in pass, should make the submissions required, and that the heirs of Scotland should always acknowledge themselves vassals to England for that province. Canute passed four years in peace after this enterprise, and he died at Shaftesbury; leaving three sons, Sweyn, Harold, and Hardicanute. Sweyn, whom he had by his first marriage with Aيفة, daughter of the Earl of Hants, was crowned in Norway: Hardicanute, whom he had born him, was in possession of Denmark: Harold, who was of the same marriage with Sweyn, was at that time in England.

HAROLD HARFOOT.

Though Canute, in his treaty with Richard, A.D. 1015, Duke of Normandy, had stipulated that his children by Emma should succeed to the crown of England, he had either considered himself as released from that engagement by the death of Richard, or esteemed it dangerous to leave an unsettled and newly-conquered kingdom to the disposal of his descendants; from obtaining from the Pope some privileges for the English school erected there, he engaged all the princes, through whose dominions he was obliged to pass, to desist from those beastly and cruel trials which they used to exact from the English pilgrims. By this spirit of necessary to proceed by force or intrigue in insuring his succession to the crown. On the death of Harold, Hardicanute had the succession of the English, who, on account of his being born among them of Queen Emma, regarded him as their countryman; he was favoured by the articles of treaty with the Duke of Normandy; and, above all, his party was espoused by Earl Godwin, the most powerful nobleman in the kingdom, especially in the province of Wesssex, the chief seat of the ancient English. Affairs were likely to terminate in a civil war, when, by the interposition of the nobility of both parties, a compromise was arrived at: it was agreed that Harold should enjoy, together with London, all the provinces north of the Thames, while the possession of the south should remain to Hardicanute: and Hardicanute should appear and take possession of his dominions, Emma fixed her residence at Winchester, and established her authority over her son's share of the partition.

Meanwhile, Robert, Duke of Normandy, died in a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and being succeeded by a son, yet a minor, the two English princes, Alfred and Edward, who found no longer any countenance or protection in that country, gladly embraced the opportunity of paying a visit, with a numerous train, to their mother Emma, who seemed to be placed in a state of so much power and splendour at Winchester. But the face of affairs soon wore a melancholy aspect. Earl Godwin had been gained by the arts of Dominiotis, the daughter of that nobleman, and while the treaty was yet a secret, these two tyrants had a plan for the destruction of the English princes. Alfred was invited to London by Harold with many professions of friendship; but when he had reached London, he was set upon by Godwin's vassals, about six hundred of his train were murdered in the most cruel manner, he himself was taken prisoner, his eyes were put out, and he was conducted to the monastery of Ely, where he died soon after.* Edward and Emma, apprized of the fate which was awaiting them, fled beyond sea, the former into Normandy, the latter into Flanders, while Harold, triumphing in his bloody policy, took possession, without resistance, of all the dominions assigned to his brother.

This is the only memorable action performed, during a reign of four years, by this prince, who gave so bad a specimen of his character, and whose bodily accomplishments alone are known to us by his appellation of Harfot, which he acquired from his agility in running and walking. He died on the 14th of April, 1039; little regretted or esteemed by his subjects, and left the succession to his brother, Hardicanute.

HARDICANUTE.

Hardicanute, or Canute the Hardy, that is, the robust, (for he too is chiefly known by his bodily accomplishments,) though, by remaining so long in Denmark, he had been deprived of his share in the partition of the kingdom, had not abandoned his pretensions; and he had determined, before Harold's death, to recover by arms what he had lost, either by his own negligence, or by the necessity of his affairs. On pretence of paying a visit to the queen dowager in Flanders, he had assembled a fleet of sixty sail, and was preparing to make a descent on England, when intelligence of his brother's death induced him to sail immediately to London, where he was received in triumph, and acknowledged king without opposition.

The first act of Hardicanute's government afforded his subjects a bad prognostic of his future conduct. He was so enraged at Harold for depriving him of his share of the kingdom, and for the cruelties he had inflicted on him, that, in an impetuous desire of revenge against the dead, he ordered his body to be dug up, and to be thrown into the Thames; and when it was found by some fishermen, and buried in London, he ordered it again to be dug up, and to be thrown into the Thames, again interred, and thus filled up a second time, and then interred with great secrecy. Godwin, equally servile and insolent, submitted to this unnatural treatment.

That nobleman knew that he was universally believed to have been an accomplice in the barbarity exercised on Alfred, and that he was on that account obnoxious to Hardicanute; and perhaps he hoped, by displaying this rage against Harold's enemy to justify himself from having had any participation in his counsels. But Prince Edward, being invited over by the king, immediately on his appearance, preferred an accusation against Godwin for the murder of Alfred, and demanded justice for that crime. Godwin, in order to appease the king, made him a magnificent present of a galley with a gilt stern, rowed by fourscore men, who wore each of them a gold bracteate, and was covered with clothes in the most sumptuous manner. Hardicanute, pleased with the splendour of this spectacle, quickly forgot his brother's murder; and on Godwin's swearing that he was innocent of the crime, he allowed him to be acquitted.

Though Hardicanute, before his accession, had been called over by the vows of the English, he soon lost the affections of the nation by his misconduct; but nothing appeared more grievous to them, than his renewal of the imposition of Danelaw, and obliging the nation to pay a great sum of money to the fleet which brought him from Denmark. The discontent ran high in many places; in the north, to overawe the people of Stratford, and posterity, whose king, engaged at this opposition, swore revenge against the city, and ordered three noblemen, Godwin, Duke of Wessex, Sward, Duke of Northumberland, and Leofric, Duke of Mercia, to execute his menaces with the utmost rigour. They were obliged to set fire to the city, and deliver it up to be plundered by their soldiers; but they saved the lives of the inhabitants, when they confined in a small island of the Severn, called Bevey, till, by their intercession, they were able to appease the king, and obtain the pardon of the suppliants.

This violent government was of short duration. Hardicanute died in two years after his accession, at the natalis of a Danish lord, which he had honoured with his presence. His usual habits of intemperance were so well known, that, notwithstanding his robust constitution, his sudden death gave as little surprise as it did sorrow to his subjects.

EDWARD THE CONFESSOR.

The English, on the death of Hardicanute, saw a favourable opportunity for recovering their liberty, and for shaking off the Danish yoke, under which they had so long laboured. Sweyn, King of Norway, the eldest son of Canute, was absent; and as the last two kings had died without issue, one of those that now presented himself, nor any whom the Danes could support as successor to the throne. Prince Edward was fortunately at court on his brother's demise; and though the descendants of Edmund Ironside were the true heirs of the Saxon family, yet their absence so remote a country as Hungary, appeared a sufficient reason for their exclusion, to a people like the English, so little accustomed to observe a regular order in the succession of their monarchs. All delays might be dangerous; and the present occasion must hastily be embraced; while the Danes, without concert, without a leader, astonished at the present incident, and anxious only for their personal safety, durst not oppose the united voice of the nation.

But this concurrence of circumstances in favour of Edward, might have failed of its effect, had his succession been opposed by Godwin, whose power, alliances, and abilities gave him a great influence at all times, especially amidst those sudden opportunities which always attend a revolution of government, and which, either seized or neglected, commonly prove decisive. There were opposite reasons which divided men's hopes and fears with regard to Godwin's conduct. On the one hand, the credit of that nobleman lay chiefly in Wessex, which was almost entirely... inhabited by English; it was therefore presumed that he would second the wishes of that people, in restoring the Saxon line, and in humbling the Danes, from whom he, also as they, had reason to dread, as they had already felt, the most grievous oppressions. On the other hand, there subsisted a declared animosity between Edward and Godwin, on account of Alfred's murder, of which the latter had publicly been accused by the prince, and which be might naturally incline to ascribe, without an account of any subsequent merits, to be sincerely pardoned.
But their common friends here interposed; and, representing the necessity of their good correspondence, obliged them to lay aside all jealousies and rancour, and concur in respecting each other as near relations. The Dane only stipulated, that Edward, as a pledge of his sincere reconciliation, should promise to marry his daughter Editha; and having fortified himself by this alliance, he summoned a general council at Gillingham, and prepared every measure for securing the succession to Edward. The English were unanimous and zealous in their resolutions; the Danes were divided and dispirited; any small opposition which appeared in this assembly was hush-heated and suppressed; and Edward was crowned king, with every demonstration of duty and affection.

The triumph of the English, upon this signal and decisive occasion, was at first attended with some distress and violence against the Danes; but the king, by the mild-ness of his character, soon reconciled the latter to his admistration, and the distinction between the two nations gradually disappeared. The Danes were intermixed with the English, in most of the places where they spoke neither the same language; they differed little in their manners and laws; domestic dissipations in Denmark prevented, for some years, any powerful invasion from thence, which might have wreaked vengeance; and as the Norman conquest, which ensued soon after, reduced both nations to equal subjection, there is no further mention in history of any difference between them. The joy, however, of their present peace is not without a mixture of apprehension, arising to the munificent, which of the English, that they instituted an annual festival for celebrating that great event; and it was observed in some countries even to the time of Spenman.

The popular which Edward approved on his accession, was not destroyed by the first act of his administration, resuming all the grants of his immediate predecessor;
an attempt which is commonly attended with the most dangerous consequences. The poverty of the crown convicted the nation that this act of violence was become absolutely necessary; and as the loss fell chiefly on the Danes, who had obtained large grants from the late kings, their countrymen, on account of their services in subduing the Danish kingdom, the English were rather pleased to see them reduced to their primitive poverty. The king's severity also towards his mother, the queen-dowager, though exposed to some censure, met not with very general disapprobation. He had hitherto lived on indifferent terms with that princess; he accused her of neglecting him and his brother during their adverse fortune: he remarked, that as the superior qualities of Camute, and his better treatment of her, had made her entirely indifferent to the memory of Ethelred, she also gave the preference to her children of the second bed, and always regarded Har此次 as her favourite. The same reasons had probably made her unpopular in England; and though she had been a prisoner of her youth, the nation was not, in general, displeased to see her stripped by Edward of immense treasures which she had amassed. He confined her, during the remainder of her life, in a monastery at Winchester; but carried his rigour against her no further. The stories of his accusing her of a participation in her son Alfred's murder, and of a crin-minal correspondence with the Bishop of Winchester, and of his putting her first at the head of the without receiving any hurt, over nine burning ploughshares, were the inventions of the monkish historians, and were propagated and believed from the silly wonder of posterity.

The English flattered themselves that, by the accession of Edward, they were delivered for ever from the domination of foreigners; but they soon found that this evil was not yet entirely removed. The king had been educated with the Normans, and many intimacies with the natives of that country, as well as an affection for their manners. The court of England was soon filled with Normans, who, being distinguished both by the favour of Godwin and the protectorate, had indulged to that which was attained by the English in those ages, soon rendered their language, customs, and laws, fashionable in the kingdom. The study of the French tongue became general among the people. The courtiers affected to mimic the manners of their dear countrymen, and the insults: even the lawyers employed a foreign language in their deeds and papers. But above all, the church felt the influence and dominion of those strangers. Ulf and William, two Normans, who had formerly been the king's chaplains, were created Bishops of Dorchester and London. Robert, a Norman also, was promoted to the see of Canterbury, and always enjoyed the highest favour of his master, of which his abilities rendered him not unworthy.
And though the king's prudence, or his want of authority, made him confer almost all the civil and military employments on the natives, the ecclesiastical preferments were reserved for the Normans. And as the latter possessed Edward's confidence, they had secretly a great influence on public affairs, and excited the jealousy of the English, particularly of Earl Godwin.

This powerful nobleman, besides being Duke or Earl of Wessex, or King of the Western Frisians, possessed powerful vassals connected by his birth and alliance with his government. His eldest son, Sweyn, possessed the same authority in the counties of Oxford, Berks, Glouceter, and Hereford; and Harold, his second son, was Duke of East Anglia, and at the same time Governor of Essex.
The great authority of this family was supported by immeasurably powerful alliances; and the abilities, as well as ambition, of Godwin himself, contributed to result in a situation of influence on the monarchy, capacity and vigour than Edward would have found it difficult to support the dignity of the crown under such circumstances; and as the haughty temper of Godwin made him often forget the respect due to his prince, Edward's animosity against him was grounded on personal as well as political considerations, on recent as well as more ancient injuries. The king, in pursuance of his engagements, had indeed married Editha, the daughter of Godwin, who was ample satisfaction to the animosity between them. Edward's hatred of the father was transferred to that princess; and Editha, though possessed of many amiable accomplishments, could never acquire the confidence of the king, pretended to see that, during the whole course of her life, he abstained from all commerce of love with her; and such was the absurd admission paid to an inviolable chastity during those ages, that his conduct in this particular is highly celebrated by the monkish historians, and greatly contributed to his acquiring the title of Saint and Confessor.

The most popular pretence on which Godwin could ground his disfavour to the king and his administration, was to complain of the influence of the Normans in the government; and a declared opposition had thence arisen between him and these favourites. It was not long before this unison of the English against the Norman rival was to be seen in the course of events. Count of Bologna, having paid a visit to the king, passed by Dover in his return: one of his train, being refused entrance to a lodging which had been assigned him, attempted to attack a man, who was then in attendance before the master of the house. The inhabitants revenged this insult by the death of the stranger; the count and his train took arms, and murdered the wounded townsman; and a tumult ensued, in which barefaced tyranny was liable to be at the mercy. Eustace, being overpowered by numbers, was obliged to save his life by flight from the fury of the populace. He hurried immediately to court, and complained of the usage he had met with. The king entered

Edward, touched in so sensible a point, saw the necessity of exerting the royal authority; and he threatened Godwin, if he persisted in his resolution, to make him feel the utmost effects of his resentment.

The earl, perceiving a rupture to be unavoidable, and pleased to embark in a cause where it was likely he should be supported by his countrymen, made preparations for his own defence, or rather for an attack on Edward. Under pretence of repressing some disorders on the Welsh frontier, he secretly assembled a great army, and was approaching the king, who resided, without any military force, and without suspicion, at Gloucester. Edward applied for protection to Siward, Duke of Northumberland, and Leofric, Duke of Mercia, two powerful noblemen, whose jealousy of Godwin's greatness, as well as their desire of neutrality and independence, forestalled his designs in this extremity. They hastened to him with such of their followers as they could assemble on a sudden; and finding the danger much greater than they had at first apprehended, they were induced to come to Edward's assistance, and to treat with him with respect to the measures of government, and to make their force without delay the defence of the king's person and authority. Edward, meanwhile, endeavoured to gain time by negotiation; while his army, who thought the king entirely in his power, and who was willing to save appearances, fell into the snare; and, not sensible that he ought to have no further reserve after he had proceeded so far, he attempted the full opportunity of rendering himself master of the government.

The English, though they had no high idea of Edward's vigour and capacity, bore him great affection, on account of his humanity, justice, and piety, as well as the long race of their native kings from whom he was descended; and they hastened from all quarters to defend him from the present danger. His army was now so considerable, that he ventured to take the field; and marching to London, had summoned, by memo-

A.D. 1065.

Harold, Earl of Flanders, gave protection to Godwin and his three sons, Garth, Swynn, and Tosti; the latter of whom had married the daughter of that prince: Harold and Leofwine, two other of his sons, took shelter in Ireland. The estates of the father and sons were contested: their governments were given to others: Queen Editha was confined in a monastery at Wareweal: and the greatness of this family, once so formidable, seemed now to be totally supplantled and overthrown.

But Godwin had taken root too firm a basis, and he was too strongly supported by alliances, both foreign and domestic, not to occasion further disturbances, and make new efforts for his re-establishment. His son, Godwin the younger, who in his arrangements, had equipped a considerable fleet, much superior to that of the enemy; and the earl lastly, before their appearance, made his retreat into the Flemish barb The English court, allured by the present security and destitute of all vigorous counsels, allowed the seamen to disband, and the fleet to go to decay, while Godwin, expecting this event, kept his men in readiness for action. He put to sea immediately, and sailed to the Isle of Wight, where he was joined by a French squadron which that nobleman had collected in Ireland. He was now master of the sea; and entering every harbour in the southern coast, he seized all the ships, and made his bases in those countries, subject, so long been subject to his government, to assist him in procuring justice to himself, his family, and his country, against the tyranny of foreigners. Reinforced by great numbers from all parts, he was able to appear in London, threw every thing into confusion. The king alone seemed resolved to defend himself to the last extremity; but the interposition of the English nobility, many of whom favoured Godwin's pretensions, made Edward heir to the terms of accommodation, and the fatigued humidity of the earl, who, disclaimed all intentions of offering violence to his sovereign, and desired only to justify himself by a fair and open trial, paved the way for his more easy admission. It was stipulated that he should give hostages for his good behaviour, and that the primate and all the foreigners should be banished: by this treaty, the present danger of a civil war was obviated; but the country was not entirely restored, much impaired, or rather entirely annihilated. Edward, sensible that he had not power sufficient to secure Godwin's hostages in England, sent them over to his kinsman, the young Duke of Normandy.

Godwin's death, which happened soon after, while he was sitting at table with the king, prevented him from further establishing the authority which he had acquired, and from reducing Edward to greater dignity. He was succeeded in the government of Wessex, Sussex, Kent, and Essex, and in the office of steward of the household, a place of great power, by his son Harold, who was selected by an authority, to fill the post of a chief minister of his father, and was superior to him in address, in unaffected manners, and in virtue. By a modest and gentle demeanour, he acquired the good will of Edward; at least softened that hatred which the prince had so long borne his family; and gaining every day new partisans by his bounty and affability, he proceeded in a more silent, and therefore a more dangerous, manner, to the increase of his authority. The king, who had not sufficient vigour directly to oppose his progress, gave way; and Edward made use of the last energetic step of policy, of balancing opposite parties, required a more steady hand to manage it than that of Edward, and naturally produced faction, and even civil broils, among nobles of such mighty and independent authority. All this was soon after expelled his government by the intrigues and power of Harold; but being protected by Griffith, Prince of Wales, who had married his daughter, as well as by the power of his father Leofwine, he obliged Harold to submit to an accommodation, and was reinstated in the government of East Anglia. This peace was not of long duration: Harold, taking advantage of Leofwine's death, which happened soon after, expelled Algier anew, and banished him from the kingdom. He had, indeed, made a fresh irruption into East Anglia with an army of Norwegians, and overran the country, his death soon freed Harold from the pretensions of so dangerous a rival.
HISTORY

merits, had acquired honour to England, by his successful conduct in the only foreign enterprise undertaken during the reign of Edward. Dunstan, King of Scotland, was a prince of a gentle disposition, but possessed not the genius requisite for governing a country so turbulent, and so much infested by the intrigues and amassments of the great. Macbeth, a powerful nobleman, and nearly allied to Dunstan, not content with crushing the king's authority, carried still further his pestilent ambition: he put his sovereign to death; chased Malcolm Kenneth, his son and heir, into England, and usurped the crown. Swithin, whose name was, by Edward's orders, the protection of this distrest family: he marched an army into Scotland; and having defeated and killed Macbeth in battle, he restored Malcolm to the throne of his ancestors. This service, added to his former connexions with the royal family of Scotland, brought a great accession to the authority of Sward in the north; but as he had lost his eldest son, Osborne, in the action with Macbeth, it proved in the issue fatal to his family. His second son, Waltheof, appeared, on his father's death, too young to be intrusted with the government of Northumberland; and Harold's influence obtained that dukedom for his own brother Teo.

There are two circumstances related of Sward, which disclose his high sense of honour, and his martial disposition. When intelligence was brought him of his son Osborne's death, he was inconsolable, till he heard that the weapon with which he had been taken, was charged with great gallantry in the action. When he found his own death approaching, he ordered his servants to clothe him in a complete suit of armour; and sitting erect on the couch, with a spear in his hand, declared that in that position of a warrior, he would continue to show the fatal moment.

The king, now worn out with cares and infirmities, felt himself far advanced in the decline of life; and having no issue, he began to think of appointing a successor to the kingdom. He sent a deputation to Hungary, to invite over his nephew, Edward, son of his elder brother, and the only remaining heir of the Saxon line. That prince, whose succession to the crown would have been easy and undisputed, came to England with his children, Edgar, surnamed Atheling, Margaret, and Christina; but his death, which happened a few days after his arrival, threw the kingdom into new difficulties. He saw, that the great power and ambition of Harold had tempted him to think of obtaining possession of the throne on the first vacancy, and that Edgar, on account of his youth and inexperience, was very unfit to oppose the pretensions of so popular and experienced a man. The amendments which he had made to Edward's former condition of a ward, made him averse to the succession of his son, and he could not, without extreme reluctance, think of an increase of grandeur to a family which had risen to such high stations of royalty; and which, by the murder of Alfred, his brother, had contributed so much to the weakness of the Saxon line. In this uncertainty, he secretly cast his eyes towards his kinsman, William, Duke of Normandy, as the only person whose power, and reputation, and capacity, could support any destination which he might make in his favour, to the exclusion of Harold and his family.

This fainous prince was natural son of Robert, Duke of Normandy, by Harlotta, daughter of a taunter in Falaise, and was very early established in that grandeur from which his birth seemed to have set him at so great a distance. While he was but nine years of age, his father had resolved to undertake a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; a fashionable act of devotion, which had taken place of the pilgrimages to Rome, and which, as it was attended with more difficulty and danger, and carried those religious adventurers to the first sources of Christianity, appeared the more memorable. Before his departure he assembled the states of the duchy; and informing them of his design, he engaged them to swear allegiance to his natural son, William, whom, as he had no legitimate issue, he intended, in case he should die in the pilgrimage, to leave successor to his dominions. As he was a prudent prince, he could not but foresee the great inconveniences which must attend this journey, and this settlement of his succession; arising from the turbulency of the great, the claims of other branches of the ducal family, and the power of the French monarch; but all these considerations were surrounded by the prevailing zeal for pilgrimages; and probably, more important they were, the more would Robert exult in sacrificing them to what he imagined to be his religious duty.

This prince, as he had apprehended, died in his pilgrimage; and the minority of his son was attended with all those disorders which were almost unavoidable in that situation. The licentious nobles, freed from the awe of sovereign authority, broke out into personal animosities against each other, and made the whole country a scene of war and devastation. Roger, Count of Tom, and Alain, Count of Brittany, advanced claims to the dominion of the state; and Henry I, King of France, thought the opportunity favourable for reducing the power of a vassal, who had originally acquired his settlement in so violent and invidious a manner, and who had long appeared formidable to his sovereign. The regency established by Robert having greatly disheartened the government under this complication of dangers; and the young prince, when he came to maturity, found himself reduced to a very low condition. But the great qualities which he had at his disposal, in which he had been educated to war, and in which he had particularly been trained, gave encouragement to his friends, and struck a terror into his enemies. He opposed himself on all sides against his rebellious subjects, and against foreign invaders; and by his valour and conduct prevailed in every action. He obliged the Hungarian king to grant him considerable terms; he expelled all pretenders to the sovereignty; and he reduced his turbulent barons to pay submission to his authority, and to suspend their mutual animosities. The king's natural affections were united to the ministration of justice; and having found the happy effects of this plan of government, without which the laws in those ages became totally impotent, he regarded it as a fixed maxim, that an inflexible conduct was the first duty of a sovereign.

The tranquillity which he had established in his dominions, had given William leisure to pay a visit to the King of England during the time of Godwin's banishment; and he was received in a manner suitable to the great reputation which he had acquired, to the relation by which he was connected with Edward, and to the obligations which that prince owed to his family. On the return of Godwin, after ten years' exile, the Archbishop of Canterbury, had, before his departure, persuaded Edward to think of adopting William as his successor; a counsel which was favoured by the king's avarice to the crown. But the king's daughter, Maude, the heir of William's uncle, was married to the Duke of Normandy, to whom the king gave a letter of safe conduct in the palace of the duchy. That prerogative, therefore, received a commission to inform William of the king's intentions in his favour; and he was the first person that opened the mind of the prince to entertain those ambitious hopes. But Edward, irresolute and fickle in his purpose, finding that the English would more easily acquiesce in the restoration of the Saxon line, had, in the mean time, invited his eight sons, who, descending from Hungary, were landed, having them recognised heirs to the crown. The death of his nephew, and the inexperience and unpromising qualities of young Edward, made him resume his former intentions in favour of the Duke of Normandy; though his avarice to the crown could not be satisfied with the execution, and even to keep his purpose secret from all his ministers.

Harold, meanwhile, proceeded after a more open manner, in increasing his popular power, in establishing his will, and in preparing the way for his advancement on the first vacancy; in event which, from the age and infirmities of the king, appeared not very distant. But there was still an obstacle, which it was requisite for him previously to overcome. Earl Godwin, when restored to his power and fortune, had given hostages for his good behaviour, and among the rest, one son and one grandson, whom Edward, for greater security, as has been related, had consigned to the custody of the Duke of Normandy. Harold, though not aware of the duke's being his competitor, was uneasy that such near relations should be detained prisoners in a foreign country; and he was afraid lest William should, by means of his friendship with the king, be enabled to form an alliance or any other pretender. He represented, therefore, to the king, his unsigned submission to royal authority, his steady duty to his prince, and the little necessity there was, after such a uniform trial of his obediance, to detain a nobleman who had been required on the first composing of civil discord. By these steps, enforced by his great power, he extorted the king's consent to release them; and in order to effect his purpose, he immediately proceeded, with a numerous retinue, on his journey to Normandy. A tempest drove him on the territory of Guy, Count of Ponthieu, who, being informed of his quality, immediately detained him prisoner, and demanded an exorbitant sum for his ransom. Harold found means to convey intelligence of his situation to the Duke of Normandy; and represented, that while he was proceeding to his court, in execution of a commission from the king of England, he had been treated from the mercenary disposition of the Count of Ponthieu.
William was immediately sensible of the importance of the news. He sacrificed his leisure and repose, and build a great new castle, on which he had found means to be constructed, for the preservation of his life. Harold, either by favours or menaces, he was to the throne of England be open, and Edward might meet with no further obstacle in executing the favourable intentions which he had entertained in his behalf. He sent for Roger, Count of Huy, in order to demand the liberty of his prisoner; and that nobleman, not daring to refuse so great a prince, put Harold into the hands of the Norman, who conducted him to Rouen. William rendered him over to Edith, daughter of Edith, his friendship; and after showing himself disposed to comply with his desire, in delivering up the hostages, he took an opportunity of disclaiming to the great secret of his prescriptions to the crown of England, and of the wealth which Edward intended to make in his favour. He desired the assistance of Harold in perfecting that design; he made professions of the utmost gratitude in return for such an obligation; he promised to him the longed for death of Godfried of England, which supported itself with difficulty under the jealousy and hatred of Edward, should receive new increase from a successor, who would be so greatly beholden to him for his advancement. Harold was prepared at this declaration of the duke; but being sensible that he should never recover his own liberty, much less that of his brother and nephew, if he refused the demand, he signed a compliance with William, renounced all hopes of the crown for himself, and professed his sincere intention of supporting the will of Edward,
and seconding the pretensions of the Duke of Normandy.
William, to bind him faster to his interests, besides offering him one of his daughters in marriage, required him to take an oath that he would fulfill his promises; and in order to render the oath more obligatory, he employed an artifice well suited to the ignorance and superstition of the age. He privately conveyed under the assumed assent of Harold, on which he agreed to swear, the relics of some of the most revered martyrs; and when Harold had taken the oath, he showed him the relics, and admonished him to observe religiously an engagement which had been ratified by so tremendous a sanction. The English noblemen were astonish; but dissembling his concern, he renewed the same professions, and was dismissed with all the marks of mutual confidence by the Duke of Normandy.

When Harold found the self-styled habitation suggested casuistry sufficient to justify his violation of an oath, which had been extorted from him by fear, and which, if fulfilled, might be attended with the subjects of his house, he was determined to continue it still to practise every art of popularity; to increase

The Welsh, though a less formidable enemy than the Danes, had long been accustomed to infest the western borders; and after committing spoil on the low countries, they usually made a hasty retreat into their mountains, where they were sheltered from the pursuit of their enemies, and were ready to seize the first favourable opportunity of renewing their depredations. Griffith, the reigning prince, had greatly distinguished himself in those incursions; and his name had become so terrible to the English, that Harold found he could do nothing more acceptable to the public, and more honourable for himself, than the suppressing of so dangerous an enemy. He formed the plan of an expedition against Wales; and having prepared some light-armed foot to pursue the natives into their fastnesses, some cavalry to scour the open country, and a squadron of ships to attack the sea-coast, he employed at once all these forces against the Welsh. He distanced advantages with vigour, made no intermission in his as-sumtts, and at last reduced the enemy to such distress, that, in order to prevent their total destruction, they made an ungraceful submission, whose honour, he spared to Harold; and they were content to receive as their soveigns, two Welsh noblemen appointed by Edward to rule over them. The other incident was no less honourable to Harold.

Tosti, brother of this nobleman, who had been created Duke of Northumberland, being of a violent and tyrannitcal temper, had acted with such cruelty and injustice, that the inhabitants rose in rebellion, and chased him from his government. He repaired with great speed, possessed great power in those parts, and who were grandsons of the great Duke Leofric, concurred in the insurrection; and the former, being elected duke, advanced with an army to oppose Harold, who was commissioned by the king to reduce and chastise the Northumbrians.

Before the armies came to action, Morcar, well acquainted with the generous disposition of the English commander, endeavored to dissuade him from his design. He represented to Harold, that Tosti had behaved in a manner unworthy of the station to which he was advanced, and no one, not even a brother, could support such tyranny without participating, in some degree, of the infamy attending it; that the Northumbrians were accustomed to be administered to, and regarded it as their birthright, were willing to submit to the king, but required a governor who would pay regard to their rights and privileges; that they had been taught by their ancestors, that death, was preferable to servitude, and had taken the field, determined to perish rather than suffer a renewal of those indignities to which they had so long been exposed; and they trusted that Harold, on reflection, would not defend in another that violent conduct, from which he himself, in his own government, had always kept at so great a distance. This vigorous remonstrance was accompanied with such a detial of facts, so well supported, that Harold found it dif-cult to abandon his brother's cause; and, returning to Edward, he persuaded him to pardon the Northumbrians, and to confirm Morcar in the government. He even mar-lled the sister of that nobleman; aWelsh, presently nurscured Edwin, the younger brother, to be elected into the government of Mercia. Tosti in rage departed the kingdom, and took shelter in Flanders with Earl Baldwin, his father-in-law.

When this marriage Harold broke all measures with the Duke of Normandy; and William clearly perceived that he could no longer rely on the oaths and promises which he had extorted from him. But the English nobleman was now so far advanced, that he seemed to him no longer necessary to dissemble. He had, in his conduct towards the Northumbrians, given such a specimen of his moderation as had gained him the affection of his countrymen. He saw that almost all England was engaged in his interest; while he himself possessed the government of Westmoreland, Cumberland, and Eden, the duchy of Northumberland, and the bishopric of Durham. He now openly aspired to the succession; and insisted, that since it was necessary, by the confession of all, to set aside the royal family, on account of the imbecility of Edgar, the sole surviving heir, there was no one so evident as himself to the throne as a noblemen of great power, of mature age, of long experience, of approved courage and abilities, who, being a native of the kingdom, would effectually secure it against the dominion and tyranny of Edward. Edward, broken in age and indiscreet in his faults, saw the difficulties too great for him to encounter; and though his invertebrate prepossessions kept him from seconding the pretensions of Harold, he took but feeble and irregular steps for securing the succession to the Duke of Normandy. While he continued in this uncertainty he was surprised by sickness, which brought him to his grave, on the fifth of January 1066, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, and twenty-fifth of his reign.

This prior to whom the monks gave the title of Saint and Confessor, was the last of the Saxon line that ruled in England. Though his reign was peaceable and fortunate, he owed his prosperity less to his own abilities than to his change of the times. Even the Duke, when played in other enterprises, attempted not those enterprises which had been so troublesome to all his predecessors, and fatal to some of them. The facility of his disposition made him acquiesce under the government of Edward, and his son Harold; and the abilities, as well as the power, of these noblemen enabled them, while they were intrusted with authority, to preserve domestic peace and tranquillity. The most commendable circumstance of Edward's government, was his attention to the administration of justice, and his compiling, for that purpose, a body of laws, which he collected from the laws of Ethelbert. This compilation through now loss (for the laws that pass under Edward's name were composed afterwards,) was long the object of affection to the English nation.

Edward the Confessor was the first that touched for the king's evil; the opinion of his sanctity procured belief to this curcum among the people; his successors regarded it as a part of their state and grandeur to uphold the same opinion. It has been continued down to our time; and the practice was first dropped by the present royal family, who observed, that it could no longer give amazement even to the populace, and was attended with ridicule in the eyes of all men of understanding.

HAROLD.

Harold had so well prepared matters before the death of Edward, that he immediately stepped into the vacant throne; and his accession was attended with as little opposition and disturbance, as if he had succeeded by the most unquestioned hereditary title. The citizens of London were his zealous partizans; the bishops and clergy had adopted his cause; and all the powerful nobility, connected with him by alliance or friendship, willingly seconded his pretensions. The title of Edgar Atheling was scarcely mentioned; much less the claim of the Duke of Normandy: and Harold, assembling his partizans, received the crown from their hands, without waiting for the free deliberation of the states, or regularly submitting the question to their determination. Only his scruples and his desire of being oblige to conceal their sentiments; and the new prince, taking a general silence for consent, and founding his title on the supposed suffrages of the people, which appeared unanimous, was, on the day immediately succeeding Edward's death, anointed and crowned, as king, in the Church of St. Saviour, Westminster, by Ralph, Bishop of York. The whole nation seemed joyfully to acquiesce in his elevation.

The first symptoms of danger, which the king discovered, came from his own brother Tostig, who had submitted to a voluntary banishment in Flanders. Engaged at the successful ambition of Harold, to which he himself had fallen a victim, he filled the court of Baldwin with complaints of the injustice which he had suffered: he engaged the interest of that family against his brother: he endeavoured to form intrigues with some of the discontented nobles in England: he sent his emissaries to Norway, in order to rouse to arms the freebooters of that kingdom, and to excite their hopes of reaping advantage from the unsettled state of affairs on the usurpation of the new king: and that he might render the combination more formidable, he made a journey to Normandy; where he expressed himself in his extreme rage, that another daughter of Baldwin, would, in revenge of his own wrongs, as well as those of Tostig, second, by his counsels and forces, the projected invasion of England.

The Duke of Normandy, when he first received intelligence of Harold's intrigues and accession, had been moved to the highest pitch of indignation; but that he might give the better colour to his pretensions, he sent an embassy to England, upbraiding princes with his breach of faith, and summoning him to resign immediately possession of the kingdom. Harold replied to the Norman ambassadors, That the oath, with which he was reproached, had been taken by himself, not by or through him; that he had obtained the crown, not by the consent of his family, but by the unanimous suffrages of the people; and should prove himself totally unworthy of their favour, did he not strenuously maintain those national liberties, with whose protection he had been intrusted; and that he made any attempt by force of arms, should experience the power of a united nation conducted by a prince, who, sensible of the obligations imposed on him by his royal dignity, was determined that the same moment should put a period to his life and to his government?

This answer was no other than William expected; and he had previously fixed his resolution of making an attempt upon England. Consulting only his courage, his resentment, and his ambition, he overlooked all the difficulties inseparable from an attack on a great kingdom by such inferior force, and he saw only the circumstances which would facilitate his enterprise. He considered that besides this story is not probable in itself, and is contradicted by most of the ancient historians, it is contradicted by a very curious and authentic document, which has been preserved in the publical of Rouen, and supposed to have been written by censors of Matild, Chapter III.

Harold.

England, ever since the ascension of Canute, had enjoyed profound tranquillity, during a period of near fifty years; and it would require time for its soldiers, enervated by long peace, to learn discipline, and to acquire the national experience. He knew that it was entirely unpardoned with fortified towns, by which it could prolong the war; but must venture its whole fortune in one decisive action against a veteran enemy, who, being once master of the field, would be hard pressed to recover the kingdom. He saw while Harold, though he had given proofs of vigour and bravery, had newly mounted a throne, which he had acquired by faction, from which he had excluded a very ancient royal family, and which was likely to totter under him by its own instability, much more if shaken by any violent external impulse. And he hoped, that the very circumstance of his crossing the sea, quitting his own country, and leaving himself no hopes of retreat; as it would astonish the enemy by the boldness of the enterprise, would inspire his soldiers by despair, and rouse them to sustain the reputation of the Norman arms.

The Normans, as they had long been distinguished by valour among all the European nations, had at this time attained to the highest pitch of military glory. Besides acquiring by arms such a noble territory in France, beside defending it against continual invasion from the French monarchs and their neighbours, besides exerting new acts of vigour under their present sovereign; they had, about this very time, revived their ancient fame, by the most hazardous exploits, and the most wonderful successes in their devastations, in their wars and battles. The most courageous venturers in Italy had acquired such an ascendancy, not only over the Italians and Greeks, but the Germans and Saracens, that they expelled those foreigners, procured to themselves ample establishments, and laid the foundation of the opulent kingdom of Naples and Sicily. These enterprises of men, who were all of them vassals in Normandy, many of them banished for faction and rebellion, excused for their service, and pardoned for their prudence; who acquired, after such examples of fortune and valour, to be deterred from making an attack on a neighbouring country, where he could be supported by the whole force of his principality.

The situation also of Europe inspired William with hopes, that, besides his brave Normans, his page might employ against England the flower of the military force which was dispersed in all the neighbouring states. France, Germany, and the Low Countries, by the progress of the feudal institutions, were divided and subdivided into many principalities and baronies; and the possessors, enjoying the civil jurisdiction within themselves, as well as the military service outside, lived in constant division, and maintained their properties and privileges less by the authority of laws than by their own force and valour. A military spirit had universally diffused itself throughout the country; and the several leaders, whose minds were elevated by their princely situation, greedily embraced the most hazardous enterprises; and being accustomed to nothing from their infancy but recitals of the success attending wars and battles, they were prompted by a natural ambition to imitate those adventures which they heard so much celebrated, and which were so much exaggerated by the credulity of the age. United, however loosely, by their duty to one superior lord, and by their common interest with the great body of the community to which they belonged, they desired to spread their fame each beyond his own district; and in all assemblies, whether instituted for civil deliberations, for military expeditions, or merely for show and entertainment, to outshine each other by the reputation of strength and prowess. Hence their genius for chivalry; hence their insistence of peace and tranquillity; and hence their readiness to embark in any desperate enterprise, how little soever interested in its failure or success.

William, by his power, his courage, and his abilities, had long maintained a pre-eminence among those haughty chieftains; and every one who desired to signalize himself by his actions, was within the great body of the community to which they belonged, they desired to spread their fame each beyond his own district; and in all assemblies, whether instituted for civil deliberations, for military expeditions, or merely for show and entertainment, to outshine each other by the reputation of strength and prowess. Hence their genius for chivalry; hence their insistence of peace and tranquillity; and hence their readiness to embark in any desperate enterprise, how little soever interested in its failure or success.

Hence their genius for chivalry; hence their insistence of peace and tranquillity; and hence their readiness to embark in any desperate enterprise, how little soever interested in its failure or success.

The Emperor Henry IV., besides opening all his vassals permission to embark in this expedition, which so much engaged the attention of Europe, promised his protection to the duchy of Normandy during the absence of the prince, and thereby enabled him to employ his whole force in the invasion of England. But the most important of all was the influence, which this prince of the Church, and the Pope, who had a mighty influence over the ancient barons, no less devout in their religious principles, than valorous in their military enterprises. The Roman pontiff, Henry IV., after an irreparable progress, during the several ages of darkness and ignorance, began now to lift his head openly above all the princes of Europe; to assume the office of a mediator, or even an arbiter, in the quarrels of the greatest monarchs; to interrupt all secular affairs; and to sublimate his dictates as sovereign laws on his obsequious disciples. It was a sufficient motive to Alexander II., the reigning pope, for embracing William's quarrel, that he alone had made an appeal to his tribunal, and rendered him amenable to the dispute between him and Harold; but there were other advantages which that pontiff foresaw must result from the conquest of England by the Norman arms. That kingdom, though at first converted by Roman missionaries, though it had afterwards advanced some further steps towards submission to Rome, maintained still a considerable independence in its ecclesiastical administration; and forming a world within itself, entirely separated from the rest of Europe, it had become now accessible to those exorbitant claims which supported the grandeur of the papacy. Alexander therefore hoped, that the French and Norman barons, if successful in their enterprise, might import into that country a more respect to the church, and the English churches to a nearer conformity with those of the continent.
declared immediately in favour of William's claim; pronounced Harold a perjured usurper; denounced excommunication against him and his adherents; and the more to encourage the Duke of Normandy in his enterprise, he sent him a consecrated banner, and a ring with one of St. Peter's hairs in it. Thus were all the ambition and violence of that invasion covered over safely with the broad mantle of piety.

The greatest difficulty which William had to encounter in his preparations, arose from his own subjects in Normandy. The states of the duchy were united at Lisle-bourne; and supplies being demanded for the intended expedition, and promised so much to their country, there appeared a reluctance in many members, both to grant sums so much beyond the common measure of taxes in that age, and to set a precedent of performing their military service at a distance from their own country. The duke, finding it dangerous to solicit them in a body, conferred separately with the richest individuals in the province; and beginning with those on whose affections he most relied, he gradually engaged all of them to advance the sums demanded. The Count of Longueville seconded him in this negotiation; as did the Count of Mortagne, Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, and especially the Bishop of Bayeux, Guillaume de Conquérant, and constable of the duchy. Every person, when he himself was once engaged, endeavoured to bring over others; and at last the states themselves, after stipulating that this concession should be no precedent, voted that they would as well at home as in the enterprise that was astir in his duchy.

William had now assembled a fleet of 3000 vessels, great and small, and had selected an army of 60,000 men from among those numerous supplies which from every part of his dominions had been brought to his service. The camp bore a splendid yet a martial appearance, from the discipline of the men, the beauty and vigour of the horses, the lustre of the arms, and the accoutrements of battle; but above all, from the high names of men engaged under the banners of the Duke of Normandy. The most celebrated were, Eustace, Count of Boulogne, Aimery de Thouars, Hugh d'Estaples, William d'Evreux, Geoffrey de Jumieges, and Bertrand Rollin. William de Wareme, Roger de Montgomery, Hugh de Grandmesnil, Charles Martel, and Geoffrey Giffard. To these bold chieftains William held up the spoils of England as the prize of their valor; and pointing to the opposite shore, called, to them that there was the field on which they must erect trophies to their name, and fix their establishments.

While he was making these mighty preparations, the duke that he might inveigle the enemy of Harold's enemies, excite the inveterate rancour of Tosti, and encouraged him, in concert with Harold Halfagar, King of Norway, to invade the coasts of England. Tosti, having collected several vessels in the ports of Flanders, put to sea; and after committing some depredations on the south and east coasts, he sailed to Northumberland, and was there joined by Halfagar, who came over with a great armament of three hundred sail. The combined fleets entered the Humber, and disembarked the troops, who began to extend their depredations on all sides; when Morcar, Earl of Northumberland, and Edwin, Earl of Mercia, the king's brother-in-law, having hastily collected several forces, ventured to give them battle. The action ended in the defeat and flight of these two noblemen. Harold, informed of this defeat, hastened with an army to the protection of his people; and expressed the utmost alarm that he himself worthy of the crown which had been conferred upon him. This prince, though he was not sensible of the full extent of his danger, from the great combination against him, had employed every art of policy about saving the realm of public; and he gave so many proofs of an equitable and prudent administration, that the English found no reason to repent the choice which they had made of a sovereign. They flocking from all quarters to join his standard: and as soon as he reached London, already at Stamford, he found himself in a condition to give them battle. The action was bloody; but the victory was decisive on the side of Harold, and ended in the total rout of the Norwegians, together with the death of Tosti and Halfagar. Even the Norwegian fleet fell into the hands of Harold; who had the generosity to give Prince Olave, the son of Halfagar, his liberty, and allow him to depart with twenty ships manned and provisioned for this victory, when he received intelligence that the Duke of Normandy was landed with a great army in the south of England.

The Norman fleet and army had been assembled, early in the summer, in the mouth of the small river Dove, and all the troops had been instantly embarked; but the winds proved long contrary, and detained them in that harbour. The authority, however, of the duke, the good discipline which his men displayed, and the great care in supplying them with provisions, had prevented any disorder; when at last the wind became favourable, and enabled them to sail along the coast, till they reached St. Valour. There were, however, several vessels lost in this short passage, and as the wind again proved contrary, the army began to imagine that Heaven had declared against them; and that, notwithstanding the Pope's intercession, they might as well have been destroyed. These bold warriors, who despised real dangers, were very much to the dread of imaginary ones; and many of them began to mutiny; some of them even to desert the colours; when the duke, in order to support their drooping spirits, sent to the town of St. Valour, with the reliques of St. Valour, and prayers to be said for more favourable weather. The wind instantly changed; and as this incident happened on the eve of the feast of St. Michael, the Normans have since observed this day as a kind of festival. When they fancied they saw the band of Heaven in all these circumstantial circumstances, set out with the greatest alacrity; they met with no opposition on their passage; a great fleet, which Harold had assembled, and which had stood all summer off the Isle of Wight, had been dismayed, on his receiving false intelligence that William, discouraged by contrary winds and other accidents, had laid aside his preparations. The Normans, in spite of this, in great order, arrived, without any material loss, at Pevensey, in Sussex; and the army quietly disembarked. The duke himself, as he leaped on shore, happened to stumble and fall; but had the presence of mind, it is said, to turn the omen to his advantage, by calling aloud that he had taken possession of the country. And a soldier running to a neighboring cottage, plucked some thatch, which, as if giving him sense of the kingdom, he presented to his general. As the nearer observance of Harold's army were so great, that they were nowise discouraged, even when they heard of Harold's great victory over the Norwegians; they seemed rather to wait with impatience the arrival of another army.

The victory of Harold, though great and honourable, had proved in the main prejudicial to his interests, and may be regarded as the immediate cause of his ruin. He lost many of his bravest officers and soldiers in the action; and he disgusted the rest by refusing to distribute the Norwegian spoils among them: a conduct which was little agreeable to his usual generosity of temper; but which his desire of sparing the people, in the war that imperiously pressed upon him from the Duke of Normandy, probably occasioned. He hastened, by quick marches, to reach this new invader; but though he was reinforced at London and other places with fresh troops, he found himself also weakened by the desertion of his old soldiers, who, from fatigue and discontent, secretly withdrew from their colours. His brother Guth, a man of bravery and conduct, began to entertain apprehensions of the event; and resolved not to support the king to the utmost of his policy to prolong the war; at least, to spare his own person in the action. He urged to him, that the desperate situation of the Duke of Normandy made it requisite for that prince to bring matters to a speedy decision, and put his whole fortune on the issue of a battle; but that the

that the Norman troops, elated on the one hand with the highest hopes, and seeing, on the other, no resource in case of a discomfiture, would fight to the last extremity; and that the flower of all the warriors of the continent, must be regarded as formidable to the English: that if they fled, they would disgrace the army. It was contrary, therefore, to military prudence, to be languish for want of action; if they were harassed with small skirmishes, straitened in provisions, and fatigued with the bad weather and deep roads during the winter season, which was approaching, they must fall an easy prey to the n bloodthirsty and revengeful enemy: that if a general action were delayed, the English, sensible of the imminent danger to which their properties, as well as liberties, were exposed from those rapacious invaders, would hasten from all quarters to his assistance, and would render his army invincible: that at least, if he thought it necessary to hazard a battle, he ought not to expose his own person, but reserve, in case of disastrous accidents, some resource to the liberty and independence of the kingdom: and that having once been so unfortunate as to be constrained to swear, and that upon the holy religious, to support the pretensions of the Duke of Normandy. He had, therefore, on the army to be trusted to another, who, not being bound by those sacred ties, might give the soldiers more assured hopes of a prosperous issue to the combat.

Harold was deaf to all those remonstrances: elated with the most atrophied exultation, and animated by his native courage, he resolved to give battle in person; and for that purpose he drew near to the Normans, who had removed their camp and fled to Hastings, where they fixed their quarters. He was so confident of success, that he had sent a message to the duke, promising him a sum of money if he would depart the kingdom without effusion of blood, but his offer was rejected with disdain; and was acceptable in his desperate and discomfited condition. The duke sent him a message by some monks, requiring him either to resign the kingdom, or to hold it of him in fealty, or to submit their cause to the arbitration of the Pope, or to fight him in single combat. Harold refused, the idea of single battles would soon be the arbiter of all their differences.

The English and Normans now prepared themselves for this important decision; but the aspect of things on the night before the battle was very different in the two camps. The English spent the evening in riot, and jollity, and disorder; the Normans in silence, and in prayer, and in the other functions of their religion. On the morning, the duke called together the multitude of his followers, being already conversant with the English, and prepared to pass the day as advantage was suitable to the occasion. He represented to them, that the event which they and he longed for was approaching; the whole fortune of the war now depended on the few hours, and would be decided so single action: that never army had greater motives for exerting its vigorous courage, whether they considered the prize which would attend their victory, or the inevitable destruction which must ensue upon their discomfiture: that if their martial and veteran bands could once break those raw soldiers, who had rashly dared to approach them, they conquered a kingdom at one blow, and were justly entitled to all its possessions as the reward of their prosperous arms. The English spent the night, in their least worthy prowess, an enraged enemy hung upon their rear, the sea met them in their retreat, and an ignominious death was the certain punishment of their imprudent conduct; that he, coming so numerous and brave a host, he had insured every human means of conquest; and the commander of the enemy, by his criminal conduct, had given him just cause to hope for the favour of the Almighty, in whose hands alone the event of war was vested: and that in a purse of unalloyed, unblemished by the sovereign pontiff, and conscious of his own breach of faith, would be struck with terror on their appearance, and would prognosticate to himself that fate which his multiplied crimes had so justly merited. The duke next divided his army into three lines: the first, led by Montgomery, consisted of archers and light-armed infantry; the second, commanded by Martel, was composed of his bravest battalions and infantry, to fight for the honour of the order: his cavalry, at whose head he placed himself, formed the third line; and were so disposed, that they stretched beyond the infantry, and flanked each wing of the army. To this plan, the English acceded: the whole army, moving at once, and singing the hymn or song of Roland, the famous peer of Charlemagne, advanced, in order and with alacrity, towards the enemy.

Harold had seized the advantage of rising ground, and having likewise the advantage of the sea in rear, to assure his flanks, he resolved to stand upon the defensive, and to avoid all action with the cavalry, in which he was inferior. The Kentish men were placed in the van; a post which they had always claimed as their due: the Londoners guarded the standard: and the king himself, accompanied by his two valiant brothers, Guth and Leofric, dismounting, placed himself at the head of his infantry, and expressed his resolution to conquer, or to perish in the action. The first attack of the Normans was desperate, but was received with equal valour by the English, nod after n furious combat, which remained long undecided, the formers, overpowered by the numbers and the ardour of the adversaries, were pressed by the enemy, began first to relax their vigour then to retreat; and confusion was spreading among the ranks, when William, who found himself on the brink of destruction, hastened with a select band to the relief of his horsemen; but before he could reach the English were obliged to retire with loss; and the duke, ordering his second line to advance, renewed the attack with fresh forces, and with redoubled courage. Finding that the enemy, aided by the advantage of the sea, and animadvised by the example of their prince, still made vigorous resistance, he tried n stratagem, which was very delicate in its management, but which seemed advisable to him, not in order to obtain an decisive victory, he was totally undone: he commanded his troops to make a hasty retreat, and to allure the enemy from their ground by the appearance of flight. The artifice succeeded against those inexperienced soldiers, who, hected by the action, and sanguine in their hopes, precipitately followed the Normans into the plain. William gave orders, that at once the infantry should face about upon their pursuers, and the cavalry make an assault upon the rear of the Normans. The English, seeing which the surprise and terror of the enemy must give them in that critical and decisive moment. The English were repulsed with great slaughter, and driven back to the hill; the enemy, on the other hand, continued their advance, and arrived, notwithstanding their loss, to maintain the post, and continue the combat. The duke tried the same stratagem n second time with the same success; but even after this double advantage, he still found a great body of the English, who, maintaining themselves in firm array, seemed determined to dispute the victory to the last extremity. He ordered his heavy-armed infantry to make an assault upon them; while his archers, placed behind, should gall the enemy, who were exposed by the situation of the ground, and who were intent on defending themselves against the swords and spears of the assailants. By this disposition he at last prevailed: Harold was slain by a single arrow, and both of them pursued the advancing Duke of Normandy, whose head of the day, his two brothers shared the same fate: and the English, discouraged by the fall of those princes, gave ground on all sides, and were pursued with great slaughter, heavy arms, and darkness; however, of the vanquished, had still the courage to turn upon their pursuers; and attacking them in deep and mazy ground, obtained some revenge for the slaughter and dishonour of the day. But they were obliged to seek their security by flight; and darkness saved them from any further pursuit by the enemy.

Thus was gained by William, Duke of Normandy, the great and decisive victory of Hastings, after n battle which was fought from morning till sunset, and which seemed worthy, by the heroic valour displayed by both armies, and by both commanders, to decide the fate of a mighty kingdom. William had three horses killed under him; and there fell near fifteen thousand men on the side of the Normans: the loss of the English was still more considerable, on that of the vanquished; besides the death of the king and his two brothers. The dead body of Harold was brought to William, and was generously restored without ransom to his kindred. The Norman army was left not the field of battle without giving thanks to Heaven in the most solemn manner for their victory: and the prince, having refreshed his troops, prepared to push to the utmost his advantage against the divided, dismayed, and discomfited English.

CHAP. IV.

WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR.

Nothing could exceed the consternation which seized the English, when they received intelligence of the unfortunate battle of Hastings, the death of their king, the slaughter of their principal nobility and of their bravest warriors, and the rout and dispersion of the remainder. But though the loss which they had sustained in that fatal action was considerable, it might have been repaired by a great nation, where the people were generally armed, and where there remained powerful noble houses and powerful provinces, who could have assembled their retainers, and have obliged the Duke of Normandy to divide his army, and probably to waste it in a variety of actions and encounters. It was thus that the kingdom had formerly resisted, for many years, its invaders, and had been gradually subjugated, by the continued efforts of the Romans, Saxons, and Danes; and equal difficulties might have been apprehended by William in that bold and hazardous enterprise. But there were several vices in the Anglo-Saxon constitution, which rendered it difficult for the English to defend their liberties in so critical an emergency. The people had in a great measure no definite corporate interests, and were subject to their royal and municipal subjection to the Danes; and as Canute had, in the course of his administration, much abated the rigours of conquest, and had governed them equitably by their own laws, they regarded with the less terror the ignorance of a foreign yoke, and deemed the inconveniences of submission less formidable than those of bloodshed, war, and resistance. Their attachment also to the ancient royal family had been much weakened by their habits of submission to the Danish princes, and by their late elevation of Harold, or their acquaintance in his usurpation. And as they had long been accustomed to regard Edgar Atheling, the only heir of the Saxon line, as unfit to govern them in times of order and tranquillity; they could entertain small hopes of his being able to repair such great losses as they had sustained, or to withstand the victorious arms of the Duke of Normandy.

Though, however, he be altogether wanting to themselves in this extreme necessity, the English took some steps towards adjusting their disjointed government, and uniting themselves against the common enemy. The two potent Earls, Edwin and Morcar, who had fled to London with the remains of the broken army, took the lead on this occasion: in concert with Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, a man possessed of great authority and of ample revenues, they proclaimed Edgar, and endeavoured to put the people in a posture of defence, and encouraged them to resist the Normans. But the terror of the late defeat, and the near neighbourhood of the invaders, increased the confusion inseparable from great revolutions; and every resolution proposed was hasty, fluctuating, tumultuary; disconcerted by fear or faction, ill planned, and worse expected.

William, that his enemies might have no leisure to recover from their consternation, or unite their counsels, immediately put himself in motion after his victory, and resolved on the conquest of England. The Norman army, which had been restored to liberty and vigour could render finally successful. His first attempt was against Romney, whose inhabitants he severely punished, on account of their cruel treatment of some Norman prisoners. He then turned his forces towards the county of Kent, which was of great consequence was to be gained by the French, that they might their whole force in the country, to make himself master of Dover, which would both secure him a retreat in case of adverse fortune, and afford him a safe landing-place for such supplies as might be requisite for pushing his advantages. The territory, disturbed by his victory at Hastings was so great, that the garrison of Dover, though numerous and well-provided, immediately capitulated; and as the Normans, rushing in terror to take possession of the town, hastily set fire to some of the houses, William, desirous to conciliate the minds of the English by an appearance of lenity and justice, made compensation to the inhabitants for their losses.

The Norman army, being much discomposed with a dysentery, was obliged to remain here eight days, but the duke, on their recovery, advanced with quick marches towards London, and by his approach increased the confusions which were already so prevalent in the English councils. The ecclesiastics in particular, whose influence was great over the people, began to declare in his favour; and as most of the bishops and dignified clergy were even then Frenchmen or Normans, the Pope's bull, by which his excommunication was declared, was not so warmly insisted on as a reason for general submission. The superior learning of those prelates, which, during the Conqueror's reign, had raised them above the ignorant Saxons, made their opinions he received with implicit faith; and a young prince, like Edgar, whose capacity was deemed so small, was but ill qualified to resist the impression which they made on the minds of the people. A repulse which a body of Londoners received from five hundred Norman horse, renewed in the city the terror of the great defeat at Hastings; the easy submission of all the inhabitants of Kent was an additional discouragement to them; the burning of the city of Southwark, and the destruction of the Abbey of St. Alban, seemed to tax their own safety; and no man any longer entertained thoughts but of immediate safety and of self-preservation. Even the Earl Edwin and Morcar, in despair of making effectual resistance, retired with their troops to their own provinces; and the people thereof forth disposed themselves unanimously to yield to the victor. As soon Submission of as he passed the Thames at Wallingford, he and reached Berkshire, Stigand, the primate, made submissions to him: Before he came within sight of the city, all the chief nobility, and Edgar Atheling himself, the new-elected king, came into his camp, and declared their intention of yielding to his authority. They requested him to maintain their throne, which they now considered as vacant; and declared to him, that as they had always been ruled by regal power, they desired to follow, in this particular, the example of their ancestors, and knew of no one more worthy than himself to hold the reins of government.

Though this was the great object to which the duke's enterprise tended, he feigned to deliberate on the offer; and being desirous at first of preserving the semblance of legal administration, he wished to obtain a more explicit and formal consent of the English nation. But Aimar of Aquitaine, a man equally respected for valour in the field and for prudence in council, remonstrating with him on the danger of delay in so critical a conjuncture, he laid had all further scruples, and accepted of the crown which was tendered him. Orders were immediately issued to prepare every thing for the ceremony of his coronation; but theLondoners, who were numerous and warlike, he meanwhile commanded fortresses to be erected, in order to curb the inhabitants, and to secure his person and government. 2

Sugden was not much in the duke's favour, both because he had intruded himself on the court of the Norman, and in particular on that of the Norman, and because he possessed such influence and authority over the English, 3 as might be dangerous to a new-established monarch. William, therefore, pretending that he wished to see the crown received in a solemn manner by the Norman, sent his chancellor, with a commission from Pope Benedict IX. who was himself an usurper, refused to be consecrated by him, and conferred this honour on Aldred, Archbishop of York. Westminster Abbey was the place appointed for that magnificent ceremony, the most considerable of the nobility, both English and Norman, attended the duke on this occasion: Dec. 23.

Aldred, in a short speech, asked the former whether they agreed to accept of William as their king; the Bishop of Coutance put the same question to the latter; and both being answered with acclamations, Aldred administered to the duke the usual coronation oath, by which he bound himself to protect the church, to advance its revenues, and to administer justice to all men; and put the crown upon his head. 4 There appeared nothing but joy in the countenance of the spectators: but in that very moment there burst forth the strongest symptoms of an attempted plot against the laws of the land, so offended between the nations, and which continually increased during the reign of this prince. The Norman soldiers, who were placed without, in order to guard the church, hearing the shouts within, fancied that the English were offering violence to their duke; and they immediately assailed the populace, and set fire to the neighbouring houses. The alarm was conveyed to the nobleman who surrounded the prince; both English and Normans, full of apprehensions, rushed upon one another in the most tumultuous manner, and it was with difficulty that William himself was able to appease the tumult. 5

A. D. 1067.

The king, thus possessed of the throne by Settlement of the & pretended destination of King Edward, government, and by an irregular election of the people, but still more by force of arms, retired from London to Berking, in Essex; and there received the submissions of all the nobility who had not attended his coronation. Fruite, surrounded the town with earthworks, but Frewest, did not for his repeated acts of perfidy during the reigns of Ethelred and Edmond; Earl Cox, a man famous for bravery; even Edwin and Morcar, Earls of Mercia and Northumbria, who were with Fruite, and had landed in England, came and swore fealty to him; were received into favour, and were confirmed in the possession of their estates and dignities. 6 Every thing bore the appearance of joy and approbation; but William had no other occupation than to give contentment to the foreigners who had assisted him to mount the throne, and to his new subjects, who had so readily submitted to him.

He had got possession of the treasure of Harold, which was considerable; and being also supplied with rich presents from the opulent men in all-parts of England, who were solicitous to gain the favour of their new sovereign, he distributed great sums among his troops, and by this means ascertained even the hopes of obtaining at length those more durable establishments which they had expected from his enterprise. 7 The ecclesiastics, both at home and abroad, had much forwarded his success, and he failed not, in return, to express his gratitude and devotion in the manner which was most acceptable to them: he sent Harold's standard to the pope, accompanied with many valuable presents: all the considerable monasteries and churches in France, where prayers had been put up for his victory, were presented by him; and William had no other occupation than to give contentment to the foreigners who had assisted him to mount the throne, and to his new subjects, who had so readily submitted to him.

was visited at the abbey of Fessamp, where he resided during some time, by Rodulph, uncle to the King of France, and by many powerful princes and nobles, who, having contributed to his enterprise, were desirous of participating in the joy and advantages of its success. His English subjects, on the contrary, were unwilling to imbibe the sentiments which his new sovereign, outvied each other in equipages and entertainments; and made a display of riches which struck the foreigners with astonishment. William of Poictiers, a famous historian, who was present, speaks with admiration of the beauty of their persons, the size and workmanship of their silver plate, the cosmetics of their embroidery, an art in which the English then excelled; and after such a scene he was led to extol our idea of the opulence and cultivation of the people.

But though every thing bore the face of joy and festivity, and William himself treated his new courtiers with great appearance of kindness, it was impossible altogether to prevent the insulon of the Normans; and the English nobles derived little satisfaction from those entertainments, where they considered themselves as led in triumph by their ostentatious conqueror.

Departures of. In England affairs took still a worse turn. The absence of the sovereign. Discontents and complaints multiplied every where; secret conspiracies were entered into against the government; hostilities were early begun in many places; and every thing seemed to menace a revolution, as rapid as that which had placed William on the throne. The historian above mentioned, who is a panegyrist of his master, throws the blame entirely on the fickle and mutinous disposition of the English, and highly celebrates the justice and lenity of Odo's and Fitz-Osborne's administration. But other historians, with more probability, impute the cause chiefly to the Normans, who, despising a people that had so easily submitted to the yoke, envying their riches, and regarding the restraints imposed upon their own rapine, were desirous of provoking them to a rebellion, by which they expected to acquire new confiscations and forfeitures, and to force their unbounded wishes which they had formed in entering on this enterprise.

It is evident that the chief reason of this alteration in the sentiments of the English, must be ascribed to the departure of William, who was alone able to curb the violence of his captains, and to overawe the mutinies of the people. Nothing indeed appears more strange than this prince, in less than three months after the conquest of a great, warlike, and turbulent nation, should absente himself for ever to revert to his own dominions, which remained in profound tranquility, and was not incaic by any of its neighbours; and should so long leave his honourable subjects at the mercy of an insolent and licentious army, so dear to the genius, and the good sense displayed in all other circumstances of his conduct, we might ascribe this measure to a vain ostentation, which rendered him impatient to display his pomp and magnificence among his ancient subjects. It is therefore more natural to believe, that in so extraordinary a step he was guided by a concealed policy; and that, though he had thought proper at first to allure the people to submission by the semblance of a legal administration, he found that he could neither satisfy his rapacious captains, nor secure his unstable government, without further exerting the rights of conquest, and seizing the possessions of the English. In order to give a pretext for this violence, he endeavoured, without discovering his intentions, to provoke and allure them into insurrections, which, he thought, could never prove dangerous, while he detained all the principal nobility in Normandy, while a great and victorious army was quartered in England, and while he himself was so near to suppress any tumult or rebellion. But as no ancient writer has ascribed this tyrannical purpose to William, it scarcely seems allowable, from conjecture alone, to throw such an imputation upon him.

But whether we are to account for that Immediate measure from the king's vanity or from his policy, it was the immediate cause of all the calamities which the English endured during this and the subsequent reigns, and gave rise to those mutual jealousies and animosities which divided their country, till they never appeared till a long tract of time had gradually united the two nations, and made them one people. The inhabitants of Kent, who had first submitted to the conqueror, were the first that attempted to throw off the yoke; and in confederacy with Eustace, Count of Bologna, who had also been disgusted by the Normans, they made an attempt, though without success, on the garrison of Dover. While this insurrection was going on, the banks of the Severn, being provoked at the depredations of some Norman captains in his neighbourhood, formed an alliance with Blethyn and Rowallan, two Welch princes; and endeavoured, with their assistance, to repel the force of forces. But though these open hostilities were not very considerable, the disaffection was general among the English, who had become sensible, though too late, of their defenceless condition, and began already to experience the hardships and injuries which they always expect, that allows itself to be reduced to that abject situation. A secret conspiracy was entered into to perpetuate, in one day a general massacre of the Normans, like the first day of the present century; but before the plan was carried into execution, one of the Dukes, and the quarrel became so general and rational, that the avengers of Earl Cozo, having desired him to head them in an insurrection, and finding him resolute in maintaining his fidelity to William, put him to death as a traitor to his country.

The king, informed of these dangerous discontents, hastened over to England; and by his presence, and the vigorous measures which he pursued, succeeded in all the requisitions of his government. Such of them as had been more violent in their mutiny, betrayed their guilt by fleeing or concealing themselves; and the confiscation of their estates, while it increased the number of discontented subjects, both enabled William to gratify further the rapacity of his Norman captains, and gave them the prospect of new forfeitures and attainders. The king began to regard all his English subjects as inveterate and irreclaimable enemies; and these settled either embraced, or was more fully confirmed in the resolutions of seizing their possessions, and of reducing them to the most abject slavery. Though the natural violence and severity of his temper made him incapable of feeling any remorse in the execution of his projects, he yet allowed himself, as he afterwards admitted, to have been sometimes overwrought by the passion of the moment, and conscious of the injustice of his proceedings; and he therefore resolved, at the next opportunity, to act with moderation, and to assuage, as much as possible, the resentment of his people.

The result of an impatient humour in the people, than of any regular conspiracy, which could give him a rational hope of success against the established power of the Normans. The inhabitants of Exeter, instigated by Gatha, mother to King Harold, refused to admit a Norman garrison, and begetting themselves to arms, were strengthened by the accession of the neighbouring inhabitants of Devonshire and Cornwall. The king hastened with his forces to chastise this revolt; and on his approach the wiser and more considerate citizens, sensible of the unequal contest, persuaded the people to submit, and to deliver hostages for their obedience. A sudden mutation of the populace broke this agreement; and William, appearing before the walls, ordered the eyes of one of the hostages to be put out, as an earnest of that severity which

As the historian chiefly insists on the silver plate, his panegyric on the English style and magnificence, yet he was so impatience that he exerted himself in the matter, muster was but a trifle of the value, and was more than twenty times that of the silver plate. It is therefore evident that the whole account of this plate must have been the raiser. 1 P. 321. 322. 4. Order. Vital. p. 5-5.

the rebels must expect if they persevered in their revolt.\(^3\) The inhabitants were a new seized with terror, and surrendering at discretion, threw themselves at the king’s feet, and supplicated his clemency and forgiveness. Baldwin, who was not destitute of generosity, when his temper was not harden’d either by policy or passion; he was prevailed on to pardon the rebels, and he set guards on all the gates, in order to prevent the impunity and insolence of his soldiery—\(^4\) that redounded with much to the honour of the king.\(^5\) The inhabitants of Cornwall imitated the example of Exeter, and met with like treatment: and the king having built a castle in that city, which he put under the command of Baldwin, Gilbert returned to Winchester, and dispersed his army into their quarters. He was here join’d by his wife Matilda, who had not before visited England, and whom he now ordered to be crowned by Archbishop Aldred.\(^6\) Soon after she brought him an accession to his family by the birth of a fourth son, whom he named Henry. His three elder sons, Robert, Richard, and William, still resided in Normandy.

But though the king appeared thus fortunate, both in peace and domestic life, the discontent of his English subjects augmented daily; and the injuries committed and suffered on both sides, renders the quarrel between them and the Normans absolutely incurable. The insolence of the conqueror and his servile vassals, was too great a provocation to the Saxon king, seemed intolerable to the natives; and wherever they found the Normans, separate or assembled in small bodies, they secretly set upon them, and gratified their revenge in the most bloody and inhuman manner. But the actual insurrection in the north drew thither the general attention, and seemed to threaten more important consequences. Edwin and Morcar appeared at the head of this rebellion, and these potent noblemen, before they took arms, were ordered to stand by their nephew Blethin, Prince of North Wales, from Malcolm, King of Scotland, and from Sweyn, King of Denmark. Besides the general discontent which had seized the English, the Normans were increased in force by some private injuries. William, in order to insure to them his interests, had, on his accession, promised his daughter in marriage to Edwin; but either he had never seriously intended to perform this engagement, or, having changed his plan of administration in England from clemency to rigour, he thought it was to little purpose, if he gained one family, while he enraged the whole nation. When Edwin, therefore, resented his broken promise, he gave him an absolute denial;\(^7\) and this disappointment, added to so many other reasons of distress, induced that nobleman and his brother to concur with their incensed countrymen, and to make one general effort for the recovery of their ancient liberties. Many of the English, who were not prepared for an insurrection, supported by such powerful leaders, and so agreeable to the wishes of the people; and having his troops always in readiness, he advanced by great marches to the north. On his march he gave orders to fortify the castle of Warwick, of which he left Henry de Beaumont governor, and that of Nottingham, which he committed to the custody of William Peverell, another Norman captain.\(^8\) He reached York before the rebels were in any condition for resistance, or were joined by any of the foreign succours which they expected, except a small reinforcement from Wales; and the two earls found no means of safety, but having recourse to the clemency of the English king, with a potential assurance of their parts, imitated their example, and delivered his son as a hostage for his fidelity;\(^9\) nor were the people, thus deserted by their leaders, able to make any further resistance. But the treatment which William gave the chiefs was very different from that which fell to the share of their followers. He observed religiously the terms which he had granted to the former, and allowed them for the present possession of their country, and extended the rigours of his confiscations over the latter, and gave away their lands to his foreign adventurers. These, planted throughout the whole country, and in possession of the military power, left Edwin and Morcar, whom he pretended to spare, destitute of all support, and ready to fall, whenever he should think proper to command their ruin. A peace which he made with Malcolm, who did him homage for越过the land, was at the same time to deprive them of all prospect of foreign assistance.\(^10\)

The English were now sensible that the ruin of the final destruction was intended; and that the crown of sovereign, whom they had hoped to gain by their treason, had been secretly surrendered themselves, without resistance, to a tyrant and a conqueror. Though the early confiscation of Harold’s followers might seem ignominious; being inflicted on men who had never sworn allegiance, or been the friends of Normandy, who were ignorant of their pretensions, and who only fought in defence of the government which they themselves had established in their own country: yet were these rigours, however contrary to the ancient Saxon laws, excused on account of the urgent necessities of the prince; and those who were not involved in the present ruin hoped that they should thereforafter enjoy, without molestation, their possessions and their dignities.\(^11\) But the successive destruction of so many other families convinced them, that the king intended to rely entirely on the support and affections of foreigners; and they foresaw new forfeitures, attainders, and acts of violence, as the necessary result of this destructive system of administration; and they did not think that no Englishman possessed his confidence, or was intrusted with any command or authority; and that the strangers, whom a rigorous discipline could have but ill restrained, were eager on their instruction against them. The easy submission of the kingdom on its first invasion had exposed the natives to contempt; the subsequent proofs of their anarchy and resentment had made them the object of hatred; and they were now deprived of every means of security. The365 Saxon and English were now equal, and had to make themselves either regarded or beloved by their sovereign. Impressed with the sense of this dismal situation, many Englishmen fled into foreign countries, with an intention of returning thereon their lives abroad free from oppression, or of returning on a favourable opportunity to assist their friends in the recovery of their native liberties.\(^12\) Edgar Atheling himself, foreseeing the insidious caresses of William, was persuaded by Cospatric, a powerful Northumbrian, to escape with him into Scotland; and he carried thither his two sisters, Margaret and Christina. They were well received by Malcolm, who soon after espoused Margaret, the elder sister; and partly with a view of strengthening his kingdom by the accession of so many strangers, partly in hopes of employing them against the growing power of William, he gave great countenance to all the English exiles. Many of them settled there; and from the foundation of families which afterwards made a figure in that country.

While the English suffered under these oppressions, even the foreigners were not much at their ease; but finding themselves surrounded on all hands by enraged enemies, who took every advantage against them, and menaced them with still more bloody effects of the public resentment, they began to wish again for their tranquillity and security of their native country. Hugh de Clinton, and Humphry de Tocil, though intrusted with great commands, desired to be dismissed the service; and some others imitated their example: a desertion which was highly resented by the king, and which he punished by the confiscation of all his possessions in England.\(^13\) But William’s bounty to his followers could not fail of alluring many new adventurers into his service; and the rage of the vanquished English served only to excite the attention of the king and those wrangling chiefs, and keep them in readiness to suppress every commencement of domestic rebellion or foreign invasion.

It was not long before they found occasion for their new acquisitions. Godwin, Edmond, and Magnus, \(^14\) three sons of Harold, had, immediately after the defeat at Hastings, sought a retreat in Ireland; where, having met with a kind reception from Dermot and other princes of that country, they projected an invasion on England, and they hoped that all the exiles from Denmark, Scotland, and Wales, assisted by forces from these several countries, would at once commence hostilities, and rouse the indignation of the North against their haughty and cruel conquerors. They landed in Devonshire; but found Brian, son of the Count of Brittany, at the head of some foreign troops, ready to oppose them; and being defeated in several actions, they were obliged to retreat to their ships, and return to Ireland.

The efforts of the Normans were now directed to the north, where affairs had fallen into the utmost confusion. The more impatience was manifested by the inhabitants of York, who, rising in arms, slew Robert Fitz-Richard, their governor; and besieged in the castle William Mallet, on whom the command now devolved. A little after, the Danish troops landed from 300 vessels: Osberne, brother to King Sweyn, was intrusted with the command of these forces, and he was accompanied by Harold and Canute, two sons of that monarch. Edgar Atheling appeared from Scotland, and brought along with him Cospatrice, Wallach, Boncho, Osberne, Stellachelin, and other leaders, who, partly from the hopes which they gave of Scottish succours, partly from their authority in those parts, easily persuaded the warlike and discontented Northern chiefs to join the invasion. Mallet, therefore, might better provide for the defence of the citadel of York, set fire to some houses which lay contiguous; but this expedient proved the immediate cause of his destruction. The flames, spreading into the neighbouring streets, reduced the whole city to ashes: the enraged inhabitants, aided by the Danes, took advantage of the confusion to attack the castle, which they carried by assault; and the garrison, to the number of 3000 men, was put to the sword in the most horrid a manner.

This success proved a signal to many other parts of England, and gave the people an opportunity of showing their malevolence to the Normans. Hereward, a nobleman in East Anglia, celebrated for valour, assembled his followers, and taking shelter in the Isle of Ely, made inroads on all the neighbouring country. The English i. the counties of Somerton and Dorset rose in arms, and attempted Montacute, the Northern governor; but the inhabitants of Cornwall and Devon fiercely resisted Exmoor, which, from the memory of William's clemency, still remained faithful to him. Edric the Forester, calling in the assistance of the Welsh, laid siege to Shrewsbury, and was answered by Earl Eustace, who commanded in those quarters. The English everywhere, repenting their former easy submission, seemed determined to make by concert one great effort for the recovery of their liberties, and for the expulsion of their oppressors.

William, undismayed amidst this scene of confusion, assembled his forces, and animating them with the prospect of new confiscations and forfeitures, he marched against the rebels in the north, whom he regarded as the most formidable, and whose defeat he knew would strike a terror into all the other malcontents. Joining policy to force, he tried before his approach to weaken the enemy, by detaching the Danes from them; and he engaged Osberne, by large presents, and offering him the liberty of plundering the sea-coast, to retire, without committing further hostilities, into Denmark. Cospatrice also, in despair of success, made his peace with the king, and paying a sum of money as an atonement for his insurrection, was received into favour, and even invested with the earldom of Northumberland. Waltheof, who long defended York with great courage, was allied with this appearance of clemency: and as William knew how to esteem valour even in an enemy, that nobleman had no reason to repent of this confidence. Even Edric, compelled by force and necessity, and received forgiveness, which was soon after followed by some degree of trust and favour. Malcolm, coming too late to support his confederates, was constrained to retire; and though he left the country, he remained, still who kept him in his fastnesses, despaired himself, and left the Normans undisputed masters of the kingdom. Edgar Atheling, with his followers, sought again a retreat in Scotland from the pursuit of his enemies.

But the seeming clemency of William towards the English leaders proceeded only from artifice, or from his esteem of the government. Individuals; his heart was hardened against all compassion towards the people; and he scruplled no measure, however violent or severe, which seemed requisite to support his plan of tyrannical administration. Sensible of the restless disposition of the Northumbrians, he determined to commence, and with all due severity, to reduce the disturbance. He issued orders for laying entirely waste that fertile country, which for the extent of sixty miles lies between the Humber and the Tees. The houses were destroyed, and the people were dispossessed of their lands; the Normans were seized and driven away; the instruments of husbandry destroyed; and the inhabitants compelled either to seek a subsistence in the southern parts of Scotland, or if they lingered in England, from a reluctance to abandon the ancient habitations which they preferred in the woods from cold and hunger. The lives of a hundred thousand persons are computed to have been sacrificed by this stroke of barbarous policy, which, by seeking a remedy in the injury committed, and by increasing wound on the power and populousness of the nation.

But William, finding himself entirely master of a people who had given him such sensible proofs of their impotent rage and animosity, now resolved to proceed to extremities against all the natives of England, and to reduce them to a condition in which they should no longer be formidable to his government. The insurrections and conspiracies in many parts of the kingdom, had involved the bulk of the Northern and Western persons in the guilt of treason; and the king took advantage of executing against them, with the utmost rigour, the laws of forfeiture and attainted. Their lives were indeed commonly spared; but their estates, and the lands and barony of the royal demesnes, or conferred with the most profuse bounty on the Normans and other foreigners. While the king's declared intention was to depress, or rather entirely extirpate, the English gentility, it was easy to believe that scarcely the form of justice would be observed in those violent proceedings; and that any suspicions served as the most undoubted proofs of guilt against a people thus devoted to destruction. It was crime sufficient in an Englishman to be opulent, or noble, or powerful; and the policy of the king, concurring with the rapacity of foreign adventurers, produced almost a total revolution in the landed property of the kingdom. Ancient noble families were destroyed, and the Normans possessed of the great part of his lands, and no redress could be obtained.

It was natural that the feudal law, revolution alone gave great security to the forefathers; but William, by the new institutions which he established, took also care to retain for ever the military value and liberty of the Normans, to subdue the kingdom. He introduced into England the feudal law, which he found established in France and Normandy, and which, during that age, was the foundation both of the orders of the disorders in most of the monarchical governments of Europe. He divided all the lands of England, with very few exceptions, beside the royal demesnes, into baronies, and he conferred these, with the reservation of stated services and payments, on the most considerable of his adventurers. These barons, who held immediately of the crown, shared out a great part of their lands to other foreigners, who were denominated knights or vassals, and who paid their lord the same duty and submission in peace and war, which he himself owed to his sovereign. The whole kingdom contained about 700 chief tenants, and 60,215 knightesses; and as none of the native English were admitted into these feudal offices, who had not retained their feudal property were glad to be received into the second, and under the protection of some powerful Norman, to load themselves and their posterity with this grievous burden, for exemption from the taxes and fines of their ancient state. The small mixture of English which entered into this civil or military fabric (for it partook of both species) was so restrained by subordination under the foreigners, that the Normans dominion seemed now to be fixed on the most durable basis, and to defy all the efforts of its enemies.

The better to unite the parts of the government, and to bind them into one system, which might serve both for defence and for the support of the tranquillity, William reduced the ecclesiastical revenues under the same feudal law; and though he had courted the church on his invasion and accession, he now subjected it to a service which his predecessors regarded as a grievous slavery, and as totally unbefitting their profession. The bishops and abbots were obliged, when required, to furnish to the king, during war, a number of knights, or military tenants, proportioned to the extent of property possessed by each see or abbey; and they were liable, in case of failure, to the same penalties which were exacted from the laity. The Pope and the ecclesiastics excused against the king, he would have called it; but the king's authority was so well established over them, that he held every thing from his bounty, that superstition itself, even in that age, when it was most prevalent, was constrained to bend under his superior influence.

But the residence of the clergy were still natives, the king had much reason to dread the effects of their resentment; he therefore used the precaution of expelling the English from all the considerable dignities, and of advancing foreigners in their place. The partiality of the Confessor towards the Normans had been so great, that added by their superior learning, it had promoted them to many of the sees in England; and even before the period of the conquest, scarcely more than six or seven of the prelates were natives of the country. But among these was Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury; a man who, by his address and vigour, by the greatness of his family and allusions, by the exorbitance of his pretensions, and by the dignity of his office, and his authority among the English, gave jealousy to the king. Though William had, on his accession, avowed this prelate by employing the Archbishop of York to officiate at his consecration, he was careful from the first to secure this man with honours and carces, and to avoid giving him further offence till the opportunity should offer of effecting his final destruction. The suppression of the late rebellions, and the total subjection of the English, made him hope that an attempt against Stigand, however violent, would be covered by his great successes, and be overlooked amidst the other important revolutions which affected so deeply the property and dignity of the church. Yet notwithstanding his great advantages, he did not think it safe to violate the reverence usually paid to the prelate; but under cover of a new superstition, which he was the great instrument of introducing into England.

The doctrine which exalted the papacy in above all human power, had gradually diffused itself from the city and court of Rome; and was, during that age, much more prevalent in the southern than in the northern kingdoms of Europe. Pope Alexander who had assisted William in his conquests, naturally expected that the French and Normans would import into England the same reverence for his sacred character with which they were impressed in their own country; and would break the spiritual as well as civil independency of the Saxons, who had hitherto conducted their ecclesiastical government, with an acknowledgment of the French sovereign's protectorate, without maintaining the idea of its title to dominion or authority. As soon, therefore, as the Normans prince seemed fully established on the throne, the pope despatched Ermengof, Bishop of Sois, and the legate of the Roman church, to settle the subscription of the bishops of Normandy, and to reduce to the obedience that ever appeared with that character in any part of the British islands. The king, though he was probably led by principle to pay this submission to Rome, determined, as is usual, to employ the incident as a means of serving his political purposes, and of degrading those English prelates who were become obnoxious to him. The legate submitted to become the instrument of his tyranny; and thought, that the more violent the exertion of power, the more certain was its success. He manifested his intentions to the court from which he derived his commission. He summoned, therefore, a council of the prelates and abbots at Winchester; and being assisted by two cardinals, Peter and John, he cited before him Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, to answer for his conduct. The primate was accused of three crimes; the holding of the see of Winchester, together with that of Canterbury; the offering in the pall of Robert his predecessor; and the king received his own pall from Benedict IX. who was afterwards deposed for simony, and for intrusion into the papacy. These crimes of Stigand were mere pretences; since the first had been placed by the papacy on the primate of Canterbury, and was never any where subjected to a higher penalty than a resoluntation of one of the sees; the second was a pure ceremonial; and as Benedict was the only pope who then officiated, and his acts were never repealed, all the prelates of the church agreed that those who lay at a distance, were excusable for making their applications to him. Stigand's ruin, however, was resolved on, and was prosecuted with great severity. The legate degraded him from his dignity: the king confiscated his estate, and cast him into prison, where he continued, in poverty and want, during the remainder of his life. Like rigour was exercised against the other English prelates; Agelric, Bishop of Selency, and Aegelare, of Elmham, were deprived by the legate, and imprisoned by the king. Many considerable abbots shared the same fate: Egelwin, Bishop of Dunham, fled the kingdom: Wustan of Worcesters, a man of great learning, was the only one who made an effort that escaped this general proscription, and remained in possession of his dignity. Aldred, Archbishop of York, who had set the crown on William's head, had died a little before of grief and vexation, and had left his malechildren to that penance, and of the breach of his coronation.

2 The obsequies of all the subalterns, to put out their fires and light at his request, were described by the vassals of the English church. When the English cakes were wanted, for instance, the French had a custom of roasting them in the fire of the English, and sending the ashes to be buried in Normandy. See M. Moll, Hist. des Normands, p. 160. The same law of blood was observed by the French in Normandy.

tion oath, and of the extreme tyranny with which he saw he was determined to treat his English subjects.

It was a fixed maxim in this reign, as well as in some of his predecessors, that no native of the land was to be advanced to any dignity, ecclesiastical, civil, or military.

The king, therefore, upon Stigand's deposition, promoted Lanfranc, a Miscellaneous monk, celebrated for his learning, to the vacant see; and he was promoted, as rigid in defending the prerogatives of his station; and after a long process before the Pope, he obliged Thomas, a Norman monk, who had been appointed to the see of York, to resign his pretensions. (1) Hence, the Archbishop of Canterbury. Where ambition can be so happy as to cover its enterprises, even to the person himself, under the appearance of principle, it is the most insidious and offensive of all engines. Hence Land fit's are the last pronouncing the interests of the papacy, by which he himself augmented his own authority, was indefatigable; and met with proportioned success. The devoted attachment to Rome continually increased in England; and, being favourable by the sentiments of the conquerors, as well as by the monastic establishments formerly introduced by Edred and by Edgar, it soon reached the same height at which it had, during some time, stood in France and Italy.

It afterwards went much further; being favoured by that very remote situation which had at first obstructed its progress; and being less checked by knowledge and a liberal education, which were still somewhat morecommon in the North than in the South of England.

The prevalence of this superstition spirit became dangerous to some of William's successors, and incommodious to most of them; but the nub of this way of this king over the French church, and his extraordinary power over the foreigners, kept him from feeling any immediate inconveniences from it. He reaused the church in great subjection, as well as his lay subjects; and would allow none, of whatever character, to dispute his sovereignty, and not be satisfied with the consent of his prime minister; and the pleasure. He prohibited his subjects from acknowledging any one for Pope whom he himself had not previously received: he required that all the ecclesiastical canons and deans, and all the superintendents, who were subject to spiritual censures till he himself had given his consent to their excommunication. These regulations were worthy of a sovereign, and kept united the civil and ecclesiastical powers, which the principles introduced by this prince himself had an immediate tendency to separate.

But the English had the cruel mortification to find that this king's authority, however acquired or however extended in the South of his dominions, in the province, where it was employed in their own interests, and attended with every circumstance of insult and indignity, was deliberately formed by the prince, and wantonly prosecuted by his followers.

William had even entertained the difficult project of totally abolishing the English language; and, for that purpose, he ordered, that in all schools throughout the kingdom, the youth should be instructed in the French tongue; a practice which was continued from custom till after the reign of Edward III., and was never indeed totally discontinued in England. The pleadings in the supreme courts of judicature were in French: the deeds were written in that language, and the law was composed in that idiom: no other tongue was used at court: it became the language of all fashionable company; and the English themselves, ashamed of their own country, affected to excel in that foreign dialect. From this attention of William, and from the extensive foreign dominions long annexed to the crown of England, pro-

18 What these laws were of Edward the Conqueror, which the English, succeeded that mixture of French which is at present to be found in the English tongue, and which composes the greatest and best part of our language. But amidst those innovations, which he destroyed was the odious and odious the dominion of the exactions and the monasteries, by the remonstrances of some of his prelates, and by the earnest desires of the people, restored a few of the laws of King Edward; which, though seemingly of no great imper- nial effect, were to the agriculturists, and to the poor, a source of relief and comfort: but though the people had been subject to the weight and severity of the inhabitants, no longer had they been subject to the weight and severity of the Norman institutions. (1) The great earls, Morcar and Edwin, became now very disagreeable. Though they had retained their allegiance during this general insurrection of their countrymen, they had not joined the rebellion, and indeed they had innocently and (2) without the knowledge of their countrymen, from the last of the earls, William, who appeared to be inclined to join the rebels. (3) When they were proceeding to the siege of the Isle of Ely, they were met by the rebel Earl, in a negotiation, with a view of commencing an insurrection, Morcar took shelter in the Isle of Ely with the brave Hereward, who, secured by the inaccessibleness of the situation, still defended himself against the Normans. But this attempt was to little purpose. The contrary of the fighting was that the Earl of Ely, who from the last of the time to the present had hitherto been able to preserve their rank or fortune during the past convulsions. William employed all his endeavours to subdue the Isle of Ely; and having succeeded, he gained at the same time the title of the Earl of the English, and the power to dispose of the countrymen, which, at the same time, they themselves were exposed to the malignity of the conquerors, who, in most of the provinces, with the concurrence of the counties, made them so unhappy. But the attempt to make his escape into Scotland, was betrayed by some of his followers, and was killed by a party of Normans, to the great satisfaction of the English crown. But still the Earl was here, and when the English saw him, they were glad to make peace, and to pay the usual homage to the English crown. To complete his king's prosperity, Edgar Aetheling himself, desiring of success, and with the consent of his brother, who was receiving a decent pension for his subsistence, was permitted to live in England unmolested. But these acts of generosity towards the leaders were disgraceful, as usual, by William's rigour against the inferior malcontents. He ordered the hands to be let off, and the eyes to be put out, of many of the prisoners whom he had taken in the Isle of Ely: and he dispersed them in that miserable condition throughout the country, as monuments of his severity.

The province of Maine, in France, had, by the will of Herbert, the last count, fallen under the power of the Normans; and the laws which had been before his conquest of England; but the inhabitants, dissatisfied with the Norman government, and instigated by Fulk, Count of Anjou, who had some pretensions to the succession, or at least to the rebellion, had declared their desire to be freed from the dominion of the Normans, and to return to the laws and customs which had been in force before the defeat of the king. The full settlement of England afforded him leisure to punish the insult on his authority; but being unwilling to remove his Norman forces from this island, he carried over a considerable army composed almost entirely of English; and joining them to some troops levied in Normandy, he entered the revolted province. The English appeared amicable towards this enterprise, invented him this reflection, and by no means of retrieving that character of valour which had long been national among them; but which their late easy subjection under the Normans had somewhat degraded and obscured. Perhaps too they hoped that by their zeal and activity, they might recover the confidence of their sovereign, as their ancestors had formerly, by like means, gained the affection of Canute; and might conquer his inveterate propensity towards England. In consequence of this king's military conduct, seconded by these brave troops, soon overcame all opposition in Maine: the inhabitants were obliged to submit, and the Count of Anjou relinquished his pretensions.

But during these transactions the government of the young Henry was greatly disturbed; and that too by those very foreigner who owed every thing to the king's bounty, and who were the hated object of his friends. The regard for The Norman Barons, who had engaged with their duke in the conquest of England, were men of the most independent spirit; and though they obeyed their leader in the field, they would have been more prompt in the city; acquiesced, had they been required in return to submit, in their civil government, to the arbitrary will of one man. But the impious character of William, encouraged by his courtiers, and stimulated by his own ambition, compelleth by the necessity of his affairs, had prompted him, to stretch his authority over the Normans themselves beyond what the free genius of that victorious people could endure. The discontent was become general among those haughty nobles; and even Roger, Earl of Hereford, son and heir of Fitz-Osborne, the king's chief favourite, was strongly affected with them. This nobleman, intending the same project as his sister to Ralph de Guader, Earl of Norfolk, had thought it his duty to inform the king of his purpose, and to desire the royal consent; but meeting with a refusal, he proceeded nevertheless to complete the mutiny, and assembled all his friends, and those of Guader, to attend the solemnity. The two earls, disgusted by the denial of their request, and dreading William's resentment for their disobedience, here prepared measures for a revolt; and during the gaiety of the festival, while the consciousness of it would have been no unpleasing spectacle to the bystanders. They inveighed against the arbitrary conduct of the king; his tyranny over the English, whom they affected on this occasion to commiserate; his impious behavior; they would have removed with disdain his treacherous and inveterate intention of reducing the victors and the vanquished, to a like ignominious servitude. Amidst their complaints, the indignity of submitting to a bastard was not forgotten; the cortisus in possession, success in a people, by and often, the establishment of the Danes and the discontented English, was insisted on; and the whole company, inflamed with the same sentiments, and warmed by the jollity of the entertainment, entered, by a solemn engagement, into the design of shaking off the royal authority. Even Earl Waltheof, who was present, inconsiderately expressed his approbation of the conspiracy, and promised his concurrence towards its success.

This nobleman, the last of the English who, for some generations were governed by their own lords and chieftains, was now to feel the shadow of the Normans, and to submit to a foreign yoke. The earl of Northumberland, having, on some other dissuas from William, retired into Scotland, where he received the earldom of Dunbar from the bounty of Malcolm; Waltheof was appointed his successor, though his guilt, at least, was not less, to shew them the confidence and friendship of his sovereign. But as he was a man of generous principles, and loved his country, it is probable that the tyranny exercised over the English lay heavy upon his mind, and destroyed all the satisfaction which he could reap from his own grandeur and advancement. When a prospect therefore was opened of retrieving their liberty, he hastily embraced it; while the fumes of the liquor, and the ardour of the company, overpowered his better sense, and he proceeded in carrying on the enterprise, instead of being alleviated by that event, would become more grievous, under a multitude of foreign leaders, factious and ambitious, whose union and whose discord would be fatal to the nation. He was, indeed, at this moment with his council, and entertained no suspicion, but who, having secretly fixed her affections on another, took this opportunity of rushing her easy and credulous husband. She conveyed intelligence of the conspiracy to the king, and aggravated every circumstance, which, she believed, would tend to increase him against Waltheof, and render him absolutely incapable. Meanwhile the earl, still dubious with regard to the part which he should act, discovered the secret in confession to Lanfranc, on whose probity and judgment he had a great reliance. He was persuaded by the prelate, that he owed no fidelity to those rebellious barons whom he had by force of arms put to a crime; that his first duty was to his sovereign and benefactor; his next to himself and his family; and that, if he seized not the opportunity of making atonement for his guilt by registering it, the tyrant, against whom that was so great, that they would give some other person the means of acquiring the merit of the discovery. Waltheof, convinced by these arguments, went over to Normandy; but though he was well received by his king, and thanked for his fidelity, the account, previously transmitted by Judith, had sunk deep into William's mind, and had destroyed all the merit of her husband's repentance.

The conspirators, who were at Waltheof's house, immediately concluded their design to be betrayed; and they flew to arms before their schemes were ripe for execution, and before the arrival of the Danes, in whose aid they placed their chief confidence. The Earl of Hereford was checked by Walter de Lacy, a great baron in those parts, who, supported by the Bishop of Worcester, and the Abbot of Evesham, raised some forces, and prevented the Earl from passing the Severn, or advancing into the heart of the kingdom. The Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Chester, near Cambridge, by Odo, the regent, assisted by Richard de Bienfiaite and William de Wareme, the two justiciaries. The prisoners taken in this action had their right foot cut off, as a punishment of their transgressions. The son of William escaped to Norwich, thence to Denmark; where the Danish fleet, which had made an unsuccessful attempt upon the coast of England, soon after arrived, and brought him intelligence, that all his confederates were suppressed, and were either killed, banished, or taken prisoners. Ralph retired in despair to Brittany, where he possessed a large estate and extensive jurisdictions.

The king, who hastened over to England in order to suppress the insurrection, found that nothing remained but the punishment of the criminals, which he executed with great severity. Many of the rebels were hanged; some had their eyes put out; others their hands cut off. But William, notwithstanding these maxims, showed more lenity to their leader, the Earl of Hereford, who was only condemned to a forfeiture of his estate, and to imprisonment during pleasure. The king seemed even disposed to pardon him, if he would amend his ways; but being informed, by a fresh insinuace, provoked him to render his confinement perpetual. But Waltheof, being an Englishman, was not treated with so much humanity; A.D. 1075. longed for so rich a forrester, ordered him to be tried, condemned, and executed. The English, who considered this nobleman as the last resource of their nation, grievously lamented his fate, and fancied that miracles were wrought by his relics, as a testimony of his innocence and sanctity. The infamous Judith, falling soon after under the king’s displeasure, was abandoned by all the world, and passed the rest of her life in contempt and misery.

Nothing remained to complete William’s satisfaction, but the punishment of Ralph de Guader; and he hastened over to Normandy in order to gratify his vengeance on that criminal. But though the contest seemed very unequal between that formidable custom and the king of England, Ralph was so well supported both by the Earl of Brittany and the King of France, that William, after besieging him for some time in Dol, was obliged to abandon the enterprise, and make with those powerful princes a peace, in which Ralph himself was included. England, during his absence, remained in tranquillity; and nothing remarkable occurred, except two ecclesiastical synods which were summoned, one at London, another at Winchester. In the former, the precidency among the episcopal sees was settled, and the seat of some of them was removed from small villages to the most considerable town within the diocese. In the second was transacted a business of more importance.

The industry and perseverance are surprising, with which the Popes had been employed in searching powers and institutions, during so many ages of ignorance; while each pontiff employed every fraud for advancing purposes of imaginary piety, and cherished all claims which might turn to the advantage of his successors, though he himself could not expect ever to reap any benefit from them. All these impious store of spiritual and civil authority was now devolved on Gregory VII. of the name of Hildebrand, the most enterprising pontiff that had ever filled that chair, and was enabled by fear, desire, or modern policy, to make it a fully exercised the power of appointing the Pope on every vacancy, at least of ratifying his election; he undertook the arduous task of entirely dispossessing the ecclesiastical from the civil power, and of excluding profane laymen from the right which they had assumed of filling the vacancies of bishops, abbots, and other spiritual dignities. The sovereigns who had long exercised this power, and who had acquired it not by encroachments on the church, but on the people, to whom it originally belonged, made great opposition to this claim of the Council of Rome; and Henry IV., the young emperor, defended this prerogative of his crown with a vigour and resolution suitable to its importance. The few offices, either civil or military, which the feudal institutions left the sovereign the power of bestowing, made the prerogative of conferring the pastoral ring and staff, the most valuable jewel of the royal diadem; especially as the general ignorance of the age bestowed a consequence on the ecclesiastical offices, even beyond the great extent of power and property which belonged to them. Superstition, the child of ignorance, invested the clergy with an authority almost sacred; and as they engrossed the little learning of the age, their interposition became requisite in all civil business; and a real usefulness in common life was thus superadded to the spiritual sanctity of their character.

When the usurpations, therefore, of the church, had come to such maturity as to embolden her to attempt taxing the right ofinvestitures from the temporal power, Europe, especially Italy and Germany, was thrown into the most violent convulsions, and the Pope and the emperors agitated by the same. The sovereigns who had long exercised that prerogative as well as the sovereign pontiff, found it advantageous to form a league of their own against King Henry and his adherents, to pronounce him rightfully deposed, to free his subjects from their oaths of allegiance; and instead of shocking mankind by this gross encroachment on the civil authority, he found the stupid people ready to second his most exorbitant pretensions. Every minister, servant, or vassal of the emperor, who received any disgust, covered his rebellion under the pretence of principle; and even the mothers of this monarch, forgetting all the ties of nature, was seduced to countenance the insolence of his enemies. Princes themselves, not attentive to the pernicious consequences of those papal claims, joined them in the confusion, which, spreading into every city of Italy, engendered the parties of Guelph and Ghibelline; the most durable and most ineradicable factions that ever arose from the mixture of ambition and religious zeal. Besides numberless civil assaults and conspiracies, to which they gave rise, it is computed that the quarter occasioned no less than sixty battles in the reign of Henry IV., and eighteen in that of his successor, Henry V., when the claims of the sovereign pontiff finally prevailed.

But the bold spirit of Gregory, not dismayed by the vigorous opposition which he met with from the emperor, extended his usurpations all over Europe; and well knowing the nature of mankind, whose power is only invincible when it is evident to the most impudent pretensions, he seemed determined to set no bounds to the spiritual, or rather temporal, monarchy, which he had undertaken to erect. He proceded the sentence of excommunication against Nicephorus, Emperor of the East; Robert Guiscard, the adventurous Norman, who had acquired the dominion of Naples, was attacked by the same dangerous weapon, and Cleopatra was made a sacrifice in the rank of king; and even deprived Poland of the title of kingdom; he attempted to treat Philip King of France with the same rigour which he had employed against the emperor; he pretended to the entire property and dominion of Milan; and the adven- turers, who undertook to conquer it from the Saracens, and to hold it in vassalage under the see of Rome; even the Christian bishops, on whose and he relied for subduing the nation, to remain innocently and peacefully, were reduced to servitude and by assuming the whole legislative and judicial power of the church, to centre all authority in the sovereign pontiff.

William the Conqueror, the most potent, the most haughty, and the most vigorous prince in Europe, was not, amidst all his splendid successes, secure from the attacks of this enterprising pontiff. Gregory wrote him a letter, requiring him to fulfill his promise in doing homage to the kingdom of England to the see of Rome, and to send him over that tribute, which all his predecessors had been accustomed to pay to the Vicar of Christ. By the tribute, he meant an annual pension which, thought amongst the most important endowments of the Saxon princes, was interpreted, according to the usual practice of the Roman Church, to be a badge of subjection acknowledged by the kingdom. William replied, that the name should be remitted as usual; but that neither had he promised to do homage to Rome, nor was it in the least his purpose to impose that servitude on his state. And the better to show Gregory his independence, he ventured, notwithstanding the frequent complaints of the Pope, to refuse to the English bishops the liberty of attending a general council which that pontiff had summoned against his enemies.

But though the king displayed this vigour in supporting the royal dignity in his own kingdom, he did not perceive the ambitious scope of those institutions, which, under colour of strictness in religion, were introduced or promoted by the Court of Rome. Gregory, while he of excommunicating all Europe into confusion by his violence and impositions, affected an anxious care for the purity of manners; and even the chaste pleasures of the marriage-bed were inconsistent with the character which Gregory endeavoured to form. He had issued a decree prohibiting the marriage of priests, excommunicating all clergyman who retained their wives, declaring such unlawful commerce to be fornication, and rendering it criminal in the holy to attend divine worship, when such profane priests officiated at the altar. The point was a great object in the politics of the Roman pontiffs; and it cost them infinitely more pains to establish it, than the propagation of any speculative absurdity which they had ever attempted to introduce. Many synods were summoned in different parts of Europe, before it was finally settled; and it was there constantly remarked, that the younger clergyman composed church. But the Pope’s decree, this particular, and to which the chief reluctance appeared in those who were more advanced in years: an event so little consonant to men’s natural expectations, that it could not fail to be glozed on by those who disapproved of it. S. William allowed the Pope’s legate to assemble, in his absence, a synod at Winchester, in order to establish the celibacy of the clergy; but the church of England could not yet be carried the whole length expected. The synod was content with decreeing, that the bishops should not thenceforth ordain any priests or deacons without exacting from them a promise of celibacy; but they enacted, that none, except those who belonged to collegiate or cathedral churches, should be obliged to separate from their wives.

Revolts of Prince Robert. — But his long residence there was not entirely owing to his declared preference of that duty. Many years, thrown up in composition by those disturbances which had arisen in that favourite territory, and which had even originally proceeded from his own family. Robert, his eldest son, summoned by King Godfrey, Count of Champagne. His short reign was a prince who inherited all the bravery of his family and nation; but without that policy and dissimulation, by which his father was so much distinguished, and in which his mind was educated, he contributed to his great successes. Greedy of fame, impatient of contradiction, without reserve in his friendships, declared in his enmities, this prince could endure no control even from his imperious father, and openly apportioned to that independence which he so ardently desirous to maintain in his situation, strongly invited him. When William first received the submissions of the province of Maine, he had promised the inhabitants that Robert should be their prince; and before undertaking the expedition against England, he had, on the application of the French court, declared him his successor in Normandy, and had obliged the barons of that duchy to dehbm homage as their future sovereign. By this artifice, he had endeavoured to appease the jealousy of his neighbours, as affording them a prospect of separating England from his dominions on the continent; but when Robert demanded of him the execution of these projects, and the prisoner was also an object of revenge for the misconduct, and told him, according to the homely saying, that he never intended to throw off his clothes till he was to bed. Robert openly declared his discontent; and was suspected of secretly inviting the King of France and the Earl of Brittany to the opposition which they made to William, and which had formerly frustrated his attempts upon the town of Dol. And as the quarrel still augmented, Robert proceeded to entertain a strong jealousy of his two surviving brothers, William and Henry, for Richard was killed in hunting, by a stag, who, by greater submission and compliance, had acquired the affections of their father. In this disposition on both sides, the greatest strife sufficed to produce a rupture between them.

The three princes, residing with their father in the castle of the Angle in Normandy, were one day engaged in sport together; and the eldest also took a fancy of throwing over some water on Robert as he passed through the court on leaving their apartment; a frolic, which he would naturally have regarded as innocent, had it not been for the suggestions of Alberic de Gerberoy, the eldest son of Hugh de Verberie, who, while the prince had formerly deprived of his fortunes, when that house deserted him during his greatest difficulties in England. The young man, mindful of the injury, persuaded the prince that this action was meant as a public affront, which it behoved him in honour to resent; and the cholerine Robert, drawing his sword, ran up stairs, with an intention of taking revenge on his brothers. The whole castle was filled with tumult, which the king himself, who hastened from his apartment, found some difficulty to appease. But he could by no means appease the resentment of his eldest son, who, complaining of his partiality, and finding that his father was not disposed to compensate him for the insult, left the court that very evening, and hastened to Rouen, with an intention of seizing the citadel of that place. But being disappointed in this view by the preparation and the arrival of his brother, he fled to Hugh de Neufchatel, a powerful Norman baron, who gave him protection in his castles; and he openly levied war against his father. The popular character of the prince, and a similarity of manners, engaged all the young nobility of Normandy and Maine, as well as of Anjou and Brittany, to take part with him; and it was suspected, that Matilda, his mother, whose favourite he was, supported him in his rebellion by secret remittances of money, and by the encouragement which she gave his partisans.

All the hereditary provinces of William, as well as his family, were, during several years, thrown up in composition by the dissensions, which had been occasioned by the law which banished all monks, and by the great ferment which had at last obliged to have recourse to England, where that species of military government which he had established gave him greater authority than the ancient feudal institutions permitted. He entered into an engagement with Richard of Deines; and soon over an army of English under his ancient captains, who soon expelled Robert and his adherents from their retreats, and restored the authority of the sovereign in all his dominions. The French monarch then began to fill the castle of Gerberoy in the Beauvais, which the King of France, who secretly fomented all these dissensions, had provided for him. In this fortress he was closely besieged by his father, against whom, having a strong garrison, he made a bold stand. As the walls of this place many encounters which resembled more the single combats of chivalry, than the military actions of armies; but one of them was remarkable for its circumstances; and it was that, in order to engage the king, who was concealed by his helmet; and both of them being valiant, a fierce combat ensued, till at last the young prince wounded his father in the arm, and unloosed him. On his calling out for assistance, his voice discovered him to his son, who, struck with remorse for his past guilt, and astonished with the apprehensions of one much greater, which he had so neurously conceived, he prayed his son to give him due pardon for his offences, and offered to purchase forgiveness by any atonement. The resentment harbouring by William was so implacable, that he did not immediately correspond to this dutiful submission of his son with like tenderness; but giving him his malediction, departed for his own camp, on Robert’s horse, which that prince had assisted him to mount. He soon after raised the siege, and marched with his army to Normandy; where the introduction of the queen, and other common friends, brought about a reconciliation, which was probably not a little forwarded by the generosity of the son’s behaviour in this action, and by the returning sense of his past misconduct. The king seemed so fully appeased, that he even took Robert with him into England; where he intrusted him with the command of an army, in order to repel an inroad of Malcolm, King of Scotland, and to reorganize the happenings of the war. The prince, unable to resist William’s power, were, about the same time, necessitated to pay a compensation for their incursions; and every thing was reduced to full tranquillity in this island.

This state of affairs gave William leisure to begin and finish an undertaking, which proves his extensive genius, and does honour to his memory: it was a general survey of all the lands... in the kingdom, their extent in each district, their proprietors, tenures, value; the quantity of meadow, pasture, wood, and arable land, which they contained; and in some counties the number of tenants, cottagers, and slaves of all denominations, who lived upon them. He appointed commissioners to visit every particular in their register by the verdict of juries; and after a labour of six years (for the work was so long in finishing) brought him an exact account of all the landed property of his kingdom, in one document, called Doomsday book, the most valuable piece of antiquity possessed by any nation, is still preserved in the Exchequer; and though only some extracts of it have hitherto been published, it serves to illustrate to us, in many particulars, the ancient state of England.

The great Alfred had finished a like survey of the kingdom in his time, which was long kept at Winchester, and which probably served as a model to William in this undertaking.

The king was naturally a great economist; and though an prince had ever been more bountiful to his officers and servants, it was merely because he had rendered himself universal proprietor of England, and had a whole kingdom to bestow. He reserved an ample revenue for the crown, and in the general distribution of land among his followers, he kept possession of no less than 1422 manors in different parts of England, which paid him rent, either in money, or in corn, cattle, and the usual produce of the soil of certain parts of the country, that his annual fixed income, besides escheats, fines, revenues, and other casual profits to a great value, amounted to near 400,000 pounds a year; a sum which, if all circumstances be attended to, will appear widely incredible. A pound in that age, as we have already observed, contained three times the weight of silver that it does at present; and the same weight of silver, by the most probable computation, would purchase nearly three times the necessities of life, though not in the same proportion of the finer manufactures. This revenue, therefore, of William, would be equal to at least nine or ten millions at present; and as this prince had neither need nor army to support, the former being only an occasional expense, and the latter being maintained without any charge to him, by his military vassals, we must thence conclude, that no emperor or prince, in any age or nation, can be compared to the Conqueror for opulence and riches. This leads us to suspect a great mistake in the computation of the historians; though, if we consider that avarice is always imputed to William, as one of his vices, and that having by the sword received dominion of all the world, he would certainly in the partition retain a great proportion for his own share; we can scarcely be guilty of any error in ascertaining, that perhaps no king of England was ever so rich; and may be able to trace, the splendid and magnificent of a court, or could bestow more on his pleasures, or in liberality to his servants and favourites.

There was one pleasure, to which William, as well as all the Normans and ancient Saxons, was extremely addicted, and that was hunting; but this pleasure he indulged more at the expense of his unhappy subjects, whose interest he always disregarded, than to the loss or diminution of his own revenue. Not content with those large forests which former kings possessed in all parts of England, he resolved to make a new forest near Winchester, the usual place of his residence; and for that purpose he had wasted the country in Hampshire for an extent of thirty miles, expelled the inhabitants from their houses, seized their property, even demolished churches and convents, and made the sufferers no compensation for their injury. At the same time, he enacted new laws, by which he prohibited all his subjects from hunting in his forests, and rendered the penalties more severe than ever had been inflicted for such offences. The killing of a deer or boar, or even a hare, was punished with the loss of the delinquent's eyes; and that at a time, when the killing of a man would have been atoned for by paying a moderate fine or compensation. The transactions recorded during the remainder of this reign, may be considered more as domestic occurrences which concern the prince, than as national events which regard England. William had an only brother, Robert, by his wife Matilda, whom he had created Earl of Kent, and intrusted with a great share of power during his whole reign, had amassed immense riches; and agreeably to the usual progress of his mind, he regarded his present possessions but as a step to further grandeur. He had formed the chimerical project of buying the papacy; and though Gregory, the reigning Pope, was not of advanced years, the prelate had confided so much in the pretensions of an astrologer, that he reckoned upon the pontiff's death, and upon attaining, by his own intrigues and money, that envied state of greatness. Resolving, therefore, to remit all his riches to Italy, he had persuaded many considerable barons, and among the rest, Hugh, Earl of Chester, to take the same course; in hopes that, when he should mount the papal throne, he would bestow on them more considerable establishments in that country. The king, from whose projects had been carefully concealed, at last got intelligence of the design, and ordered Odo to be arrested. His officers, from respect to the immunities which the ecclesiastics now assumed, scrupled to execute the command; but the king humbly intreated them to seize him; and when Odo insisted that he was a prelate, and exempt from all temporal jurisdiction, William replied, that he arrested him not as Bishop of Bayeux, but as Earl of Kent. He was sent prisoner to Normandy; and not long afterwards, the remonstrances and menaces of Gregory, was detained in custody during the remainder of this reign.

Another domestic event gave the king much more concern; it was the death of Matilda, his consort, whom he tenderly loved, and for whom he had ever preserved the most sincere friendship. Three years afterwards he passed into Normandy, and curtailed with him Edgar Atheling, to whom he granted permission to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. He was detained on the continent by a misunderstanding, which broke out between William and him and the King of France, and which was occasioned by intrads made into Normandy by some French barons on the frontiers. It was little in the power of princes at that time to restrain their licentious nobility; but William suspected, that these barons durst not have proceeded so impudently, if the countenance and protection of Philip. His displeasure was increased by the account he received of some ruffians which that monarch had thrown out against him. William, finding that by his treaty he had been detained in bed some time by sickness; upon which Philip expressed his surprise that his brother of England should be so long in being delivered of his big belly. The king sent him word, that, as soon as he was up, he would present so many lights at Notre-dame, as would perhaps give little pleasure to the King of France; alluding to the usual practice at that time of women after child-birth. Immediately on his recovery, he led an army into Lisle de France, and laid every thing waste with fire and sword. He took the town of Monte, which he reduced to ashes.

But the progress of these hostilities was stopped by an accident which soon after put an end to William's life. His horse, being carried away, was instantly bruised on the pommel of the saddle; and being in a bad habit of body, as well as somewhat advanced in years, he began to apprehend the consequences, and ordered himself to be carried in a litter to the monastery of St. Croyes. Finding his illness increase, and being sensible of the approach of death, he discovered at last the vanity of all human grandeur, and was struck with remorse for those horrible cruelties and acts of violence, which in the attainment and defence of it, he had committed during the course of his he, as has been the case with most conquerors, was obliged to make atonement by presents to churches and monasteries; and he issued orders, that Earl Morcar, Seward, Beare, and other English princes, should be set at liberty. He was even prevailed on, though not without reluctance, to con-ce not his subjects. He also sudden an abbot of the principal Roman church against whom he was extremely incensed. He left Norm-

CHAPTER V.

WILLIAM RUFUS.

Accessions of William Rufus—Conspiracy against the king—Invasion of Normandy—The marriage of Eustace—The interior government of England.

Accessions of William Rufus.

WILLIAM, afterwards Rufus, or the Red, from the colour of his hair, had no sooner procured his father's recommendatory letter to Lanfranc, the primate, than he hastened to take measures for the government of England. Sensible that a deed so unusual, and so little prepared, which violated Robert's right of primogeniture, might meet with great opposition, he trusted entirely for success to his own office, and having left St. Gervas, while William was breathing his last, he arrived in England before intelligence of his father's death had reached that kingdom.\(^a\)

Pretending orders from the king, he secured the fortresses of Dover, Pevensey, and Hastings, whose situation rendered them of the greatest importance; and he got possession of the royal treasure at Winchester, amounting to the sum of sixty thousand pounds, by which he hoped to encourage and increase his partisans.\(^b\) The primate, whose rank and reputation in the kingdom gave him great authority, had been intrusted with the care of his education, and had conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and being connected with him by these ties, and probably dooming his resentment, he declared that he would pay a willing obedience to the last will of the Conqueror, his friend and benefactor. Having assembled some bishops, and some of the principal nobility, he instantly proceeded to the ceremony of crowning his new king, and by this despatch endeavoured to prevent all faction and resistance. At the same time Robert, who had been already acknowledged successor to Normandy, took peaceable possession of that duchy.

But though this partition appeared to have been made without any violence or opposition, there remained in England many causes of discord, which seemed to menace that kingdom with a sudden revolution. The barons who generally possessed large estates both in England and in Normandy, were uneasy at the separation of those territories; and foresaw, that as it would be impossible for them to preserve long their allegiance to two masters, they must necessarily resign either their ancient patrimony or their new acquisitions.\(^c\) Robert's title to the duchy he esteemed incontestable, his claim to the kingdom plausible; and they all desired that this prince, who alone had any pretensions to unite these states, should be put in possession of both. A comparison also of the personal qualities of the two brothers led them to give the preference to the elder. The duke was brave, open, sincere, generous. Even his predominant faults, his extreme insolence and facility, were not disagreeable to those haughty barons, who affected independence, and submitted with reluctance to a rigorous administration in their sovereign. The king, though equally brave, was violent, haughty, tyrannical, and seemed disposed to govern more by the fear than by the love of his subjects. Oslo, Bishop of Bauges, and Robert, Earl of Mortagne, maternal brothers of the Conqueror, enquiring the great credit of Lanfranc, which was increased by his late services, enforced all these motives with their partisans, and engaged them in a formal conspiracy to dethrone the king. They communicated their design to Eustace, Count of Bolognæ; Roger, Earl of Shrewsbury and Arundel; Robert de Belme, his eldest son; William, Bishop of Durham; Robert de Moulrey; Roger Bigod; Hugh de Gontremesnil; and they easily procured the assent of these potent noblemen. The conspirators, returning to their castles, hastened to put themselves in a military posture; and expecting to be soon supported by a powerful army from Normandy, they had already begun hostilities in many places.

The king, sensible of his perilous situation, endeavoured to engage the affections of the native English. As that people were now so thoroughly subduèd that they no longer aspired to the recovery of their ancient liberties, and were content with the prospect of some mitigation in the tyranny of the new princes, they zealously supported the king, because, upon receiving general promises of good treatment, and of enjoying the licence of hunting in the royal forests. The king was soon in a situation to take the field; and as he knew the ill effects of delay, he suddenly proceeded to the Kent; where his uncle had already seized the fortresses of Pevensey and Rochester. These places he successively reduced by famine; and though he was prevailed on by the Earl of Chester to desist from the further attempts of the Angevins of the church, held sacred in those days, were a feeble rampart against his usurpations. He seized the temporary of all the vacant bishoprics and abbeys; he relieved them of the tribute; he gave the prelates a new settlement of successions; that he might the longer enjoy the profits of their revenue; he bestowed some of the church lands in property on his captains and favourites; and he openly set to sale such sees and abbeys as he thought proper to dispose of. Though the murmur of the ecclesiastics, which were quickly propagated to the nation, rose high against this grievance, the terror of William's authority, confirmed by the suppression of the late insurrections, retained every one in his position, and preserved general tranquillity in England.

The king even thought himself enabled to disturb his brother in the possession of Normandy. But the administration of that prince had imboldened the Norman barons to affect a great independence; and their mutual quarrels and devastations had rendered that whole territory a scene of violence and outrage. Two of them, Walter and Oto, were hired by William to deliver the fortresses of St. Valori and Albemarle into his hands. Others soon after imitated the example of revolt; while Philip, king of France, who ought to have protected his vassal in the possession of his fief, was, after making some efforts in his favour, engaged by large presents to remain neutral. The duke had also reason to apprehend danger from the intrigues of his brother Henry. This young prince, who had inherited the courage and spirit of his father, had some of his money, had furnished Robert, while he was making his preparations against England, with the sum of three thousand marks; and in return for so slender a supply, had been put in possession of those territories comprehended near a third of the duchy of Normandy. Robert afterwards, upon some suspicion, threw him into prison; but finding himself exposed to invasion from the King of England, and dreading the reduction of the barons his brothers against him, he now gave Henry his liberty, and even made use of his assistance in suppressing the insurrections of his rebellious subjects. Conan, a rich baron of Housen, had entered into a conspiracy to deliver that city

\(^b\) Chron. Sax., p. 193. 9 Virginius, in 1007.
The king appeared in Normandy at the head of an army; and affairs seemed to have come to extremity between the French and English, so strongly connected by interest and alliances, interposed and mediated an accommodation. The chief advantage of this treaty accrued to William, who obtained possession of the county of Flanders, Flanders, and other places: but in return he promised that he would assist his brother to subduing Maine, which had rebelled; and that the Norman barons, attainted to Robert's cause, might conduct themselves to England.

The two brothers also stipulated, that on the demise of either without issue, the survivor should inherit all his dominions; and twelve of the most powerful barons on each side swore, that they would employ their power to preserve the effects of the whole treaty: a strong proof of the great independence and authority of the nobles in those ages!

Prince Henry, distressed that so little care had been taken of his brother, sprang to his horse, and advanced to St. Michael’s Mount, a strong fortress on the coast of Normandy, and infested the neighbourhood with his incursions. Robert and William, with their joint forces, besieged his post, but were compelled to give it up by the scarcity of water; when the elder, hearing of his distress, granted him permission to supply himself, and also sent him some pipes of wine for his own table. Being received by William with open arms, he was permitted to return to his own country, and to justify himself, fought in the presence of the court at Windsor, a duel with Geoffrey Basset, who accused him. But being worsted in the combat, he was compelled to make satisfaction, and to have his eyes put out. William de Alder, another conspirator, was supposed to be treated with more rigour, when he was sentenced to be hanged.

The continued intestine discord among the barons was alone in that age destructive; the public wars were commonly short and feeble, produced little bloodshed, and were attended with no immense calamity. To this dissension was, which was so soon concluded, there succeeded hostilities with Scotland, which were not of longer duration. Robert here commanded his brother’s army, and obliged Malcolm to accept of peace, and to make the homage to the crown of England.

This peace was not more durable. Malcolm, two years after, levying an army, invaded England; after ravaging Northumberland, he laid siege to Alnwick, where a party of Earl Mounbray’s troops falling upon him by surprise, a sharp action ensued in which Malcolm was slain. This incident interrupted for some years the regular succession to the Scottish crown. Though Malcolm left legitimate sons, his brother Donald, on account of the youth of these princes, was advanced to the throne; but kept not long possession of it. Duncan, natural son of Malcolm, formed a conspiracy against him; and being assisted by William with a small force, made himself master of the kingdom. New broils ensued with Normandy. The frank, open, tempestuous manner of Robert was all fitted to withstand the interested, rapacious character of William, who, supported by greater power, was still encroaching on his brother’s possessions, and uniting his turbulent barons to rebellion against him.

The king, having gone over to Normandy, to support his partisans, ordered an army of twenty thousand men to take a station against the English, who were conducted to the sea-coast, as if they were instantly to be embarked. Here Ralph Flammond, the king’s minister, and the chief instrument of his extortions, exacted ten shillings apiece of them, in his name, and then dismissed them into their several counties. This money was so skilfully employed by William, that it rendered him better service than he could have expected from the army. The French had sent orders to the barons to depart from the protection of Robert; and to daily bribe the Norman barons to desert his service; but was prevented from pushing his advantages by an occurrence of the French, which obliged him to return to England. He found no difficulty in repelling the enemy; but was not able to make any considerable impression on a country guarded by its mountainous situation. The conspiracy of his eldest barons was also detected at this time, appeared more serious concern, and engrossed all his attention. Robert Mounbray, Earl of Northumberland, was at the head of this combination; and he engaged in it the Count d’Eu, Richard de Tunbridge, Roger de Lacevy, and many others.

The purpose of the conspirators was to dethrone the king, and to advance in his stead Stephen, Count of Aumale, nephew to the Conqueror. William’s despatch prevented the design from being effectual, and engaged the count and his associates in the spirit of fidelity against their royal master, which, not long after, brought about the overthrow of the said Conqueror and his family.

The barons of the county of Flanders and Hainault, from the influence of the psalms, and the example of the Crusades, which now engrossed the attention of Europe, and have ever since engaged the curiosity of Christians, have adopted the idea of lending an army to the Christians, with the greatest interest in the possession of human folly that has yet appeared in any age or nation. After Mahomet had, by means of his pretended revelations, united the dispersed Arabs into one head, they issued forth from their deserts in great multitudes; and being animated with zeal for their new religion, and supported by the vigour of their new government, they made deep impression on the Eastern empire, which was far in the decline, with regard both to military discipline and to civil policy. Jerusalem, by its situation, became one of their most easy conquests; and the Christians had the mortification to see the holy sepulchre, and the other places consecrated by the piety of their first founder, fallen into the possession of infidels. But the Arabs or Saracens were so employed to military enterprises, by which they spread their empire, in a few years, from the banks of the Caucasus to the Straits of Gibraltar, and to the west of the Pyrenees. The original monument of their faith, seems to contain some violent precepts, they were much less infected with the spirit of bigotry and persecution, than the indolent and speculative Greeks, who were continually refining on the several articles of their religious system.

They gave little disturbance to those zealous pilgrims, who daily flocked to Jerusalem; and they allowed every one that wished to visit the holy sepulchre, to perform his religious dutie, and to return to peace. But the Turcomans or Turks, a tribe of Tartars, who had embraced Mahometanism, having wrested Syria from the Saracens, and having in the year 1065 made themselves masters of Jerusalem, rendered the pilgrimage much more difficult and dangerous to the Christians. The barbarity of their manners, and the confusions attending their unsettled government, oppressed the pilgrims to many insults, robberies, and extortions; and these zealots, returning from their meritorious fatigue and sufferings, filled all Christendom with indignation against the infidels, who were the authors of all these misfortunes, by their presence, and derided the sacred mysteries in the very place of their completion. Gregory VII. among the other vast ideas which he entertained, had formed the design of uniting all the Western Christians against the Mahometans; but the egregious and violent invasions of that pontiff on the civil power of princes, had created him so many enemies, and had rendered his schemes so suspicious, as not to allay the great progress of this undertaking. The work was reserved for a more fit instrument, whose low condition in life exposed him to no jealousy, and whose folly was well calculated to coincide with all the prevailing principles of the Peter. Commonly called the Hermit, a native of Amiens in Picardy, had made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Being deeply affected with the dangers to which that act of piety now exposed the pilgrims, as well as with the instances of the carnage which the Eastern Christians labouring, he entertained the bold, and in all appearance impene-table, project of leading into Asia from the furthest extremities of the West, armies sufficient to subdue those potent and warlike nations which now held the holy city in subjection. He proposed his views to Martin II., who filled the papal chair, and who, though sensible of the advantages which the head of the Christian religion might expect from a religious war, and though he esteemed the blind zeal of Peter a reason for effecting the purpose, resolved not to interpose his authority, till he saw a greater probability of success. He summoned a council at Placentia, which consisted of four thousand ecclesiastics, and of twenty thousand civil lords; and which was so numerous that no hall could contain the multitude, and it was necessary to hold the assembly in a plain. The hangers of the Pope, and of Peter himself, representing the dismal situation of their brethren in the East, and the indignity suffered by the Christian name, in allowing the holy city to remain in the hands of infidels, here found the minds of men so well prepared, that the whole multitude, blindly and violently declared for the war, and solemnly devolved upon themselves to perform this service, so meritorious, as they believed it, to God and religion.

But though Italy seemed thus to have zealously em-abled the enterprise, Martin knew that, in order to assure success, it was necessary to enlist the greater and more warlike nations in the same engagement; and having previously exhorted Peter to visit the chief cities and sovereigns of Christendom, he summoned another council at Clermont in Auvergne. The fame of this great and pious design, being now universally diffused, procured the attendance of the greatest prelates, nobles, and princes, and when the Pope and the Hermit renewed their pathetic exhortations, the whole assembly, immediately moved, not moved by their preceding impressions, exclaimed with one voice, IT is the will of God, It is the will of God! words deemed so memorable, and so inculcated with a deep reverence of a divine influence, that they were employed as the signal of rendezvous and battle in all the future exploits of those adventurers. Men of all ranks flew to arms with the utmost ardor; and an exterior symbol too, a circumstance of chief moment, was here chosen by the devoted combatants. The age of the cross, which had been hitherto so much revered among Christians, and which, the more it was an object of reproach among the pagan world, was the more passionately che-rushed by them, because the badge of union, and was affixed to their right shoulder, by all who enlisted themselves in this sacred war.

Europe was at this time sunk into profound ignorance and superstition: the ecclesiastics had acquired the greatest ascendancy over the human mind: the people, who, being little restrained by honour, and less by law, abandoned themselves to the worst crimes and disorders, knew of no other expiation than the observances imposed on them by their spiritual pastors: and it was easy to represent the holy war as an equivalent for all penances, and an atonement for every violation of justice and humanity. But, amidst the object superstition which now prevailed, the military spirit also had universally diffused itself; and though not supported by art or discipline, was because the general character of the nations governed by the feudal law. All the great lords possessed the right of peace and war: they were engaged in perpetual hostilities with each other: the open country was become a scene of outrage and massacre, the roads being guarded by walls nor protected by privileges, and were exposed to every insult: individuals were obliged to depend for safety on their own force, or their private alliances: and valour was the only excellence which was held in veneration, or gave one man the right to another. When all the particular superstitions, therefore, were here united in one great object, the ardour for military enterprises took the same direction; and Europe, impelled by the blind and passionate spirit of revenge, as it were, from its foundations, and seemed to precipitate itself in one united body upon the East.

All orders of men, deeming the Crusades the only road to heaven, enlisted themselves under these sacred banners, and were impatient to open the way with their sword to the holy city. Nobles, artisans, peasants, even priests, enrolled their names; and to decline this meritorious service was branded with the reproach of impious, or what perhaps was esteemed in those times violation of piety, and puerility. The inform and aged contributed to the expedition by presents and money; and many of them, not satisfied with the merit of this atonement, attended it in person, and brought their personal troops; and thus, in their last sight of that city where their Saviour had died for them. Women themselves, concealing their sex under the disguise of armour, attended the camp; and commonly forgot still more the duty of their sex, in protecting themselves, without reserve, to the army. The greatest criminals were forward in a service, which they regarded as a propitiation for all crimes; and the most enormous disorders were, during the course of those expeditions, committed; among men, iniquity turned to the worst example, and impelled by necessity. The multitude of the adventurers soon became so great, that their more sagacious leaders, Hugh, Count of Vermandois, brother to the French king, Raymond, Count of Toulouse, Goddrey of Bouillon, Prince of Bézant, and Stephen, Count of Blois, became apprehensive lest the greatness itself of the armament should disappoint its purpose; and they permitted an uncontrolled multitude, composed of 300,000 men, to go before them, under the command of Peter the Hermit, and Waler the Moneyless. These men took the road towards Constantinople through Hungary and Bulgaria, and trusting that Heaven, by supernatural power, would supply them with the means of subsistence, the march went on without provision for subsistence on their march. They soon found themselves obliged to obtain by plunder, what they had vainly expected from miracles; and the enraged inhabitants of every city and village, only considered the pillaging bands gathered together in arms, attacked the disorderly multitude, and put them to slaughter without resistance. The more disciplined armed forces followed after; and passing the straits at Constantinople, they were mustered in the plains of Asia, and amounted in the whole to the number of 700,000 combatants.

Amidst this universal frenzy, which spread itself by contagion throughout Europe; especially in Italy and Germany, were not entirely forgetful of their present interests; and both those who went on this expedition, and those who stayed behind, entertained schemes of gratifying, by its means, their avarice or their ambition. The nobles who enlisted themselves were moved, from the romantic spirit of the age, to hope for opulent establishments in the East, the chief seat of arts and commerce during those ages; and in pursuit of these chimerical projects, they sold at the lowest price their ancient castles and inheritances, which had now lost all value in their own eyes. The greater princes, who remained at home, besides establishing peace in their dominions by giving occupation abroad to the ineptitude and madness of those upon their subjects, took the opportunity of amassing a 5 History Bell. Sacri, tom. 2. Manue Lat.

If this story be true, it is probable that he meant only to abuse himself by turning both into ridicule: but we must be cautious of admitting every thing related by the monkish historians to the disadvantage of this prince: he had the misfortune to be engaged in quarrels with the ecclesiastics, particularly with Anselm; commonly called St. Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury; and it is no wonder his memory should be blackened by the historians of that order.

After the death of Lanfranc, the king, for several years, retained in his own hands the accounts of the revenues of Canterbury, as he did those of many other vacant bishoprics; but falling into a dangerous sickness, he was seized with remorse, and the clergy represented to him his rashness; but he would not repent of it, if before his death he did not make atonement for those multiplied impieties and sacrileges, of which he had been guilty. He resolved therefore to supply instantly the vacancy of Canterbury; and for that purpose he sent for Anselm, a Piedmontese by birth, Abbot of Bec in Normandy, who was much celebrated for his learning and piety. The Abbot earnestly refused the dignity, fell on his knees, wept, and entreated the king to change his purpose; and when he found the prince obstinate in forcing the pastoral staff upon him, he kept his fist so fast clenched, that it required the utmost violence of the bystanders to open it, and force him to resign.

William soon after recovered, and his passions regaining their wonted vigour, he returned to his former violence and rapine. He detained in prison several persons whom he had ordered to be freed during the time of his penance; he still prevailed on the ecclesiastics to consign to him the revenues of the Church of Canterbury, which he had been in the habit of appropriating to himself; and he had reason to expect from the ostentatious humility which that prelate had displayed in refusing his promotion.

The opposition made by Anselm was the more dangerous to the king, who was in the habit of gauging the value of his subjects' vassals and possessions; and he had soon ascertained the value of Anselm's estates in England, by his great zeal against all abuses, particularly those in dress and ornament. There was a mode, which, in that age, prevailed throughout Europe, both among men and women, of adorning their persons with an enormous length of ribbon and gold, with a shoe, to a sharp point, and to the figure of a bird's bill, or some such ornament, which was turned upwards, and which was often sustained by gold or silver chains tied to the knee. The ecclesiastics took occasion at this time of the king's penance, and said an attempt to belie the Scripture, where it is affirmed, that no man can add a cup to his stature; and they denounced against it with great vehemence, nay, assembled some seeds, which were afterwards sown. But, such are the strange contradictions in human nature: though the clergy, at that time, could overturn thrones, and had authority sufficient to send above a million of men on their errand to the deserts of Asia, they could never prevail against those long-pointed shoes: on the contrary, that caprice, contrary to all other modes, maintained its ground during several centuries; and if the clergy had not at last desisted from their persecution of it, it might still have been the prevailing fashion in Europe.

But Anselm was more fortunate in decting the particular mode which was the object of his aversion, and which probably had not the same fast hold of the affections of the people. He preached sedulously against the long hair and curled locks which were then fashionable among the courtiers; he refused the ashes on Ash-Wednesday to those who were so accoutrèd; and his authority and eloquence had such influence, that the young and universally abandoned that ornament, and appeared in the cropt hair, which was recommended to them by the sermons of the primates. The noted historian of Anselm, who was also his companion and secretary, celebrates highly this effort of his zeal and piety.

When William's profaneness therefore returned to him with his health, he was soon engaged in controversies with this austere prelate. There was at that time a schism in the church between Urban and Clement, who both pretended to the papacy; 1 and Anselm, who, as Abbé of Bec, had already acknowledged the former, was determined, without the king's consent, to introduce his authority into England. 2 William, who, imitating his father's example, had prohibited his subjects from recognizing any prelates, who had not personally received, was extorted at this attempt; and summoned a synod at Rockingham, with an intention of deposing Anselm: but the prelate's suffragans declared, that without the papal authority, they knew no warrant for inflicting so punishment on their primate. 3 The king was at last engaged by other motives to give the preference to Urban's title; Anselm received the pall from that pontiff; and matters seemed to be accommodated between the king and the primate, 4 when the quarrel broke out afresh from a new cause. William had undertaken an expedition against Wales, and required the archbishop to furnish his quota of soldiers for that service; but Anselm, who regarded the demand as an oppression on the church, and yet durst not refuse compliance, sent them so miserably equipped, that the king was extremely displeased, and threatened him with a prosecution. 5 Anselm, on the other hand, demanded positively the title of the bishop of Bath, which was retired to aliquot to Rome against the king's injustice; 6 and came to such extremities, that the primate, finding it dangerous to remain in the kingdom, desired and obtained the pope's leave to retire beyond seas. All his temporale were scarred; 7 but he was received with great respect by Urban, who considered him as a martyr in the cause of religion, and even menaced the king, on account of his proceedings against the primate and the church, with the sentence of excommunication. Anselm assisted at the council of Bar, where, besides fixing the controversy between the Greek and Latin churches, concerning the procession of the Holy Ghost, 8 the right of election to church preferments was declared to belong to the clergy alone, and spiritual censures were denounced against all ecclesiastics, who did homage to laymen for their sees or benefices, and against all hymen who exalted it. 9 The right of homage, by the feudal customs, was, that the vassal should throw himself on his knees, should put his joined hands between those of his superior, and should in that posture swear fealty to him. 10 But the council declared it excessive, that the hands should first salute God, and could offer him up as a sacrifice for the salvation of mankind, should be put, after this humiliating manner, between profane hands, which, besides being injur'd to mine and contaminating the sacred vessels of the temple, might perhaps be employed in sacrilege, or obscene contents. 11 Such were the reasonings prevalent in that age; reasonings which, though they cannot be passed over in silence, without omitting the most curious, and perhaps not the least instructive, part of history, can scarcely be delivered with the requisite decency and gravity.

Duke Robert increased the king's territories; but brought him no great increase of power, because of the unsettled state of those countries, the mutinous disposition of the barons, and the v implacability of the French king, who supported them in all their insurrections. Even Henry, who had at first been a friend to Anjou, was able to give him inquietude; and this great monarch was oblig'd to make several expeditions abroad, without being able to prevail over so petty a baron, who had acquired the confidence, and the respect of the inhabitants of Maine.

He was, however, so fortunate as at last to take his prisoner in a encounter; but having released him, at the intervention of the French king and the Count of Anjou, he found the province of Maine still exposed to his intrigues and incursions. Helie, being introduced by the citizens into the town of Mans, besieged the garrison in the citadel: William, who was hunting in the new forest when he received intelligence of this hostile attempt, was so provoked, that he immediately repaired to the sea-shore at Dartmouth; declaring, that he would not stop a moment till he had taken vengeance for the offence. He found the weather so cold and tempestuous, that the mariners though they were brave and expert mariners, could not stand on board, and ordered them to set sail instantly, telling them, that they never yet heard of a king that was drown'd. 12 By this vigour and celerity, he delivered the citadel of Mans from its foreign danger; and pursuing Helie into his own territories, he had siege to Maplo, a small castle in those parts: but a wound, which he received before this place, obliged him to raise the siege; and he returned to England.

The weakness of the greatest monarchs, during this age, in their military expeditions against their nearest neighbours, appears the more surprising, when we consider the prodigious numbers which even petty princes, seconding the dictates of the popular rage, were able to assemble, and to conduct in dangerous enterprises to the remote provinces of Asia. William, Earl of Potters and Duke of Guene, inflamed with the glory, and not discouraged by the misfortunes of his predecessor, who had perished in the Crusades, had put himself at the head of an immense multitude, computed by some historians to amount to 60,000 horse, and a much greater number of foot, 13 and he prayed popes and emperors to send him the arms which should enable him to invade the Holy Land. He wanted money to forward the preparations requisite for this expedition, and he offered to mortgage all his dominions to William, without entertaining any scruple on account of that magnanimous and generous hand to which he resolved to consign them. 14 The king accepted the offer; and had prepared a fleet and an army, in order to escort the money, and take possession of the rich provinces of Guene and Fournou; when an accident put an end to his life, and to all his ambitious projects.

He was engaged in hunting, the sole amusement, and indeed the chief occupation, of princes in those rude times, when society was little cultivated, and the arts afforded few objects worthy of attention. Walter Tyrel, a French gentleman, remarkable for his address in archery, attended him in this recreation, of which the new forest was the scene; and as William had discharged after a most prodigious and impatient to show his prowess, he set a mark for him on a stag, which he suddenly started before him. The arrow, glancing from a tree, struck the king in the breast, and instantly slew him; 15 while the monarch, though surprised, and exasperated at the accident, put spurs to his horse, hastened to the sea-shore, embarked for France, and joined the Crusade in an expedition to Jerusalem; a penance which he imposed on himself for this involuntary crime. The body of William was found in the forest by the country people, and was buried without any pomp or ceremony at Winchester. His courtiers were negligent in performing the last duties to a master who was so little beloved; and every one was too much occupied in the interesting object of fixing his successor, to attend the funeral of a dead sovereign.

The memory of this monarch is transmitted by us with little advantage by the chroniclers, W. W. W. W. W. whom he has left no happy successor, and at the same time, may suspect, in general, that their account of his vices is somewhat exaggerated, his conduct affords little reason for contradicting the character which they have assigned him, or for attributing to him, such and such extraordinary actions. He is said to have been a violent and tyrannical prince; a perfidious, encroaching, and dangerous neighbour; an unkind and ungrateful relation. He was equally prodigal and rapacious in the management of his treasury; and if he possessed abilities, he lay so much under the government of impetuous passions, that he made little use of them in his administration; and he indulged, without reserve, that determinate policy, which suited his temper, and which, if supported, as it was in him, with courage and vigour, proved often more successful in disorderly times, than the deepest foresight and most refined artifice.

The monuments of which remain of this prince in England, are the Westminster Hall, and London Bridge, which he built. The most laudable foreign enterprise which he undertook, was the sending of Edgar Atheling, three years before his death, into Scotland with a small army, to restore Prince Edgar, the true heir of that kingdom, son of Malcolm, and of Margaret, sister of Edgar Atheling; and the enterprise proved successful. It was remarked in that age, that Richard, an elder brother of William's, perished by an accident in the new forest; Richard, his nephew, natural son of Duke Robert, lost his life in the same place, after the same manner. And all men, upon the king's fate, exclaimed, that, as the Conqueror had been guilty of extreme violence, in expelling all the inhabitants of that large district to make room for his game, the just vengeance of Heaven was signalized, in the same place, by the slaughter of his posterity. William was killed in the thirteenth year of his reign, and about the tenth of his age. As he was never married he left no legitimate issue.

In the eleventh year of this reign, Magnus, King of Norway, made a descent on the Isle of Anglesey, but was repulsed by him, then amongst his forces. This was the last attempt made by the northern nations upon England. That restless people seem about this time to have learnt the practice of tillage, which thenceforth kept them at home, and was the source of their subsistence, which, from past customs and their nature, spread over them by those pitiable invaders. This proved one great cause of the subsequent settlement and improvement of the southern counties.

HENRY I.

A.D. 1100.

After the adventurers in the holy war
The Crusades, were assembled on the banks of the Rhophus, opposite to Constantinople, they proceeded on their enterprise; but immediately experienced those difficulties which their zeal had hitherto concealed from them, and for which, even if they had landed, it would have been almost impossible to provide a remedy. The Greek emperors, Alexis Comnenus, who had applied to the Western Christians to succour against the Turks, entertained hopes, and those but feeble ones, of obtaining such a moderate supply, as, acting under his command, might enable him to repulse the enemy. But he was extremely astonished to see his dominions overwhelmed, on a sudden, by such an invasion of inextricable barbarians, who, though they pretended friendship, despised his subjects as uncivilized, and detested them as heretical. By all the arts of policy, by which he excelled, he endeavoured to divert the torrent; but while he employed professions, eulogies, civilities, and warning services towards the invaders of the Crusade, he secretly regarded those impetuous allies as more dangerous than the open enemies by whom his empire had been formerly invaded. Having effected that difficult point of dissuading his soldiers, which suited his temper, and which made good forward any such prodigious migrations. His danger policy was seconded by the disorders inseparable from so vast a multitude, who were not united under one head, and were conducted by leaders of the most independent, intractable spirit, unacquainted with military discipline, and determined enemies to civil authority and submission. The scarcity of provisions, the excess of fatigue, the influence of unknown climates, joined to the want of concert in their operations, and to the sword of a warlike enemy, destroyed the adventurers by thousands, and would have abated the ardour of most men if allied to less powerful motives. Their zeal, however, their bravery, and their irresistible force, still carried them forward, and continually advanced them to the great end of their enterprise. After an obstinate siege they took Nice, the seat of the Turkish empire; they defeated Soltan William of two great battles; they made themselves masters of Antioch; and entirely broke the force of the Turks, who had so long resisted those countries. The Soldiers of Egypt, whose alliance they had hitherto courted, recovered, on the fall of the Turkish power, his former authority in Jerusalem; and he informed them by his ambassadors, that if they came dismayed to that city, they might now perform their religious vows, and that all Christian pilgrims, who should thenceforth visit the holy sepulchre, might expect the same good treatment which they had ever received from his predecessor. The offer was received, and was required to yield up the city to the Christians; and on his refusal, the champions of the cross advanced to the siege of Jerusalem, which they regarded as the consummation of their labours. By the detachments which they had ever since made, they had all the time brought, and thence forth diminished to the number of twenty thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse; but these were still formidable, from their valour, their experience, and the obedience which, from past customs and their nature, spread over them by those pitiable invaders. This proved one great cause of the subsequent settlement and improvement of the southern counties.

This great event happened on the fifth of July, in the last year of the eleventh century. The Christian princes and nobles, after choosing Godfrey of Bouillon King of Jerusalem, began to settle themselves in their new possessions; while some of them returned to Europe, in order to enjoy at home that glory which their valour had acquired them in this popular and meritorious enterprise. Among these was Robert, Duke of Normandy, who, as he had relinquished the greatest dominions of any prince that attended the Crusade, had all along distinguished himself by the most irreplicable courage, as well as by that affable disposition and beardless generosity which, again the hearts of soldiers, and qualify a prince to shine in a military life. In passing through Italy, he became acquainted with Sibylla, daughter of the Count of Conversano, a young lady of great beauty and determined manner, who indulging himself in this new passion, as well as fond of enjoying ease and pleasure, after the fatigues of so many rough campaigns, he lingered a twelvemonth so that delicious climate; and though his friends in the North looked every moment for his arrival, none of them knew when they could with certainty expect it. By this delay he lost the kingdom of England, which the great fame he had acquired during the Crusades, as well as his unobtained title, both by birth, and by the preceding agreement with his brother; for, as it seemed, had he been present, he might have infully secured to him.

Accession of Henry II.

Prince Henry was hunting with Rufus in the new forest, when intelligence of that monarch's death was brought him. By this advantage attending the conjuncture, he hurried to Winchester, in order to secure the royal treasure, which he knew to be a necessary implement for facilitating his designs on the crown. He had scarcely reached the palace when William de Brecel, keeper of the treasurer, arrived, and opposed himself to Henry's pretensions. This nobleman, who had been engaged in the same party of hunting, had no sooner heard of his master's death, than he hastened to take care of his charge; and he told the prince that this treasure, as well as the crown, belonged to his eldest brother, who was now his sovereign; and that he, for his part, was determined, in spite of all other pretensions, to maintain his allegiance to him. But Henry, drawing his sword, threatened him with instant death if he dared to disobey him; and as others of the late king's retinue, who came every moment to Winchester, pressed for his part, Brecel was obliged to withdraw his opposition, and to succumb to this violence.

Henry, without losing a moment, hastened with the money to London; and having assembled some noblemen and prelates, who, by his address, or abilities, or present gained to his side, he was suddenly elected, or rather salluted, king; and immediately proceeded to the exercise of royal authority. In less than three days after his brother's death, the ceremony of his coronation was performed. Bishop of London: who was present, was not so much appalled by the death of his master, and the absence of his own person, as to refuse to officiate on that occasion; and thus, by his courage and gender, he incurred himself to the vacant throne. No one had sufficient spirit or sense of duty to maintain in defence of the crown prince; all men were seduced or intimidated; present possession supplied the apparent defects in Henry's title, which was indeed founded on plural usurpation: and the barons, as well as the people, acquiesced in a change, though, which, though it could neither be justified nor comprehended, could now, they found, be opposed through the perils alone of civil war and rebellion.

But true or false Henry foresaw that a crown, usurped against all rules of justice, will not stand upon his head, he resolved, by fair professions at least, to gain the affections of all his subjects. Besides taking the usual coronation oath to maintain laws and execute justice, he passed a charter, which was calculated to remove many of the grievous oppositions which had been complained of during the reigns of his father and brother. He there promised, that, at the death of any bishop or abbot, he never would seize the revenues of the see or abbey during the vacancy, but would leave the whole to be reaped by the successor; and that he would never let to farm any ecclesiastical benefice, nor dispose of it for money. After this concession to the church, whose favour was so of great importance, he proceeded to enumerate the civil grievances which he proposed to redress. He promised, that, upon the death of any earl, baron, or military tenant, his heir should be admitted to the possession of his estate, on paying a just and lawful relief; without being exposed to such violent exactions as had been usual during the late reign; he promised the wardship of minors, and allowed guardianship to a noblewoman. He then dissolved the trust: he promised out to dispose of any heires in marriage, but by the advice of all the barons; and if any baron renounced to give his daughter, sister, niece, or kins-sons whom he might offend, than the rights of those whom he might injure. The very form of this charter of Henry proved that the barons of the realm were determined, rather than the people of England, were chiefly concerned in it) were totally ignorant of the nature of limited monarchy, and were ill qualified to conduct, in conjunctioi'n with their sovereign, the machine of government. It is an act of the first magnitude of this possession of the people of England, that the king, by some articles which bind others as well as himself, and is therefore unfit to be the deed of any one who possesses not the whole legislative power, and who may not at pleasure revoke all that he had done:

Henry, farther to increase his popularity, degraded and committed to prison Ralph Flambard, Bishop of Durham, who had been the chief instrument of oppression under his brother: but this act was followed by another, which was a direct violation of his own charter, and was a bad prognostic of his sincere intentions to observe it: he kept the see of Durham vacant for five years, and during that time retained possession of all its revenues. Sensible of the great authority which Anselm had acquired by his character of poet, and by the persecutions which he had undergone from William, he sent repeated messages to him at Lyon, where he resided, and invited him to return and take possession of his See. On the arrival of the prelate, he proposed to him the renewal of that bondage which he had done his brother, and which had never been refused by any English bishop: but Anselm had acquired other and more powerful allies to support him than the king an absolute refusal. He objected the decrees of the council of Bari, at which he himself had assisted; and he declared, that so far from doing bondage for his spiritual dignity, he would not so much as communicate with any ecclesiastic who paid that submission, or who accepted of investitures from laymen. Henry, who expected, in his present delicate situation, to reap great advantages from the authority and popularity of Anselm, therefore insisted on his demands: and only discovered than the controversy might be suspended; and that messengers might be sent to Rome, in order to accommodate matters with the Pope, and obtain his confirmation of the laws and customs of England.

Marriage of the king.

There immediately occurred an important affair, in which the king was obliged to have recourse to the authority of Anselm. Matilda, daughter of Malcolm III. King of Scotland, and niece to Edgar Atheling, had, on her father's death, and the subsequent revolutions in the Scottish government, been brought to England, and educated under her aunt Christina, in the married life. She was the greatest heiress that married; but as she had worn the veil, though never taken the vows, doubts might arise concerning the lawfulness of the act; and it behoved him to be very careful not to shock, in particular, the religious prejudices of the people.

The affair was examined by Anselm, in a council of the prelates and nobles, which was summoned at Lambeth: Matilda there proved that she had put on the veil, not with a view of entering into a religious life, but merely in consequence of a custom familiar to the English ladies, who protected their chastity from the brutal violence of the Normans, by taking shelter under that habit, which, amidst the horrid licentiousness of the times, was yet severer than any other. The council, sensible that every princess had otherwise no security for her honour, admitted this reason as valid: they pronounced that Matilda was still free to marry; and her espousals with Henry were celebrated by Anselm with great pomp and solemnity.

No act of the king's reign rendered him equally popular with his English subjects, and tended more to establish him on the throne. Though Matilda, during the life of her uncle and brothers, was not love of the Saxons less, she became reconciled to the English on account of her connexions with it: and that people, who, before the Conquest, had fallen into a kind of indifference towards their ancient royal family, had felt so deeply the tyranny of the Normans, that they reflected with extreme regret on their former liberty, and hoped for a more equal and mild administration, when the blood of their native princes should be mingled with that of their new sovereigns.

But the policy and prudence of Henry, which, if time had been allowed for these virtues to produce their full effect, would have secured the crown of England, was frustrated by the sudden appearance of Robert, who returned to Normandy about a month after the death of his brother William. He took possession, with ease and opposition, of that duchy; and immediately made preparations for recovering England, of which, during his absence, he had, by Henry's intrigues, been so unjustly defrauded. The great fame which he had acquired in the East forwarded his pretensions; and the Norman barons, sensible of the consequences, expressed the same discontent at the separation of the duchy and kingdom, which had appeared on the accession of William. Robert de Belême, Earl of Shrewsbury and Arundel, William de la Warre, Earl of Surrey, Arnaud de Montgomery, Walter Giffard, Robert de Pontefract, Robert de Mallet, Yvo de Grentemoul, and many others of the principal nobility, invited Robert to make an attempt on England, and promised on his landing to join him with all their forces. Even the seamen were affected with the general popularity of his name, and they carried over to him the greater part of a fleet which had been reposed in the port of England. When this extremity began to be apprehensive for his life, as well as for his crown, and had recourse to the superstition of the people, in order to oppose their sentiment of justice. He paid diligent court to Anselm, whose sanctity and wisdom he pretended to revere. He consulted him in all difficult emergencies; seemed to be governed by him in every measure; promised a strict regard to ecclesiastical privileges; professed a great attachment to Rome, and an resolution of persevering in an implicit obedience to the decrees of councils, and to the will of the sovereign pontiff. By these caresses and declarations he entirely gained the confidence of the primate, whose influence over the people, and authority with the barons, were of the utmost service to him in his present situation. Anselm scrupled not to assure the nobles of the king's sincerity in those professions, which he made, of avoiding the tyrannical and oppressive government of his father and brother: he even rode through the ranks of the army, recommended to the soldiers the defence of their prince, represented the duty of keeping their oaths of allegiance, and prognosticated to them the beauty of the change and the advantage of a wise and just sovereign. By this expedient, joined to the influence of the Earls of Warwick and Mellent, of Roger Bigod, Richard de Redvers, and Robert Fitz-James, powerful barons, who still adhered to the present government, the king was retained in the king's interest, and marched, with seeming union and firmness, to oppose Robert, who had landed with his forces at Portsmouth.

The two armies lay in sight of each other, and the effect of some days without coming to action; with Robert, and both princes, being apprehensive of the event, which would probably be decisive, hearkened the more willingly to the counsels of Anselm and the other great men, who mediated an accommodation between them. After employing some negotiation, it was agreed that Robert should resign his pretensions to England, and receive in lieu of them an annual pension of 3000 marks; that, if either of the princes failed without cause, the other should succeed to his dominions; that the adherents of each should be pardoned and restored to all their possessions either in Normandy or England; and that neither Robert nor Henry should henceforth encourage, receive, or protect the enemies of the other.

This treaty, though calculated so much for Henry's advantage, he was the first to violate. He restored indeed the estates of all Robert's adherents; but was secretly determined, that noblemen so powerful and so ill affected, who had both inclination and ability to disturb his government, should not long remain unmolested in their present opulence and grandeur. He began the tumbrel of Silvertongue was watched for some time by spies, and then incited on a charge, consisting of forty-five articles. This turbulent nobleman, knowing his own guilt, as well as the prejudices of his judges and peers, resolved to arms, for defence: but, being soon suppressed by the activity and address of Henry, he was banished the kingdom, and his great estate was confiscated. His ruin involved that of his son, Renaud de Montgomerie, and Roger Lewis of Lancaster. Soon after followed the prosecution and condemnation of Robert de Pontefract and Robert de Mallet, who had distinguished themselves among Robert's next victors: even William Earl of Cornwall, son of the Earl of Mortaigne, the king's uncle, having given matter of suspicion against him, lost all the vast acquisitions of his family in England. Though the usual violence and tyranny of the Norman barons afforded a plausible pretence for these prosecutions, and it is probable that none of the sentences pronounced against these noblemen were wholly iniquitous; men easily saw or conjectured, that the chief part of their guilt was not the injustice or illegality of their conduct. Robert, enraged at the fate of his friends, imprudently ventured to come into England; and he renounced with his brother, in severe terms, the breach of treaty, met with so little a reception, that he began to apprehend danger to his own liberty, and was glad to purchase an escape by resigning his pension.

This usual pretence of Robert soon exposed him to more fatal injuries. This prince, whose bravery and condour procured him respect while at a distance, had no sooner attained the possession of power and enjoyment of peace, than his former disposition of mind relapsed, and he fell into contempt among those who approached his person, or were subjected to his authority. Alternately abandoned to dissolve pleasures and to womanish superstition, he was so removed, both in the case of his treasure and the exercise of his government, that his servants pilaged his money with impunity, stole from him his very clothes, and proceeded theco to practise every species of extortion against his defenceless subjects. The barons of Normandy, whom a severe administration alone could have restrained, gave reins to their unbridled rapine upon their vassals, and inveterate animosities against each other; and all Normandy, during the reign of this benign prince, was in a scene of disorder and devastation.

The Normans at last, observing the regular government which Henry, notwithstanding his usurped title, had been able to establish in England, applied to him, that he might use the influence of his munificence, and the discontents and disorders of the Normans, and they thereby afforded him a pretence for interposing in the affairs of Normandy. Instead of employing his mediation to render his brother's government respectable, or to redress the grievances of the Normans; he was only attentive to support his own partisans, and to increase their number by every act of bribery, intrigue, and insinuation. Having found, in a visit which he made to that duchy, that the nobility were more disposed to pay submission to him than to their legal sovereign, he collected, by arbitrary extortions on England, a great army and treasure, and returned next year to Normandy, in a situation to obtain, either by violence or corruption, the dominion of that province. The Earl took Bayeux by storm after an obstinate siege: he made himself master of Caen by the voluntary submission of the inhabitants: but being repulsed at Falaise, and obliged by the winter season to return out of England; after giving assurance to his adherents, that he would persevere in supporting and protecting them.

Next year he opened the campaign with the siege of Trenehem; and it became evident, from his preparations and progress, that he intended to usurp the entire possession of Normandy. Robert was at last roused from his lethargy; and being supported by the Earl of Mortaigne and Robert de Bellesme, the king's inveterate enemies, he raised a considerable army, and approached his brother's camp, with a view to accomplish a design formed long before between them. He was now entered on that scene of action in which alone he was qualified to excel; and he so animated his troops by his example, that they threw themselves into the breach, with such obstinacy, and energetically, as to effectual victory: when the flight of Bellesme spread a panic among the Normans, and occasioned their total defeat. Henry, besides doing great execution on the enemy, made his brother feel the force of his rage. He pillaged and pillaged him himself, and all the most considerable barons who adhered to his interests. This victory was followed by the final reduction of Normandy: Roscn immediately opened its gates; and by this acquisition, besides rendering himself master of an important fortress, he got into his hands Prince William, the only son of Robert: he assembled the states of Normandy; and having received the homage of all the vassals of the duchy, having settled the government, revoked his brother's donations, and dismantled the castles lately built, he returned into England, and carried along with him the duke as prisoner. He lived out the remainder of his life, which was no less than twenty-eight years, and he died in the castle of Carduff, in Clunemorganshire, happy if, without losing his liberty, he could at least have made his son equally qualified either to hold or exercise. Prince William was committed to the care of Helie de St. Saen, who had married Robert's natural daughter, and who, being a man of prudence, and a successor beyond whom his ages, executed the trust with great affection and fidelity. Edgar Atheling, who had followed Robert in the expedition to Jerusalem, and who had lived with him ever since the battle of Tenebray, was banished the kingdom, after the battle of Tenebray. Henry gave him his liberty, and settled a small pension on him, with which he retired; and he lived to a good old age in England, totally neglected and forgotten. This prince was succeeded by personal bravery: but nothing can be a stronger proof of his mean talents in every other respect, than that, notwithstanding he possessed the affections of the English, and enjoyed the only legal title to the throne, he was obliged, during the reign of his brother, to become his usurer, to live unmolested, and go to his grave in peace.

A little after Henry had completed the conquest of Normandy, and settled the government in the province, he began to meditate the expedition into foreign parts, in order to put a stop to the controversies which were now in great rage between him and the Pope, with regard to the investitures in ecclesiastical benefices; and though he was slower in making his move than the ancient rights of the crown, he extricated himself from the difficulty on easier terms than most princes, who, in that age, were so unhappy as to be engaged in disputes with the apostolic see. The king's situation, in the beginning of his reign, obliged him to pay great court to Anseilm: the advantages which he had reaped from the zealous friendship of that prelate, had made him sensible how prone the minds of his people were to superstition, and what an ascendant the ecclesiastics had been able to assume over them. He had seen, on the accession of his brother Rufus, that, though the rights of primogeniture were then violated, and the institutions of almost all the barons thwarted, yet the same spirit of resistance which he had experienced in the divorce of their prince, the Ingl. took Bayeux by storm after an obstinate siege: he made himself master of Caen by the voluntary submission of the inhabitants: but being repulsed at Falaise, and obliged by the winter season to return out of England; after giving assurance to his adherents, that he would persevere in supporting and protecting them.

The prudence and temper of the public officer, in keeping up the balance, was the management of this delicate affair; where he was always sensible that it had become necessary for him to mis his whole crown, in order to preserve the most inva-

Anselm had no sooner returned from banishment, than his refusal to do homage to the king raised a dispute, which Henry evaded at that critical juncture, by promising to some a messenger, in order to reconcile and for the purpose with Pascal II. who then filled the papal throne. The messenger, as was probably foreseen, returned with an absolute refusal of the king's demands; and that, fortified by many reasons, which were well qualified to operate on the understandings of men in those ages. Pascal quoted the Scriptures to prove that Christ was the door; and he thence inferred, that all ecclesiastics must enter into the church through Christ alone, not through the civil magistrates, who are mere profane laymen. "It is monstrous," added the pontiff, "that a son should pretend to beget his father, or a man to create a God: priests are called gods in Scripture, as being the vicars of God. Let any man then whom you think incapable to grant them investiture, assume the right of creating them."

But however contrary to these arguments, they could not persuade Henry to return to his promised concession, and perhaps, as he was possessed of great reflection and discernment, he thought that the absurdity of a man's creating God, even allowing priests to be gods, was not urged with such pertinacity as he believed the Roman pontiff. But as he had desired still to avoid, at least to delay, the coming to any dangerous extremity with the church, he persuaded Anselm, that he should be able, by further negotiation, to obtain a compulsion from Pascal, for the purpose he despised three bishops to Rome, while Anselm sent two messengers of his own, to be more fully assured of the Pope's intentions. Pascal wrote back letters equal in positive and arrogant, both to the king and princes: urging to the former, that, by assuming the right of investitures, he committed a kind of spiritual adultery with the church, who was the spouse of Christ, and must not admit of such a commerce with any other that was offensive to God. But in the meantime, the pretension of kings to confer benefices was the source of all animosity; a topic which had but too much foundation in those ages.

Henry had no other expedient than to suppress the letter addressed to himself, and to persuade the three bishops to prevaricate, and assert, upon their episcopal faith, that Pascal had assured them in private of his good intentions towards Henry, and of his resolution not to represent any future exerts of his prerogative in granting investitures; though he himself scrupled to give this assurance under his hand, lest other princes should copy the example, and assume a like privilege. Anselm's two messengers, who were monks, affirmed to him, that it was impossible this story could have any foundation; but their word was not deemed equal to that of three bishops; and the king, as he had finally gained his cause, proceeded to the use of his crown, and to invest the new bishops in the usual manner. But Anselm, who, as he had good reason, gave no credit to the уверенией of the king's messengers, refused not only to consecrate the new bishops, but to invest the and the bishops themselves, finding how obdious they were become, returned to Henry the enigmas of their dignity.

The quarrel every day increased between the king and the primate: the former, notwithstanding the prudence and moderation of his temper, threw out menaces against such as should pretend to oppose him in exerting the ancient prerogative of his crown, and was sensible of his own dangerous situation, desired leave to make a journey to Rome, in order to lay the case before the sovereign pontiff. Henry, well pleased to rid himself, without violence, of so dangerous an obstacle as his refusal to grant him permission. The prelate was attended to the shore by infinite multitudes, not only of monks and clergymen, but people of all ranks, who scrupled not in this manner to show their care for their sovereign, and who regarded his departure as the final abolition of religion and true piety in the kingdom. The king, however, seized all the revenues of his see; and sent William de Warelaw to negotiate with Pascal, and to find some means of accommodation in this delicate affair.

The English minister told Pascal, that his master would rather lose his crown, than part with the right of granting investitures. "And I," said Pascal, "would rather lose my head than allow him to retain it." Henry secretly prohibited Anselm from returning, unless he resolved to conform himself to the laws and usages of the kingdom; and the primate took up his residence at Lyons, and was, in expectation that the king would at last be obliged to yield the point which was the present object of controversy between them. Soon after, he was permitted to return to his monastery at Bec in Normandy; and Henry, besides restoring to him the revenues and offices, permitted him to have the greatest respect, and held several conferences with him, in order to soften his opposition, and bend him to submission. The people of England, who thought all difficulties now accommodated, were inclined to blame their primate for absenting himself so long from his charge; and he daily received letters from his partisans, representing the necessity of his speedy return. The total extinction, they told him, of religion against his country, was likely to ensue from the want of his fatherly care; the most shocking customs prevail in England; and the dread of his severity being now removed, sodomy, and the practice of wearing long hair, gain ground among all ranks of men, and these enormities openly appear everywhere without sense of shame or fear of punishment.

The policy of the court of Rome has commonly been much admired; and men, judging by success, have bestowed the highest eulogies on that prudence by which a power, from such slender beginnings, could advance, without force of arms, to establish an universal and almost absolute monarchy in Europe. But the wisdom of so long a succession of men, was delayed and insatiable, and the filled passion of kings to confer benefices was the source of all animosity; a topic which had but too much foundation in those ages.

Henry had now no other expedient than to suppress the letter addressed to himself, and to persuade the three bishops to prevaricate, and assert, upon their episcopal faith, that Pascal had assured them in private of his good intentions towards Henry, and of his resolution not to present any future exertion of his prerogative in granting investitures; though he himself scrupled to give this assurance under his hand, lest other princes should copy the example, and assume a like privilege. But Anselm, who, as he had good reason, gave no credit to the уверенией of the king's messengers, refused not only to consecrate the new bishops, but to invest the and the bishops themselves, finding how obdious they were become, returned to Henry the enigmas of their dignity.

demonstration: the most criminal means were sanitised by the party of the end: treaties were not supposed to be binding, where the interests of God were concerned: the ancient laws and customs of states had no authority against a divine right: impudent forgeries were received as authentic monuments of antiquity: and the champions of holy church, if successful, were celebrated as heroes; if unsuccessful, they were disavowed as madmen; and all events thus turned out equably to the advantage of clerical usurpations.

Pascal himself, the reigning Pope, was, in the course of this very controversy concerning investitures, involved unfairly for the insecurity of the papal conduct, which would have drawn disgrace and ruin on any temporal prince that had been so unfortunate as to fall into a like situation. His person was seized by the Earl of Pembroke; and Vannes, bishop of Salerno, was sent by the papal court to resign that munificence of the right of granting investitures, for which they had so long contended.1 In order to add greater solemnity to this agreement, the emperor and Pope communicated together on the same day, one half of which was given to the prince, the other taken by the pontiff. The most tremendous imprecations were publicly denounced on either of those who should violate the treaty: yet no sooner did Pascal recover his liberty, than he revokicked all his concessions, and pronounced the sentence of excommunication against the emperor, who, in the end, was obliged to submit to the terms required of him, and to yield up all his pretensions, which he never could restore.

The King of England had very nearly fallen into the same dangerous situation. Pascal had already excommunicated the Earl of Nellent, and the other ministers of Henry, whom he aimed at in settling his pretensions: he daily measured the king himself with a like sentence; and he suspended the blow only to give him leisure to prevent it by a timely submission. The malcontents would not wait for the opportunity of disturbing the government by conspiracies and insurrections: the king's best friends were anxious at the prospect of an incident which would set their religious and civil duties at variance; and Henry Vane was, for some time, his closest councilor. But this process of piety, who had great influence over him, was affrighted with the danger of her brother's eternal damnation.2 Henry, on the other hand, seemed determined to run all hazards, rather than resign a power of such importance, which had been enjoyed by all his predecessors; and it seemed probable, from his great prudence and abilities, that he might be able to sustain his rights, and finally prevail in the contest. While Pascal and Henry thus stood near in a point of each other, it was the more easy to bring about an accommodation between them, and to find a medium in which they might agree.

Compromise Before bishops took possession of their See, they had been accustomed to pass through two ceremonies: they received from the hands of the sovereign a ring and crozier, as symbols of their office, and this was called their investiture: they also made those submissions to the prince which were required of vassals by the rites of the feudal law, and which received the name of homage. And as the king might refuse both to grant the investiture and to receive the homage, though the chapter had, by some canons of the middle age, been endowed with the right of election, the sovereign had in reality the sole power of appointing prelates. Urban II. had equally deprived laymen of the rights of granting and receiving homage; the emperors never were able, by all their maxims and negotiations, to make any distinction be admitted between them: the interpolation of profane laymen, in any particular, was still represented as impious and abominable: and the church openly opposed to total independence on the state. But Henry had put England as well as Normandy in such a situation, as gave greater weight to his negotiations: and Pascal was for the present satisfied with his resigning the right of granting investitures, by which the spiritual dignity was supposed to be conferred; and he allowed the bishops to do homage for their temporal properties and privileges.3 The pontiff was well pleased to have made this acquisition, which, he hoped, would in time involve the whole; and the king, anxious to procure an escape from a very dangerous situation, was content to retain some, if with a more precarious authority, in the election of prelates.

After the principal controversy was accommodated, it was not difficult to adjust the other differences. The Pope, who allowed granting investitures, would not permit the ordination of clerics to this mode. He had already received investitures from the crown; and he only required of them some submissiveness for their past misconduct.4 He also granted Anselm a plenary power over the clergy to this mode, but not sufficient to arise from the barbaryness of the country.5 Such was the idea which the popes then entertained of the English; and nothing can be a stronger proof of the miserable ignorance in which that people were then plunged, than that a man who sat on the papal throne, and who subsisted by absurdi- ties and nonsense, should think himself entitled to treat them as barbarians.

During the course of these controversies, a synod was held at Westminster, where the king, intent only on the main dispute, allowed some canons of less importance to be enacted, which tended to promote the usurpations of the clergy. The elisy of priests was enjoined, a point which the king had found very difficult to discern; and even laymen were not allowed to marry within the seventh degree of affinity.6 By this contravince the Pope augmented the profits which he reaped from granting investitures, and dispensed with the intervention of the cleropontificla. For as the art of writing was then rare, and parish registers were not regularly kept, it was not easy to ascertain the degrees of affinity even among people of rank; and any man who had married within the seventh degree might, without prejudice that his wife was more nearly related to him than was permitted by the canons. The synod also passed a vote, prohibiting the laity from wearing long hair.7 The averse attitude of the clergy to this mode, and the importance of the cause, thus put the English into a very disagreeable situation. When the king went to Normandy, before he had conquered that province, the Bishop of Sezis, in a formal harangue, earnestly exhorted him to redress the manifest disorders under which the people laboured, and to oblige the people to pull their hair in a decent form. Henry, though he would not resign his prerogatives to the church, willingly parted with his hair. He cut it in the form which they required of him, and obliged all the courtiers of the court to follow his example.8

The acquisition of Normandy was a great point of Henry's ambition; being the ancient patrimony of his family, and the only territory which, while he lived, they had been accustomed to fill up by the passage of the hands of his sovereign a ring and crozier, as symbols of their office, and this was called their investiture: they also made those submissions to the prince which were required of vassals by the rites of the feudal law, and which received the name of homage. And as the king might refuse both to grant the investiture and to receive the homage, though the chapter had, by some canons of the middle age, been endowed with the right of election, the sovereign had in reality the sole power of appointing prelates. Urban II. had equally deprived laymen of the rights of granting and receiving homage; the emperors never were able, by all their maxims and negotiations, to make any distinction be admitted between them: the interpolation of profane laymen, in any particular, was still represented as impious and abominable: and the church openly opposed to total independence on the state. council. He was detained by some accident; and his sailors, as well as their captain, Thomas Fitz-Stephens, having spent the interval in drinking, were so flustered, that, being in a hurry to follow the king, they heedlessly threw the ship overboard. At last the death of Baldwin, who was slain in an action near Eu, gave some respite to Henry, and enabled him to carry on war with more advantage against his enemies. He received news from the king, by force of arms, had recourse to the dangerous expedient of applying to the spiritual power, and of affording the ecclesiastics a pretence to interpose in the temporal concerns of princes. He carried young William to a general council, which was assembled by Pope Calixts II. presented the Norman prince to them, complained of the manifest usurpation and injustice of Henry, craved the assistance of the church for re-establishing the true heir, and offered to crown the boy himself, in the presence of the old king, under the condition of retaining his temporal power.

He had sent over the English bishop to this synod; but at the same time had warned the Pope or the ecclesiastics, he was determined to adhere to the laws and customs of England, and maintain the prerogatives transmitted to him by his predecessors. to the new king, whoever had his father's name; hear his apostolical precepts; but take care to bring none of his new inventions into my kingdom." Finding, however, that it would be easier for him to elude than oppose the efforts of Calixtus, he gave his ambassador orders to gain the Pope and his favourites by liberal presents and promises. The complaints of the Norman prince were thereupon heard with great coldness by the council, as Caston Wulfhold, after conferences which he had with the same summer with Henry, and when that prince probably renewed his presents, that, of all men whom he had ever yet been acquainted with, he was, beyond comparison, the most eloquent and persuasive. The war was going on with Normandy was regarded as his intrigue. He had laid a scheme for surprising Avoir; but Henry, having received intelligence of the design, marched to the relief of the place, and suddenly attacked the French at Breuilly, where they were all crowded towards it. A sharp conflict ensued; where Prince William behaved with great bravery, and the king himself was in the most imminent danger. He was wounded in the head, and was carried to Caen, where he died, having followed the fortunes of William; but, being rather an absence from the kingdom, and her marriage into a foreign family, might endanger the succession. Henry, who was now a widower, was induced to marry, in hopes of having a son by the younger of his two male heirs; and he made his address to Adelais, daughter of Godfrey, Duke of Lorraine, a young princess of an amiable person. But Adelais brought him no son, and the prince who was least likely to dispute the succession, and even the immediate possession of the crown, recovered hopes of subverting his rival, who had successively seized all his patrimonial dominions. William, the Duke of Aquitaine, was still protected to the French court; and as Henry's connections with the Count of Anjou were broken off by the death of his son, Fulk joined the party of the unfortunate prince, gave him his daughter in marriage, and aided him in raising disturbances in Normandy. But Henry found the means of drawing off the Count of Anjou, by forming anew with him a nearer connexion than the former, and one more material, the interests of that Count's family. The emperor, his son-in-law, dying without issue, be bestowed his daughter on Geoffrey, the eldest son of Fulk, and endeavoured to insure his succession by having her recognized heir to all his dominions, and chief of his barons, both of Normandy and England, to swear fealty to her. He hoped that the choice of this husband would be more agreeable to all his subjects than that of the emperor; as securing a man of less danger of falling under the dominion of a great and distant potentate, who might bring them into subjection, and reduce their country to the rank of a province; but the barons were displeased that a step so material to national interests had been taken without consulting them; and Henry had too sensibly experienced the turbulence of their disposition, not to dread the effects of their resentment. It seemed probable, that his nephew's party might gain force from the increase of the malcontents: an accession of power which that prince acquired in little after, tended to render his pretensions still more dangerous. Charles, Earl of Flanders, being assassinated during the celebration of divine service, King Lewis immediately put the young prince in possession of that county, to which he had pretensions in the right of his grandmother Matilda, wife to the Conqueror. But William survived a very little time this piece of good fortune, which seemed to open the way to still further pros persity. He was killed in a skirmish with the Landgrave of Alsace, his competitor for Flanders; and his death put an end, for the present, to the jealousy and inquietude of Henry.

The first object of the reverend government consisted in the profound tranquillity which he established and maintained throughout all his dominions during the greater part of his reign. The mutinous barons were retained in subjection by his immediate and his council; and every attempt which they made upon him, found here so well prepared, that they were discouraged from continuing or renewing their enterprises. In order to repress the incursions of the Welsh, he brought over some Flemings, in the year 1111, and settled them in Pembrokeshire, where they long main tained a different language, and customs, and manners, from their neighbours. Though his government seems to have been arbitrary in England, it was judicious and prudent; and was as little oppressive as the necessity of his affaires would permit. He wanted not attention to the redress of grievances; and historians mention in particular the levying of purveyances, which he endeavoured to moderate. The remotest parts of his dominions were at that time obliged to supply, gratis, the court with provisions, and to furnish carriages on the same hard terms, when the king made a progress, as he did frequently, through the waste country. The expectations were so grievous, and levied in so licentious a manner, that the farmers, when they heard of the approach of the court, often deserted their houses as if an enemy had invaded the country, and sheltered their persons and families in the woods from the insalubrities of the king's return. Henry prohibited those enormities, and punished the persons guilty of them by cutting off their hands, legs, or other members. But the prerogative was perpetual; the rev enue was immense; and the court was a means of subsisting itself of this remedy, so far from giving security to the people, was only a proof of the fercity of the government, and threatened n quick return of like abuses. One of the most important strokes of public policy was, the guarding against the encroachments of the court of Rome, and protecting the liberties of the church of England. The Pope, in the year 1101, had sent Guy, Archbishop of Vienne, as legate into Britain; and though he was the first that for many years had appeared there in that character, and his commission gave general surprise, the king, who was then in the commencement of his reign, and was involved in many difficulties, was obliged to submit to this encroachment on his authority. But in the year 1116, Ascelin, Abbot of St. Sabas, who was coming over with a like legatine commission, was prohibited from entering the kingdom, and Pope Calix tus, on his return, was deprived of his legatine powers. By these difficulties, by reason of the pretensions of Gregory, an Anti-pope, was obliged to promise that he never would for the future, except when solicited by the king himself, send a legate into England. In the same year, and after this engagement, the Pope, as soon as he had suppressed his antagonist, granted the Cardinal de Crema a legatine commission over that kingdom; and the king, who, by reason of his nephew's intrigues and invasions, had invol ved himself at that time in a dangerous situation, was obliged to submit to the exercise of this commission. A synod was called by the legate at London; where, among other canons, was passed, enacting that the pope should have the marriages of the clergy. The cardinal, in a public harangue, declaimed it to be an unpalpable enormity, that a priest should dare to consecrate and touch the body of Christ immediately after he had risen from the side of a straiten for that was the decent appellation which he gave to the wives of the clergy. But it happened that, the very next night, the officers of justice, breaking into a disorderly house, found the cardinal in bed with a courte sen woman, that would have thrown such a ridiculous light that he immediately stole out of the kingdom. The synod broke up; and the canons against the marriage of clergy men were worse executed than ever.
As every thing in England remained in tranquillity, Henry took the opportunity of paying a visit to Normandy, to which he was invited, as well by his affection for that country, as by his tenderness for his daughter the Empress Matilda, who was always his favourite. Some time after, that princess was betrothed to a son of a son, who received the name of Henry; and the king, further to insure her succession, made all the nobility of England and Normandy renew the oath of fealty, which they had already sworn to him. The year he was at the court, was likewise remarkable for the better behaviour of the Normans, who bore successively two other sons, made his residence in Normandy very agreeable to him; and he seemed determined to withdraw the greater part of the courts to that country; when an insurrection of the Welch obliged him to think of returning into England. He was preparing for the journey, but was seized with a sudden illness at St. Dennis le Fort, from eating too plentifully of lampreys, a food which always agreed better with his palate than his constitution.

He died in the sixty-seventh year of his age, and the thirty-fifth year of his reign; leaving by will his daughter, Matilda, heir of all his dominions, without making any mention of his daughter Geoffrey, who had given him several causes of displeasure.

This prince was one of the most accomplished that has filled the English throne and possessed all the great qualities both of body and mind, natural and acquired, which could fit him for the high station to which he attained. His person was manly, his countenance engaging, his eyes clear, serene, and penetrating. The affability of his address encouraged those who might be overawed by the sense of his dignity or of his wisdom; and though he often indulged his facetious humour, he knew how to keep it with discretion, and ever kept at a distance from all indecent familiarities with his courtiers. His superior eloquence and judgment would have given him an ascendant, even had he been born in a private station; and his personal bravery would have procured him respect, though it had been less supported by art and policy. By his great progress in literature, he acquired the name of Beauceron, or the Schollar: but his application to those sedentary pursuits abated nothing of the activity and vigilance of his government; and though the learning of that age was better fitted to corrupt than to improve the understanding, his natural good sense preserved him untainted both from the pedantry and affectations of his age, which is a very great blessing to a prince. His temper was susceptible of the sentiments as well of friendship as of resentment; and his ambition, though high, might be deemed moderate and reasonable, had not his conduct towards his brother and nephew showed that he was too much disposed to sacrifice to it all the maxims of justice and equity. But the total incapacity of Robert for government afforded his younger brother a reason or pretence for seizing the sceptre both of England and Normandy; and when violence and usurpation are once begun, necessity obliges a prince to continue in the same criminal course, and engages him in measures which his better judgment and sounder principles would otherwise have induced him to reject with warmth and indignation.

King Henry was much addicted to women; and his ladies mentioned the names of three and six daughters born to him. Hunting was also one of his favourite amusements; and he exercised great vigour against those who encroached on the royal forests, which were augmented during his reign, though their number and extent were already too great. To kill a stag was regarded as criminal as to murder a man: he must have the permission of the owner of the barks of his forests; and he sometimes deprived his subjects of the liberty of hunting on their own lands, or even cutting their own woods. In other respects, he executed justice, and that with rigour; the best maxim which a prince of that age could follow. Stealing was first made capital in this reign; false coinage, which was then a very common crime, and by which the money had been extremely debased, was severely punished by Henry. Near fifty criminals of this kind were at one time hanged or mutilated; and though these punishments seem to have been exercised in a manner somewhat arbitrary, they were grateful to the people, and attentive to present advantages than jealous of general laws. There is a code which passes under the name of Henry I., but the best antiquaries have agreed to think it spurious. It is however a very ancient compilation, and may be useful to instruct us in the manners and customs of the times. We learn from it, that a great distinction was then made between the English and Normans, much to the advantage of the latter.

Among the laws granted on the king's accession, it is remarkable that the re-union of the civil and ecclesiastical courts, as in the Saxon times, was enacted. But this law, like the articles of his charter, remained without effect, probably from the opposition of Archbishop Anselm.

Henry, on his accession, granted a charter to London, which seems to have been the first step towards rendering that city a corporation. By this charter, the city was empowered to keep the farm of Middlesex at three hundred pounds a year, to elect its own sheriff and justiciary, and to hold pleas of the crown; and it was exempted from suit to the king, Danegeld, or by-laws, and bearing the king's revenue. These, with a confirmation of the privileges of their court of husting, wardmotes, and common halls, and their liberty of hunting in Middlesex and Surrey, are the chief articles of this charter.

It is said, that this prince, from indulgence to his tenants, changed the rents of his demesnes, which were formerly paid in kind, into money, which was more easily remitted to the exchequer. But the great scarcity of corn would render that commutation difficult to be executed, while at the same time provisions could not be sent to a distant quarter of the kingdom. This affords a probable reason why the ancient kings of England so frequently changed their place of abode; they crossed their court from one place to another, that they might consume upon the spot the revenue of their several demesnes.

originally granted. But when the continuance of rights, during some generations, in the same family, had, in a great measure, oblitered the primitive idea, the females were gradually admitted to the possession of feudal property; and the same revolution of principles which procured them the inheritance of private estates, naturally induced them to assert a right to the government and authority of his dominions.

The failure, therefore, of male heirs to the kingdom of England and duchy of Normandy, seemed to leave the succession open, without a rival, to the Empress Matilda; and as Henry had made all his vassals, in both states, swear allegiance to his daughter, they assumed, that they would not easily be induced to depart at once from her hereditary right, and from their own reiterated oaths and engagements. But the irregular manner in which he himself had acquired the crown, might have instructed him, that neither his Norman nor English subjects were as yet capable of adhering to a strict rule of government; and as every precedent of this kind seems to give authority to new usurpation, he had reason to dread, even from his own family, some invasion of his daughter's title, which he had taken such pains to establish.

Adela, daughter of William the Conqueror, had been married to Stephen, Count of Blois, and had brought him several sons, among whom Stephen and Henry, the two youngest, had been invited over by Edward, king, and had received great honours, riches, and preferment, from the real friendship which that prince bore to every thing that had been so fortunate as to acquire his favour and good opinion. Henry, who had betaken himself to the ecclesiastical profession, was created Abbot of Glastonbury and Bishop of Winchester; and though these dignities were considerable, Stephen had, from his uncle's liberality, attained establishments still more solid and durable.6 The king had married him to Matilda, who was daughter and heir of Eustace Count of Boulogne, and who brought him, besides that, all sovereign sway in France, an immense property in England, which, in the distribution of lands, had been conferred by the Conqueror on the family of Boulogne. Stephen also by this marriage acquired a new connexion with the royal family of France; as Mary, his wife's mother, was sister to David the reigning King of Scotland, and to Matilda, the first wife of Henry, and mother of the empress. The king, still imagining that he had strengthened the interests of his family by the aggrandizement of Stephen, took pleasure in enriching him by the grant of new possessions; and he conferred on him the great estate forfeited by Robert Malet, in Hereford, and by the Earl of Mortaigne, in Normandy. Stephen, in return, professed great attachment to his uncle; and appeared so zealous for the succession of Matilda, that when the barons swore fealty to that princess, he contended with Robert, Earl of Craven; and, by the Earl of Chester's natural son, admitted to give her this testimony of devoted zeal and fidelity. Meanwhile he continued to cultivate, by every art of popularity, the friendship of the English nation; and many virtues, with which he seemed to be endowed, favoured the success of his intentions. By his bravery, activity, and vigour, he acquired the esteem of the barons; by his generosity, and by an affable and familiar address, unusual in that age among men of his high quality, he obtained the affections of the people, particularly of the Londoners.5 And though he dared not to take any steps towards his further grandeur, lest he should expose himself, and put the state to a public hazard, he still hoped that, by accumulating riches and power, and by acquiring popularity, he might, in time, be able to open his way to the throne.

Matilda, having hesitated his last, than Stephen, insensible to all the ties of gratitude and fidelity, and blind to danger, gave full reins to his criminal ambition, and trusted that, even without any previous intrigue, the celerity of his enterprise, and the boldness of his attempt, might reduce the country to his wishes. Stephen, the one, and Normans in that age bore to the laws and to the rights of their sovereign. He hastened over to England; and though the citizens of Dover, and those of Canterbury, apprised of his purpose, shut their gates against him, he stopped not till he arrived at London, where some of the lower rank, instigated by his emissaries, as well as moved by his general popularity, immediately subscribed, and not only to the good will of the clergy, but to the performance of his coronation, to put himself in possession of the throne, from which he was confident it would not be easy afterwards to expel him. His brother, the Bishop of Winchester, joined him by a promise, that they would have gaged Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, who, though he owed a great fortune and advancement to the favour of the late king, preserved no sense of gratitude to that prince's family, he applied, in conjunction with that prince, to William, Archbishop of Canterbury, and required him, in virtue of his office, to give the royal sanction to Stephen. The prince, who, as all the others, had sworn fealty to Matilda, refused to perform this ceremony; but his opposition was overcome by an expedient equally dishonourable with the other steps by which this revolution was effected. Hugh Bigod, steward of the household, made oath before the council, that the late king on his death-bed, had shown a dissatisfaction with his daughter Matilda, and had expressed his intention of leaving the Count of Boulogne heir to all his dominions.6 William, Count of Mortain, who stood here, Bigod's testimony, anointed Stephen, 2nd Dec. and put the crown upon his head; and from this religious ceremony, that prince, without any shadow either of hereditary title or consent of the nobility or people, was allowed to proceeds to the exercise of sovereign authority. Very few barons attended his coronation; but none opposed his usurpation, however unjust or flagrant. The sentiment of religion, which, if corrupted into superstition, had become the support of a corrupted civil society, was not affected by the multiplied oaths taken in favour of Matilda, and only rendered the people obedient to a prince who was countenanced by the clergy, and who had entered into the primacy the rites of the royal union and consecration.7

Stephen, that he might further secure his tottering throne, placed a charter, in which he made liberal promises to all men of orders; to the clergy, that he would speedily fill all vacant benefices, and would never levy the remis of any of them during the vacancy; to the nobility, that he would reduce the royal forests to their ancestors' bounds; to the city and county of London, that he would render justice to the people, that he would remit the tax of Danegeld, and restore the laws of King Edward.8 The late king had a great treasure at Winchester, amounting to a hundred thousand pounds; and Stephen, by seizing this money, presumed to fortify his dominions with a fund, which he should never have been justified in requisition which that prince had employed for their grandeur and security: an event which naturally attends the policy of amassing treasures. By means of this money, the usurper insured the compliance, though not the attachment, of the principal clergy and nobility; but not trusting to this frail security, he invited over from the continent, particularly from Brittany and Flanders, great numbers of those bravoes or disorderly soldiers, with whom every country in Europe, by reason of the general ill police and turbulent government, extremely abounded.9 These mercenary troops guarded his throne by the terrors of the sword; and, whenever the prince as Henry, or as Stephen, he still hoped that, by accumulating riches and power, and by acquiring popularity, he might, in time, be able to open his way to the throne.

Matilda, and her husband Geoffrey, were as unfortunate in Normandy as they had been in England. The Norman nobility, moved by an apprehension that his son, Henry, would first apply to Thosoid, Count of Blois, Stephen's elder brother, for writers never give any prince the title of King till he is crowned; though he had for some time been in possession of the crown, and exercised all the powers of that dignity.

protection and assistance; but hearing afterwards that Stephen had got possession of the English crown, and having many of them the same reasons as formerly for desiring a continuance of their union with that kingdom, they transferred their allegiance to Stephen, and put him in the place of his father. One of the most eminent of the regninsg kings of France, accepted the homage of Eastsex, Stephen's eldest son, for the duchy; and the more to corroborate his connexions with that family, he betrothed his sister, Constance, to Stephen's daughter. The Count of Blois resigned all his pretensions, and received, in lieu of them, an annual pension of two thousand marks; and Geoffrey himself was obliged to conclude a truce for twenty years with Stephen, while he was paying him, during that time, a pension of five thousand. Stephen, who had taken a journey to Normandy, finished all these transactions in person, and soon after returned to England.

Robert, Earl of Gloucester, natural son of the late king, was a man of honour and abilities; and as he was much attached to the interests of his sister, Matilda, and zealous for the lineal succession, it was chiefly from his intrigues and resistance of the king, that he had reason to dread a new revolution of government. This noblemen, who was in Normandy when he received intelligence of Stephen's accession, found himself much embarrassed concerning the maintenance of his house, which he was wholly disposed to resign to his father. To swear allegiance to the usurper appeared to him dishonourable, and a breach of his oath to Matilda: to refuse giving this pledge of his fidelity, was to banish himself, at least, from the enjoyment of his estates, and to lose the comfortable situation of a privy-counsellor of the royal family, or contributing to their restoration. He offered Stephen to do him homage, and to take the oath of fealty; but with an express condition, that the king should maintain all his stipulations, and should never invade any of Robert's rights or dignities: and Stephen, though sensible that this reserve, so unusual in itself, and so unbecoming the duty of a subject, was made only to afford Robert a pretence for a revolt on the first favourable opportunity, was obliged, by the numerous friends and retainers of that nobleman, to receive him on those terms. The clergy, who could scarcely, at this time, be deemed subjects to the crown, imitated that dangerous example: they annexed to their oaths of allegiance this condition, that they were only bound so long as the king defended the ecclesiastical liberties, and supported the discipline of the church. The barons, in returning their oaths of allegiance, were more daunted by the destructive public peace, as well as of royal authority: many of them required the right of fortifying their castles, and of putting themselves in a posture of defence; and the king, as long as the rebels were not disposed to this exorbitant demand, was not able to suppress them. All England was immediately filled with those fortresses, which the noblemen garnished either with their vassals, or with hirelings soldiers, who frequently general, as well as the quantity of requisites. Unhoused rapine was exercised upon the people for the maintenance of these troops: and private animosities which had with difficulty been restrained by law, now breaking out without control, rendered England a scene of uninterrupted violence and devastation. Wars between the nobles were carried on with the utmost fury in every quarter; the barons even assumed the right of coming money, and of exercising, without appeal, every act of jurisdiction: and the defence of the laws during this total dissolution of sovereign authority, were obviated, for their immediate safety, to pay court to some neighbouring chieflain, and to purchase his protection. It was a common practice among the populace, and by assisting him in his rapine upon others. The erection of one castle proved the immediate cause of building many others; and even those who obtained not the favour of protecting him, were compelled to give ministration to his entreaties, and by assisting him in his rapine upon others. The elevation of one castle proved the immediate cause of building many others; and even those who obtained not the favour of protecting him, were compelled to give ministration to his entreaties, and by his great principle of self-preservation, to put themselves on an equal footing with their neighbours, who commonly were also their enemies and rivals. The aristocratic power, which is usually so oppressive in the feudal governments, had now risen to its utmost height, during the reign of a prince, who, though endowed with vigour and abilities, had usurped the throne without the pretence of a title, and who was necessitated to tolerate in others the same violence, to which he himself had been beholden for his sovereignty.

But Stephen was not of a disposition to submit long to these usurpations, without making some effort for the recovery of royal dignity. Finding the rebellious magnates of the crown were resisted and abridged, he was also tempted to make his power the sole measure of his conduct; and to violate all those concessions which he had made to himself, and which were not in the ancient privileges of his subjects. The mercenary soldiers, who chiefly supported his authority, having exhausted the royal treasure, subsisted by depredations; and every place was filled with the most grounded complaints against the government. The Earl of Gloucester, having now settled with his friends the plan of an insurrection, A. D. 1157. retired beyond sea, sent the king a de-dance, solemnly resourced his allegiance, and upbraided him with the breach of those conditions which had been annexed to the oath of fealty sworn by that nobleman. David, King of Scotland, appeared at the head of an army in defence of his niece's claim to the crown of Scotland. He was join'd on his journey by the Earls of Albemarle, Robert de Ferrers, William Piercy, Robert de Brus, Roger Mounray, Gilbert Lacey, Walter l'Espece, powerful barons in those parts, assembled an army, with which they encamped at North-Allerton, and sustained the arrival of the enemy. A great battle was here fought, called the battle of the Standard, from a high cresset, erected by the English on a waggon, and carried along with the army as a military ensign. The superiority of forces was defeated, and he himself, as well as his son Henry, narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the English. This success oversaw the malcontents in England, and might have given some stability to Stephen's throne, had he not been so attached with prosperity as to engage in a controversy with the clergy, who were at that time an overmatch for any monarch.

Though the great power of the church, in ancient times, weakened the authority of the crown, and interrupted the course of the laws, it may be doubted whether, in ages of such violence and outrage, it was not rather advantageous that some limits were set to the power of the sword, both in the states of the kingdom, and in the hands of the nobles, and that men were taught to pay regard to some principles and privileges. The chief misfortune was, that the prelates, on some occasions acted entirely as barons, A. D. 1159. employed military power against their sovereign or their neighbours, and thereby often increased those disorders which it was their duty to repress. The Bishop of Salisbury, in imitation of the nobility, had built two strong castles, one at Sherborne, another at Devizes, and had laid the foundations of a third at Malmsbury: his nephew, Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln, had erected a fortress at Newark: and Stephen, who was now sensible from experience of the mischief attending these multiplied fortifications, resolved to have all the barons, and by destroying those of the clergy, who, by their function, seemed less entitled to the barons to such military securities. Making pretence of a fray which had arisen in court between the return of the Bishop of Salisbury and those of his forefathers, he seized both that prelate and the Bishop of Lincoln, threw them into prison, and obliged them by menaces to deliver up those places of strength which they had lately erected.

Henry, Bishop of Winchester, the king's brother, being armed with a legatine commission, now conceived himself to be an ecclesiastical sovereign, no less powerful than...
and the civil; and forgetting the ties of blood which connected him with the king, he resolved to vindicate the clerical privileges, which, he pretended, were here openly violated.

August 30. He assembled a synod at Westminster, and there pronounced the impolicy of Stephen's measures, who had employed violence against the dignitaries of the church, and had not awaited the sentence of a spiritual court, by which alone, he affirmed, they could lawfully be tried and condemned, if their conduct had amounted to aggression or perfidy. The synod ventured to send a summons to the king, charging him to appear before them, and to justify his measures; and Stephen, instead of resenting this indignity, sent Aubrey de Vere, the son of the earl, as his ambassador, to inform the synod that he accused the two prelates of treason and sedition; but the synod refused to try the cause, or examine their conduct, till those castles, of which they had been possessed, were previously restored to them. The Bishop of Salisbury declared that he would appeal to the Pope; and had not Stephen and his partisans employed menaces, and even shewed a disposition of executing violence by the hands of the soldiers, affairs had instantly come to extremity between the crown and the mitre.

While this quarrel, joined to so many other grievances, increased the discontent among the people, the empire was divided into two parties; and, encouraged by the example of the legate, he landed in England, with an intention to Robert Earl of Gloucester, and a retinue of those high and honorable men, which he had made. He opened to her by Adeliza, the queen-dowager, now married to William de Albinia, Earl of Sussex; and she excited, by messengers, her partisans to take arms in every county of England. Adeliza, who had expected that her daughter-in-law would have invaded the kingdom with a much greater force, became apprehensive of danger; and Matilda, to ease her of her fears, removed, first to Brindisi, which belonged to her brother Robert, then to Gloucester, where to lead his cause before the protector of Mito, a great nobleman in those parts, who had embraced her cause. Soon after Geoffrey Talbot, William Mohun, Ralph Lovel, William Fitz-John, William Fitz-Alan, Paganel, and many other barons, declared for her; and her party, which was generally favoured in the kingdom, seemed every day to gain ground upon that of her antagonist.

We were to relate all the military events transmitted to us by contemporary and authentic historians, it would be easy to swell our accounts of this reign into a large volume; but those incidents, so little memorable in themselves, and so confused both in time and place, could afford no attraction, nor entertainment, to the reader. It suffices to say, that the war was spread into every quarter, and that those turbulent barons, who had already shaken off in a great measure the restraint of government, having the encouragement of a public cause, carried on their devastations with redoubled fury, exercised implacable vengeance on each other, and set no bounds to their oppressions over the people. The castles of the nobility were become receptacles of licencious robbers; who, calling forth day and night, committed spoil on the open country, on the villages, and even on the cities, the captives to torture, in order to make them reveal their treasures; sold their persons to slavery; and set fire to their houses, after they had pillaged them. They also committed every act of violence, exposed to the same outrage which had laid waste the rest of the kingdom. The land was left uninhabited; the instruments of husbandry were destroyed or abandoned; and a confusion, as well as a calamitous result, of those disorders, affected equally both parties, and reduced the spoilers, as well as the defenceless people, to the most extreme want and indigence.

A. D. 1140.

As a sequel to these destructive hostilities, there happened at last an event, which seemed to promise some end of the public calamities. Ralph Earl of Chester, and his half-brother, William de Roumain, partisans of Matilda, had surprised the castle of Lincoln; but the earl, exasperated by the affront to Stephen, having invited him to their aid, that prince had close siege to the castle, in hopes of soon rendering himself master of the place, either by assault or by famine. The Earl of Chester, hastened with an army the size of his friends; and Stephen, informed of his approach, took the field with a resolution of giving him battle. After a violent shock, the two wings of the royalists were put to flight; and Stephen himself, surrounded with his enemy, was at last, after exerting great efforts of valor, borne down by numbers, and taken prisoner. He was conducted to Gloucester; and though at first treated with humanity, was soon after, on some suspicion, thrown into prison, and loaded with irons.

Stephen's party was entirely broken by the captivity of their leader, and the barons came in daily from all quarters, and did homage to Matilda. The empress, however, amidst all her prosperity, knew that she was not secure of success, unless she could gain the confidence of the clergy; and as the conduct of the legate had been of late very unsatisfactory, she determined to humiliate his brother, than totally ruining him, she employed every endeavour to fix him in her interests. She held a conference with him in an open plain near Winchester, where she promised all that he wished, with the oath, that if he would acknowledge her for sovereign, would recognise her title as the sole descendant of the late king, and would again submit to the allegiance, which he, as well as the rest of the kingdom, had sworn to her, he should in return be exalted as master of the administration, and in particular, should, at her pleasure, dispose of all vacant bishoprics and abbeys. Earl Robert, her brother, Brian Fitz-Count, Milo of Gloucester, and other great men, being in the same condition, promised to carry on the administration in the same spirit: and the prelate was at last induced to promise her allegiance, but that still burdened with the express condition, that she should, on her part, fulfil her promises. He then conducted her to Winchester, led her in procession to the cathedral, and with great solemnity, in the presence of many bishops and abbots, denounced curses against all those who blessed her, granted absolution to such as were obedient to her, and communicated such as were rebellious. Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, soon after came also to court, and swore allegiance to the empress. Matthew, Bishop of London, and the attachment of the clergy, was willing to receive the crown from their hands; and instead of assembling the states of the kingdom, the measure which the constitution, had it been either fixed by a council of much prince had, in every particular, been wanting to his engagements; public peace was interrupted, crimes were daily committed with impunity, bishops were thrown into prison, those who declared for the queen were put to sale, churches were pillaged, and the most enormous disorders prevailed in the administration. That he himself, in order to procure a redress of these grievances, had formed a conspiracy against the person of the abbot; but instead of inducing him to amend his conduct, had rather offended him by that expedient. That, how much soever misguided, that prince was still his brother, and the object of his affections; but his interests, however, must be regarded as subordinate to those of their heavenly Father, who had now rejected him, and thrown him into the hands of his enemies; that it principally belonged to the clergy to elect and ordain kings; he had summoned them together for that purpose, and having invoked the divine assistance, he now pronounced Matilda, and, in the name of God, as Queen of England. The whole assembly, by their acclamations or silence, gave, or seemed to give, their assent to this declaration.

The only laymen summoned to this council, which decided the fate of the crown, were the Londoners; and even those were required not to give their opinion, but to submit to the decrees of the synod. The deputies of London, however, declined the appointment, alleging that their king should be delivered from prison; but were told by the legate, that it became not the Londoners, who were regarded as noblemen in England, to take part with those barons, who had basely forsaken their lord in battle, and who had treated the holy church with contumely; it is with reason that the citizens of London assumed so much authority, if it be true, what is related by Fitz-Stephen, a contemporary author, that that city could at this time bring into the field no less than 50,000 combatants.

London, notwithstanding its great power, and its attachment to Stephen, was at length obliged to submit to Matilda; and her authority, by the prudent conduct of Earl Basset, the third of the rights of England, and of her kingdom; but affairs remained not long in this situation. That princess, besides the disadvantages of her sex, which weakened her influence over a turbulent and martial people, was used by her enemies, not only to tempt with affability the harshness of a refusal. Stephen's queen, seconded by many of the nobility, petitioned for the liberty of her husband; and offered that, on this condition, she should renounce the crown, and retire into a convent. The legate desired that Prince Eustace, her nephew, might inherit Boulogne, and the other patrimonial estates of his father; the Londoners applied for the establishment of King Edward's laws, instead of those of King Henry, which, they said, were grievous and oppressive. All these petitions were rejected in the most haughty and peremptory manner. The legate, who had probably never been since in his complaint treated Matilda's government, availed himself of the ill humour excited by this imperious conduct, and secretly instigated the Londoners to a revolt. A conspiracy was entered into to seize the person of the empress; and she saved herself by fleeing to Henry, their king, by a precipitate retreat. She fled to Oxford; soon after she went to Winchester: whether the legate, desirous to save appearances, and watching the opportunity to ruin her cause, had retired. But she was forced to leave Oxford, withdrew to Lincoln, and returned to London. Here she recovered her forces to that of the Londoners, and to Stephen's mercenary troops, who had not yet evacuated the kingdom; and he besieged Matilda at Winchester. The princes, being thereby assembled, and advised to march, but at the flight, Earl Robert, her brother, fell into the hands of the enemy. This nobleman, though a subject, was as much the life and soul of his own party, as Stephen was of the other; and the empress, sensible of his merit and importance, consented to exchange the prisoners on equal terms. The civil war was again kindled with greater fury than ever.

A. D. 1147. Earl Robert, finding the successes on both sides nearly balanced, he took possession both of Anjou and Maine, and concluded a marriage, which brought him a great accession of power, and rendered him extremely formidable to his rival. Eleanor, the daughter and heir of William, Duke of Gloucester, and Earl of Poictou, had been married sixteen years to Lewis VII. King of France; and had attended him in a Crusade, which that monarch conducted against the infidels: but having there lost the affections of her husband, and even Matilda's consent, invested in that duchy; and upon the death of his father, Geoffrey, which happened in the same year, he took possession both of Anjou and Maine, and concluded a marriage, which brought him a great accession of power, and rendered him extremely formidable to his rival. Eleanor, the daughter and heir of William, Duke of Gloucester, and Earl of Poictou, had been married sixteen years to Lewis VII. King of France; and had attended him in a Crusade, which that monarch conducted against the infidels; but having there lost the affections of her husband, and even

A. D. 1147. continued his government, he was, by the death of his father, enabled to conspire against the queen. He obtained possession of Anjou, and of a large tract of land in England, and appeared at the head of his partisans. This expedition, however, produced nothing decisive. Stephen took Oxford after a long siege: he was defeated by Earl Robert at Wilton: and the empress, though of a masculine spirit, yet being harassed with a variety of good and bad fortune, and alarmed with continual dangers to her person and family, at last retired into Normandy, whither she had sent her son some time before. The death of her brother, which happened shortly after her resignation, the loss of his train of influence, the slighting of her interests, had not some incidents occurred, which checked the course of Stephen's prosperity. This prince, finding that the castles built by the noblemen of his own party encouraged the spirit of insubordination, he set out with his attendants, and proceeded to visit the churches of the country, and intercede for the protection of the clergy. The people attached to the church, which his brother had brought over to his side, had, after some interval, joined the other party. Eustace the Bishop of Winchester was deprived of the legate's commission, which was conferred on Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, the enemy and rival of the former legate. That pontiff also, having summoned a general council at Rheims, in Champagne, instead of allowing the church of England, as had been usual, to elect its own deputies, nominated five English bishops to represent that church, and required their attendance in the council. Stephen, who, notwithstanding his present difficulties, was jealous of this council, refused to give the list of the bishops he would attend; and the pope, sensible of his advantage in contending with a prince who reigned by a disputed title, took revenge by laying all Stephen's party

A. D. 1147. The disasters of these events caused a sort of royalists, at being thrown into this situation, were augmented by a comparison with Matilda's party, who enjoyed all the benefits of the sacred ordinances; and Stephen was at last obliged, by making great submission to the see of Rome, to remove the reproach from his party. The weakness of both sides, rather than

In England, many of the nobility, Roger de Mohun, William de Warrenne, and others, finding no opportunity to exert their military ardour at home, enlisted themselves in a new Crusade, which, with surprising success, after former disappointments and misfortunes, was now preached by St. Bernard. But an event soon after happened, which threatened a revival of hostilities in England. Prince Henry, who had reached his sixteenth year, was desirous of recovering the honor of his father; and determined to cover every gentleman in that age passed through before he was admitted to the use of arms, and which was even deemed requisite for the greatest princes. He intended to receive his education from the hand of the Pope, and the courts of the King of Sicily; and for that purpose was passed through England with great repute, and was attended by the most considerable of his partisans. He remained some time with the King of Sicily; made excursions into England; and by his dexterity and vigour in all manly exercises, by his valour in war, and his prudent conduct in every occurrence, he roused the hopes of his party, and gave symptoms of those great qualities which he afterwards displayed when he mounted the throne of England. Soon after his return to Normandy, he was, by the Matilda's consent, invested in that duchy; and upon the death of his father, Geoffrey, which happened in the same year, he took possession both of Anjou and Maine, and concluded a marriage, which brought him a great accession of power, and rendered him extremely formidable to his rival. Eleanor, the daughter and heir of William, Duke of Gloucester, and Earl of Poictou, had been married sixteen years to Lewis VII. King of France; and had attended him in a Crusade, which that monarch conducted against the infidels; but having there lost the affections of her husband, and even

What Geoffrey Stephen says of the difficulties of the king of France in London, proves only the great power of the other towns of the kingdom, and indeed of all the mark-graves. See Epit. 151. Were this account to be depended on, London must at that time have contained near 30,000 souls, which must have been about four times the number of the inhabitants at the death of Queen Elizabeth. But these loose calculations, which are often made by historians, are entirely too great. London, in the middle ages, was certainly not more than 15,000 or 20,000 inhabitants. w Wide, and a man of sense, says there were then only forty thousand in fallen under some suspicion of gallantry with a handsome Saracen; Lord, much delicate to the polite, procured a divorce from her, and restored her those rich provinces, which by her marriage she had annexed to the crown of France. Young Henry, neither discouraged by the inequality of years, nor by the reports of Eleanor's gallantries, made successful courtship to that princess, and, espousing her six weeks after her divorce, possessed all her dominions as her dowry. The two princes, received from the bosom of their father, with the interest of his rising fortune, had such an effect in England, that when Stephen, desirous to ensure the crown to his son Eustace, required the Archbishop of Canterbury to take that prince as his successor, the private right and public opinion, and made his escape beyond seas, to avoid the violence and resentment of Stephen.

Henry, informed of these dispositions in the people, made an invasion on England: having gained some success at a battle near Falmesbury, and having taken that place, he proceeded thence to throw successes into Wallingford, which the king had advanced with a superior army to besiege. A decisive action was every day expected; when the great men of both sides, terrified at the prospect of further bloodshed and confusion, interposed with their good offices, and set on foot a negociation between the rival princes.

The extensive confederacies, by which the State of Europe—European politiques are now at once united and set in opposition to each other, and which, though w. Male p. 80. e M. Paris p. 51. Hugon p. 322. p. H. Houl f. 705.
Henry II. was of the same rank with themselves. By this means, the King of France found it more easy to conquer those numerous provinces from England, than to subdue a Duke of Normandy or Guienne, a Count of Anjou, Maine, or Poictou. And after reducing such extensive territories, and having which immediately incorporated with the body of the monarchy, he found greater facility in uniting to the crown the other great fiefs which still remained separate and independent.

But as these important consequences could not be foreseen by human wisdom, the King of France remarked with terror the rising grandeur of the house of Anjou or Plantagenet; and, in order to retard its progress, he had endeavoured to support the tottering fortunes of that bold usurper. But after this prince's death, it was too late to think of oppressing the succession of Henry, or preventing the performance of those stipulations which, with the unanimous consent of the nation, he had made with his predecessor. The English, harassed with civil wars, and disgusted with the bloodshed and depredations which, during the course of so many years, had attended them, were little disposed to violate their oaths, by excluding the lawful heir from the succession of their monarchy.

Many of the most considerable fortresses were in the hands of his partisans; the whole nation had had occasion to see the noble qualities with which he was endowed, and to compare them with the mean talents of William the son of Stephen; and as they were acquainted with his great power, and were rather pleased to see the accession of so many foreign dominions to the crown of England, they never endeavoured the least thoughts of revolting from him. Henry himself, sensible of the advantages attending his present situation, was in no hurry to arrive in England; and being engaged in the siege of a castle on the borders of Normandy, when he received the letter of Stephen's death, he made it a point of honour not to depart from his enterprise, till he had brought it to an issue. He then set out on his journey, and was received in England with the acclamations of all orders of men, who swore with pleasure the oath of fealty and allegiance to him.

The first act of Henry's government corresponded to the high idea entertained of his person by his abilities, and prognosticated the re-establishment of justice and tranquillity, of which the kingdom had so long been bereaved. He immediately, in a most solemn manner, ordered all those who had committed great disorders in the nation; and he sent them abroad, together with William of Ypres, their leader, the friend and confidant of Stephen. He revoked all the grunts made by his predecessor, even those which necessitated the suppression of the Empress Matilda, who had resigned her rights in favour of Henry, made no opposition to a measure so necessary for supporting the dignity of the crown. He repaired the coin, which had been extremely debased during the reign of his predecessor; and he took proper measures against a return of the like abuse. He was rigorous in the execution of justice, and in the suppression of robbery and violence; and that he might restore authority to the laws, he caused all the new-erected castles to be demolished, which had proved so many sanctuaries in freebooters and rebels. The Earl of Ailesimarle, Hugh Mortimer, and Roger the son of Milo of Gloucester, were all punished with the utmost rigor; some resistance to this salutary measure; but the approach of the king with his forces soon obliged them to submit.

Everything being restored to full tranquillity in England, Henry went abroad in order to oppose the attempts of his brother Geoffrey, who, during his absence, had made an incursion into Anjou and Maine, had advanced some pretensions to those provinces, and had got possession of a considerable part of them. On the king's return to his dominions, they would have arisen from the oppression of a co-valuation, which anything against any monstrous vassal, the same sense of common interest made the others oppose themselves to the success of his pretensions. Lewis the Gross, the last sovereign, marched at one time to his frontiers against the Germans at the head of an army of two hundred thousand men; but what immediately follows, was, with the firmness and ability, at another period, to set that prince at defiance, and to maintain open war against him.

The authority of the English monarch was much more extended in his kingdom, and the disproportion much greater between him and the most powerful of his vassals. His demesnes and revenue were large, compared to the greatness of his state; he was accustomed to levy arbitrary exactions on his subjects, of judicature extended his jurisdiction into every part of the kingdom; he could crush by his power, or by a judicial sentence, well or ill founded, any obnoxious baron; and though the feudal institutions which prevailed in his kingdom had the same tendency, in other states, to extirpate the aristocracy and depress the monarchy, it required, in England, according to its present constitution, a great combination of the vassals to oppose their sovereign lord, and those who had not hitherto arisen any baron so powerful, as of himself to levy war against the prince, and to afford protection to the inferior barons.

While such were the different situations of France and England, the last was much better prepared to see the noble qualities with which the former, the accession of Henry II. a prince of great abilities, possessed of so many rich provinces on the continent, might appear an event dangerous, if not fatal, to the French monarchy, and sufficient to break entirely the balance between the states. He was master, in the right of his father, of Anjou and Touraine; in that of his mother, of Normandy and Maine; in that of his wife, of Guienne, Poitou, Anjou, Touraine, Perigord, Angoumois, and Guienne, the provinces of Normandy, and Maine, he possessed of the latter, and was already possessed of the superintendence over that prince, which, on the first cession of Normandy to Rolfo the Dane, had been granted by Chancellor; Simple, to his father. These provinces composed above a third of the whole French monarchy, and were much superior, in extent and opulence, to those territories, which were subjected to the immediate jurisdiction and government of the king. This vassal was here more powerful than his liege lord: the situation which had enabled Hugh Capet to depose the Carolingian princes, seemed to be renewed, and that which had given greater advantages on the side of the French crown, and when England was added to so many provinces, the French king had reason to apprehend, from this conjuncture, some great disaster to himself and to his family; but in reality, it was this circumstance, which appeared so formidable, that saved the monarchy. The Emperor's tenacious quest, exalted to them that pitch of grandeur which they at present enjoy.

The limited authority of the prince in the feudal institutions, prevented the King of England from employing with advantage the force of so many states, which were subjected to his government; and these different members, disposed in situation, and disagreeing in laws, language, and manners, were never thoroughly cemented into one monarchy. He soon became, both from his distant place of residence, and from the incompatibility of interests, a kind of foreigner to his French dominions; and that subtle and artful art, which has often assisted the great in their designs, and which enabled the French crown to extend its influence on the world, when and when England was added to so many provinces, the French king had reason to apprehend, from this conjuncture, some great disaster to himself and to his family: but in reality, it was this circumstance, which appeared so formidable, that saved the monarchy. resigning his claim for an annual pension of a thousand pounds, departed and took possession of the county of Nantz, which the inhabitants, who had expelled Count Hoel, his prince, had put into his hands. Henry returned to England the following year: the incursions of the Welsh were henceforth more opportune opportunities for him; and the natural fastnesses of the country occasioned him great difficulties, and even brought him into danger. His vanguard, being engaged in a narrow pass, was put to rout by Henry's own men, and he was generally defeated, but he survived the battle, and the consequences might have proved fatal to the whole army. For this massacre, Essex was afterwards accused of felony by Robert de Montfort; it was vanquished in single combat; his estate was confiscated; and he was thenceforth, Henry, Duke of Normandy, procured them an accommodation with England.

The martial disposition of the princes in that age engaged them to head their own armies in every enterprise; even the most frivolous and their seizable authority made it commonly impracticable for them to delegate, on occasion, the command to their generals. Geoffrey, the king's brother, died soon after he had taken possession of Nantz: that he had no other title to that county than the voluntary submission or election of the inhabitants two years before, Henry laid claim to the territory as devolved to him by hereditary right. This was a pretension and in the hands of arms. Conan, Duke or Earl of Brittany, (for these titles are given indifferently by historians to these princes,) pretended that Nantz had been lately separated by rebellion from his authority, to which he was assigned, and immediately on Geoffrey's death he took possession of the dispute territory. Last Lewis, the French king, should interpose in the controversy, Henry paid him a visit, and entreated him to support his cause and civilisation; an alliance was contracted between them; and they agreed that young Henry, heir to the English monarchy, should be advanced to Margaret of France; though the former was only five years of age, and the latter was still in her cradle, new source of meeting with no interruption on this side, advanced with his army into Brittany; and Conan, in despair of being able to make resistance, delivered up the county of Nantz to him. The like conduct of the king proved as disastrous to himself, as more important advantages from this incident. Conan, harassed with the tremendous disposition of his subjects, was desirous of procuring to himself the support of so great a monarch; and, as he had been engaged in civilisation, and, as he was not strong enough, to Geoffrey, the king's third son, who was of the same tender years. The Duke of Brittany died about seven years after; and Henry, being mine lord, and also natural guardian to his son and daughter-in-law, put himself in possession of that principality, and annexed it for the present to his other great dominions.

A. D. 1150.

The king had a prospect of making still further acquisitions; and the action of his temper suffered no opportunity of that kind to escape him. Philippa, Duchess of Gienne, mother of Queen Eleanor, was the only issue of William IV. Count of Toulouse; and, as he had inherited his dominions, had not that prince, desiring of maintaining his authority in the main line, conveyed the principality to his brother, Raymond de St. Gilles, by a contract of sale which was in that age regarded as fictitious and illusory. By this means the title of Toulouse was dissolved, and the dispute between the male and female heirs; and the one or the other, as opportunities favoured them, had obtained possession—

Raymond, grandson of Raymond de St. Gilles, was the reigning sovereign; and on Henry's reviving his wife's claim, this prince had recourse for protection to the King of France, who was so much concerned in policy to prevent the further aggrandisement of the English monarch. Lewis, being anxious to secure his title to Guienne, of justice of her claim, and had demanded possession of Toulouse; but his sentiments changing with his interest, he now determined to defend, by his power and authority, the title which had been lately disputed. It was requisite to support his pretensions against potent antagonists; and that nothing but a formidable army could maintain a claim which he had in vain asserted by arguments and reasoning.

An army, composed of feudal vassals, was commonly very intractable and undisobedient, both because of the independent spirit of the persons who served in it, and because the commands were not given, either by the choice of the sovereign, or from the military capacity and experience of the officers. Each baron conducted his own vassals; his rank was greater or less, proportioned to the extent of his property; even the supreme command under the prince was often asserted in a hundred; and the military vassals were obliged to serve only forty days at their own charge; though, if the expedition were distant, they were put to great expense; the prince reaped little benefit. Besides, whatever methods the king might adopt, he was unable to maintain his dominions, for the insurrections, levies upon his vassals in Normandy, and other provinces which were remote from Toulouse, a sum of money in lieu of their service; and this commutation, being exacted by the duke of Toulouse, who had no anxiety to make concessions by force of arms.

He imposed, therefore, a scatage of 180,000 pounds on the knights' fees, a commutation to which, though it was unusual, and the first perhaps of the kind, he would not willingly submit; and with this money, he levied an army which was more under his command, and whose service was more durable and constant. Assisted by these means, War was now openly carried on between the two monarchs, but produced no memorable event: it soon ended in a cessation of arms, and that followed by a peace, which was not, however, attended with any confidence or good correspondence between those sovereigns. The fortress of Gisors, being part of the dowry stipulated to Margaret of France, had been consigned A. D. 1150, by agreement to the Knights Templars, on condition that it should be delivered to Henry's hands after the conclusion of the treaty. The king, that he might prepare for immediately demanding the place, ordered the marriage to be solemnised between the prince and princess, though both infants; and he endeavoured to fret the marriage ceremony with the ceremony of consecration, as was generally suspected, to put him in possession of Gisors. Lewis, resenting this fraudulent conduct, present money. The Norman Chronicle, p. 905, says that Henry raised only 50,000 marks in his life for his foreign dominions; this is in no doubtful case of the sum which Geoffrey says he levied on England; an injustice so wide probable. A nation may, by degrees, be brought to bear a tax which it has not hitherto been in the power of the whole land. Geoffrey's is indeed a contemporary author, but chroniclers are often guilty of striking a story from whole to parts; but they are often be concerned in the public revenues. This tax would make 300,000 pounds of our banned the Templars, and would have made war upon the King of England, had it not been for the mediation and authority of Pope Alexander III, who had been chased from Rome by the Anti-pope, Victor IV. and resided at that time in France. That we may form an idea of the authority possessed by the Roman pontiff during those ages, it may be proper to observe, that Henry not only submitted himself to the judgment of the Pope at the castle of Torei, on the Loire; and they gave him such marks of respect, that both dismounted to receive him, and holding each of them one of the terms of his bed, and remaining there a whole day, acknowledged the Pope as the sovereign of the kingdom. The aspiring spirit of Henry, which gave inquietude to all his neighbours, was not likely long to pay a tame submission to the encroachments of subjects, and at nothing opens the eyes of men so readily as their interest, he left the Pope, and in that submissive manner into the castle. A spectacle, which Baroniou, in an encomium, to God, angels, and men; and such as had never before been exhibited to the world!

Henry, soon after he had accommodated his differences with Lewis, by the Pope's mediation, returned to England; where he commenced an enterprise, which, though required by sound policy, and even conducted in the main with prudence, bred him great dissimulation, involved him in danger, and was not concluded without some loss and dishonour.

The usurpations of the clergy, which had at first been gradual, were now become so great, that the contest between the regal and pontifical was really arrived at a crisis in England; and it became necessary to determine whether the king or the pontiff was to be the sovereign of the kingdom. The aspiring spirit of Henry, which gave inquietude to all his neighbours, was not likely long to pay a tame submission to the encroachments of subjects, and at nothing opens the eyes of men so readily as their interest. He left the Pope, and in that submissive manner into the castle. A spectacle, which Baroniou, in an encomium, to God, angels, and men; and such as had never before been exhibited to the world!

Thomas Becket, the first man of English descent, who, since the Norman conquest, had, during the course of a whole century, risen to any considerable station, was born of reputable parents at the court of London; and being endowed both with industry and capacity, he early instructed himself into the favour of Archbishop Theobald, and obtained from that prelate some preferments and offices. In these means he was enabled to travel for improvement to Italy, where he studied the civil and canon law at Bologna; and on his return, he appeared to have made such proficiency in knowledge, that he was promoted to the archdeaconry of Canterbury, an office of considerable trust and profit. He was afterwards employed with success by Theobald, in transacting business at Rome; and on Henry's accession, he was recommended to that monarch as worthy of further promotion. Henry, who knew that Becket was instrumental to the success of that resolution of the archbishop, which had tended so much to facilitate his own advancement to the throne, was already prepossessed in his favour; and finding, on further acquaintance, that he had been carefully brought up in every branch of study, he soon promoted him to the dignity of chancellor, one of the civil offices in the kingdom. The chancellor, in that age, besides the custody of the great seal, had possession of all vacant prelacies and abbey; he was the guardian of all such manors and parishes as were the king's tenures; all baronies which escheated to the crown were under his administration; he was entitled to a place in council, even though he were not particularly summoned; and as he exercised also the office of secretary of state, and it belonged to him to countersign all commissions, writs, and letters patent, he was a kind of prime minister, and was concerned in the despatch of every business of importance. Besides exercising this high office, Becket, by the favour of the king or archbishop, was made Provost of Beverley, Dean of Hastings, and Constable of the Tower. He was put in possession of the house of Bury, and Besides exercising this high office, Becket, by the favour of the king or archbishop, was made Provost of Beverley, Dean of Hastings, and Constable of the Tower. He was put in possession of the house of Bury, and

In the year 1161, Henry laid a heavy and an arbitrary tax on all the churches within his dominions. See Epist. 36. Thom. p. 235.

This is a natural inference from the history of the time. The clergy, then, were held in great esteem by the people; and it is not improbable that the bishops and deans were employed in the king's service, and even attended the king in his wars at Toulouse; in the subsequent wars on the frontiers of Normandy, where he maintained, during forty days, twelve hundred knights, and four thousand of their train, and in an embassy to France, with which he was intrusted, he astonished the court by the number and magnificence of his retinue. Henry, besides committing all his more important business to Becket's management, honoured him with his friendship and intimacy; and whenever he was disposed to relax himself by sports of any kind, he admitted his chancellor to the party. An instance of their familiarity is mentioned by Fitz-Stephens, which, as it shows the manners of the age, it may not be improper to relate. One day, as the king and the chancellor were riding together in the streets of London, they observed a beggar, who was shivering with cold. Would it not be very praiseworthy, said the king, to give that poor man a warm coat in this severe season? It would, surely, replace the chancellor. and you do well, Sir, in thinking of such good actions. Then he should have one presently, created the king; and swung the skin of the chancellor's coat, which was scarlet, over his own, and assumed, began to censure violently. The chancellor defended himself for some time, and they had both of them like to have tumbled off their horses in the street, when Becket, after a vehement struggle, let go his coat, and the crown bestowed on him by his peasant. His brother, who, in ignorance of the quality of the persons, was not a little surprised at the present.

Becket, who, by his complaisance and good humour, had always made himself agreeable, and by his industry and abilities useful, to his master, appeared to him the fittest person for supplying the vacancy made by the death of Theobald. As he was well acquainted with the king's person, and had the most pretensions to be the successor than he totally altered his demeanour and conduct, and endeavoured to acquire the character of sanctity, of which his former busy and ostentatious course of life might, in the eyes of the people, have naturally Beavered him. Without consulting the king, he immediately returned into his hands the commission of chancellor; pretending, that he must therefore detach himself from secular affairs, and be solely applied to the exercise of a spiritual function; but in reality, that he might break oft all connexions with Henry, and apprise him, that Becket, as Primate of England, was now become entirely a new person. He maintained, in his public and private transactions alone, his ancient pomp and lustre, which was useful to strike the vulgar: in his own person he affected the greatest austerity and most rigid mortification, which, he was sensible would have an equal or greater tendency to the same end. He wore sackcloth next his skin, which, by his affected care to conceal it, was necessarily the more remarked by all the world: he changed it so seldom, that it was filled with dirt and vermin: his usual meal was a thin tumbler of water, and the he even refused to be further unpalatable by the mixture of unsavoury herbs: he tore his hair with the frequent discipline which he inflicted on it: he daily on his knees washed, in imitation of Christ, to the thousand beggars, whom he afterwards dismissed with presents: he gained the affections of the monks by his frequent charities to the convents and hospitals: every one, who made profession of sanctity, was admitted to his conversation, and returned full of pious discourses: his aspect wore the appearance of seriousness and mental recollection, and secret devotion: and all men of penetration plainly saw that he was meditating some great design, and that the ambition and ostentation of his character had turned itself towards a new and more dangerous object.

Becket waited not till Henry should consider the utility of those projects against the ecclesiastical state, but immediately took them in hand, which, he knew, had been formed by that prince: he was himself the aggressor, and endeavoured to overawe the king by the intracity and boldness of his enterprises. He summoned the Earl of Clare to surrender the barony of Tunbridge, which, ever since the Conquest, had remained in the family of that nobleman, but which, as it had formerly belonged to the see of Canterbury, Becket pretended his predecessors were prohibited by the canons to alienate. The Earl of Clare, besides the lustre which he derived from the greatness of his own birth, and the extent of his possessions, was a man of great abilities, and had been brought up in the kingdom, his sister, who was a celebrated beauty, had further extended his credit among the nobility, and was even supposed to have gained the king's affections; and Becket could not readily obtain his consent. But in this interest, his resolution of maintaining with vigour the rights, real or pretended, of his see. William de Eynsford, a military tenant of the crown, was warmly interested in the enterprise; living by his abilities, he had accumulated wealth, and held the Archbishops of Canterbury: but Becket, without regard to William's right, presented, on a new and illegal pretext, one Laurence to that living, who was rightly judged, that he had more interest, and was making himself, as was usual in spiritual courts, both judge and party, issued, in a summary manner, the sentence of excommunication against Eynsford, who complained to the king, that he who held in capite of the crown should, contrary to the practice established by the Conqueror, and maintained ever since by his successors, be subjected to that terrible sentence, without the previous consent of the sovereign. Henry, who had now broken off all personal intercourse with Becket, sent him orders to absolve Eynsford; but received for answer, that it belonged not to the king to inform whom he should absolve and whom excommunicate: and it was not till after a long and painful correspondence, that Becket, though with the worst grace imaginable, was induced to comply with the royal mandate.

Henry, though he found himself thus grievously mistaken in the character of his favourite, which was dedicated to the primacy, determined not to desist from his former intention of retrenching clerical usurpations. He was entirely master of his extensive dominions: the prudent and ingenuous had been summoned to the council, and the perpetual success, that Becket, had raised his character above that of any of his predecessors: the popacy seemed to be weakened by a schism which divided all Europe: and he rightly judged, that if he retained favour with the crown, its influence, if neglected, the crown must, from the prevalent superstition of the people, be in danger of falling into an entire subordination under the mitre. The union of greater and higher ecclesiastical power serves extremely, in every civilized government, to the maintenance of peace and order: and prevents those mutual encroachments which, as there can be no ultimate judge between them, are often attended with the most dangerous consequences. He who is the guiding hand in every part of the state, who unites these powers, receives the appellation of prince or primate, is not material: the superior weight which temporal interests commonly bear in the apprehensions of men and women, is far more prevalent: the clergy are often the most powerful; and in time prevents those gross impurities and bigoted persecutions, which, in all false religions, are the chief foundation of clerical authority. But during the progress of ecclesiastical usurpations, the state, by the resistance of the civil magistrate, is naturally thrown into convulsions: and it behoves the prince, both for his own interest, and for that of the public, to provide, in time, sufficient barriers against so dangerous and meddlesome a rival. This precaution had hitherto been much neglected in England, as well as in other catholic countries; and affairs at last seemed to have come to a dangerous crisis: a sovereign of the greatest abilities was now on the throne; a prelate of the most intangible and intrepid character was possessed of the primacy: the contending powers appeared to be armed with their full force, and it was natural to expect some extraordinary event to result from their conflict.

Among their other inventions to obtain money, the clergy had inculcated the necessity of penance as an atonement for sin; and having again introduced the practice of paying them large sums as a commutation, or species of atonement, for the remission of those penances, the sins of the people, by these means, had become a revenue to he knew that the bishops, though overawed by the present combination of the crown and the barons, would take the full advantage of the opportunity of denying this authority which had enacted these Constitutions, he resolved that they should all set their seal to them, and give a promise to observe them. None of the prelates dared to oppose his will. They, scourged by the Earl of Cornwall and Leicester, the barons of principal authority in the kingdom, obstinately withheld his assent. At last, Richard de Hastings, Grand Prior of the Templars in England, and the bishop of his own diocese, had been summoned to his kingdom, with many tears entreated him, if he paid any regard either to his own safety or that of the church, not to provoke, by a fruitless opposition, the indignation of a great monarch, who was at that time determined to keep the feeble revenge on every one that should dare to oppose him. Becket, finding himself deserted by all the world, even by his own brethren, was at last obliged to comply and he promised, "Egregiously, with good faith, and without fraud or reserve, to observe the Constitutions; and he took an oath to that purpose." The king, thinking that he had now fully prevailed in this great enterprise, sent the Constitutions to Pope Alexander, in order to have their ratification transmitted by his own hands, and not by the pontiff's mitigation of them: but Alexander, who, though he owed the most important obligations to the king, plainly saw, that these laws were calculated to establish the authority of the king of England on the whole earth, and to make his royal power on the clergy, condemned them in the strongest terms; abrogated, annulled, and rejected them. There were only six articles, the least important, which, for the sake of the rest, was willing to revolt against the king. Becket, when he observed that he might hope for support in an opposition, expressed the deepest sorrow for his compliance; and endeavoured to engage all the other bishops of England to the same predicament to add the privileges of their common residence, and to the ecclesiastical privileges, in which he represented the interest and honour of God to be so deeply concerned. He redoubled his antics, in order to procure, in two or three clergymen, that it should not be in his power to execute any act in the primate of Canterbury; and the king, finding how fruitless such an authority would prove, sent back the commission by the same messenger that brought it. The prime minister, however, who founded himself still exposed to the king's indignation, endeavoured twice to escape secretly from the kingdom; but was as often detained by contrary winds; and Henry hastened to make him feel the effects of his own austerity. He instituted John, Mareschal of the Exchequer, to sue Becket in the archiepiscopal court for some lands, part of the manor of Poulsham; and to appeal thence to the king's court. The prelate, to avoid this cause, the primate sent four knights to represent certain irregularities in John's appeal; and at the same time to excuse himself, on account of sickness, for not appearing personally in the court of Poulsham. (2) (It even deserve the name) was represented as a grievous contempt; the four knights were menaced, and with difficulty escaped being sent to prison, as offering falsehoods to the court. (3) The king, in order to Becket to the utmost, summoned, at Northampton, a great council, which he purposed to make the instrument of his vengeance against the inflexible prelate. The king had raised Becket into a low station to the highest offices, had honoured him with his countenance and friendship, had trusted to his assistance in forwarding his favourite project against the clergy; and when he found him become of a sudden his most rigid opponent, while he was resolved to become his most bitter adversary, he was forced to disappointment, and indignation against such signal ingratitude, transported him beyond all bounds of moderation; and there seems to have entered more of passion than of policy into his deportment, and his proceedings. (4) The barons notwithstanding, in the great council, voted whatever sentence he was pleased to dictate to them; and the bishops themselves, who undoubtedly bore a secret favour to Becket, and were proud of the champion of their privileges, concurred with the rest in the design of oppressing his primate. In vain did Becket urge that his court was proceeding with the utmost regularity, and in accordance with the law; which, however, he said would appear, from the sheriff's testimony, to be entirely unjust and iniquitous: that he himself had discovered no contempt of the king's court; but, on the contrary, the Constitutions of the primate, his absence, had virtually acknowledged its authority: that he also, in consequence of the king's summons, personally appeared at present in the great council, ready to justify his cause against the marshal, and to submit his conduct to their inquiry and jurisdiction: that even should it be found that he had been guilty of non-appearance, the laws had affixed a very slight penalty to that offence; and that as he was an inhabitant of Kent, where his archiepiscopal palace was seated, he was by law entitled to some greater indulgence than usual in the rate of his fine. By this means the king obtained the passage of a new law, which was so palpably oppressive as one article, he may be presumed to be equally oppressive in the rest; (5) Though followed's letter, or order, as it may be, addressed to Becket himself, he does not obscure any authority on that account (6). For if even an ordain of letters cannot be supposed quite complete. Had that the collection be not made of one dealing very partial to that prelate, appears from the inherence of them, there are many prelates very little favorable to the cause of the king in his other state. (7) The King himself was interested in order to publish them with great care, particularly of this letter ofFollow. Pray, Becket, make no answer of it, nor design to write to any countenanced person, whose every communication would be communicated, and the bishop to his grave; that he may not succeed in giving him the more freely. (6) Though the sentence pronounced on Becket was a mere pretence, and that the Constitutions of the kingdom were delivered to the king, this does not satisfy the narrative of his. For it may be supposed to answer the purpose of his bearing a letter as no answer. Becket submitted so far to the sentiment of condemnation of goods may speak the voice of the king; but he found that they were then not at that time to question the authority of the king's courts. (7) It may be supposed that the sentence of the of the Constitutions of Clarendon, but the prime minister betrayed himself in the proclamation of the patent of excommunication. If it is in conformity to the testimony of all the historians, and directly contrary to him. The primiate submitted to the decree; and all the prelates, except Fulkol, Bishop of London, who paid court to the king by this singularity, became sureties for him. It is remarkable, that several Norman barons voted in this council; and we may conclude, with some probability, that a like practice had prevailed in many of the great councils summoned since the Conquest. For the consideration of what has been written, we give the full accounts of these transactions, does not mention this circumstance as any wise singular; 4 and Becket, in all his subsequent remonstrances with regard to the severe treatment which he received from the hands with which he lived, to a certain irregularity which to us appears very palpable and flagrant. So little precision was there at that time in the government and constitution. 4

The king was not content with this sentence, however violent and oppressive. Next day, he demanded of Becket the sum of three hundred pounds, which the pri- mate had levied upon the honours of Eye and Berkhain, while in his possession. Becket, after pretending that he was not bound to answer to this suit, because it was not contained in his summons; after remarking, that he had expended more than that sum in the repairs of those castles, and of the royal palace at London; expressed however his resolution to never give any ground of quarrel between him and his sovereign: he agreed to pay the sum; and immediately gave sureties for it. In the subsequent meeting, the king demanded five hundred marks, which, out of the greater sum, that the king was required to pay the balance due from the revenues of all the prelates, abbots, and baronies, which had, during that time, been subjected to his management. 4 Becket observed, that, as there was no direction from any of his successors, who were consulted, he was not prepared to answer it; but he required a delay, and prom- ised to that case to give satisfaction. The king insisted upon sureties; and Becket desired leave to consult his suffragans in a case of such importance. 4

It is apparent, from the known character of Henry, and from the usual vigilance of his government, that, when he promoted Becket to the see of Canterbury, he was, on good grounds, well pleased with his administration to the former high office with which he had intrusted him; and that, even if that prelate had dissipated money beyond the income of his place, the king was satisfied that his reputation was such, that the body of the prelates was more than capable of his account. 4 Two years had since expired; no demand had, during that time, been made upon him; it was not till the quarrel arose concerning ecclesiastical privileges, that the claim was started, and the prelate was, of a sudden, required to produce accounts of such intrac- tancy and extent before a tribunal which had shown a de- termined resolution to ruin and oppress him. To find sureties that he should answer so boundless and uncertain a claim, which, in the king’s estimation, amounted to 40,000 marks, 4 was impracticable; and Becket’s suffrag- ans were extremely at a loss what counsel to give him in such critical emergency. 4 Ily the advice of the Bishop of Winchester, he offered two thousand marks as a general satisfaction for all demands: but this offer was rejected by the king. 4 Some prelates exhorted him to resign his see, on condition of receiving an acquittal; others were of opinion that he must ery to submit himself entirely to the king’s mercy; 4 but the primiate, thus pushed to the utter- most, had too much courage to sink under oppression: he determined to brave all his enemies, to trust to thestanding of his character for protection, to involve his cause with that of God and his people, and to stand the utter- most efforts of royal indignation.

After a few days spent in deliberation, Becket went to church and said mass, where he had previously ordered, that the intercess to the comination service should begin with these words, Princes sol, and spoke against us; the passage appropriated for the martyrdom of St Stephen, whom the primiate thereby tacitly pretended to resemble, in his sufferings for the sake of righteousness. He went thence to court, arrayed in his sacred vestments: as soon as he arrived, he was deplored by his friends, and in his own hands, bore it sted as his protection, and marched in that posture into the royal apartments. 4 The king, who was in an inner room, was astonished at this parade, by which the primiate seemed to menace him and his court with the sequel of excommunication; and he seized some of the prelates to remonstrate with him on account of such audacious behaviour. These prelates complained to Becket, that, by subscribing himself to the Constitutions of Clarendon, he had sinned them to transact any thing; and that now, when it was too late, he pretended to shake off all subordination to the civil power, and appeared desirous of involving them in the guilt which must attend any violation of these laws, established by their consent, and ratified by their subscriptions. 4 Becket replied, that he had indeed subscribed the Constitutions of Clarendon, legally, with good faith, and without fraud or reserve; but in these words there was virtually a salvo for the rights of their order, which, being connected with the cause of God and his church, could never be relinquished by their oath and engagements: that if he and they had erred in respecting the ecclesiastical privileges of the church, which they could now make was to retract their consent, which, in such a case, could never be obligatory, and to follow the Pope’s authority, who had solemnly annulled the Constitutions of Clarendon, and had absolved them from all oaths which they had been bound to observe them. 4 A determined resolution was evidently expressed to oppress the church; the storm had first broken upon him; for a slight offence, and which too was falsely imputed to him, he had been tyrannically deprived of his conclave, and he was not con-vinced that a new and unheard-of claim was since started, in which he could expect no justice; and he plainly saw, that he was the destined victim, who, by his ruin, must prepare the way for the absolute subversion of all ecclesiastical observance; that he strictly executed them who were his suffragans from assisting at any such trial, or giving their sanction to any sentence against him; he put himself and his see under the protection of the supreme pontiff; and appealed to him against any penalty which his inquisitive judges might think proper to inflict upon him: and that, however terrible the indignation of so great a monarch as Henry, his sword could not break any thing that was sacred; he was, in fact, the church, intrusted into the hands of the primiate, that could kill the soul, and throw the disobedient into infinite and eternal perdición. 4

 Appeals to the Pope, even in ecclesiastical causes, had been abolished by the Constitutions of Clarendon, and were become criminal by law; but an appeal in a civil cause, such as the king’s demand upon Becket, was a practice altogether new and unprecedented; it tended directly to the subversion of the government, and could receive no colour of excuse, except from the determined resolution, which was but too apparent, in Henry and the great council, to effectuate, without justice, but under colour of law, the total ruin of the inimicable king. The Ling, having now obtained a pretext so much more plausible for his violence, would probably have pushed the affair to the utmost extremity against him; but Becket gave him no leas whereby he should like to conduct the prosecution. 4 He re- fused so much as to hear the seque, the bars, the bars of the second rank, had given upon the king’s claim; he departed from pale; and asked judgment of Henry’s immediate submission to the See of Northampton; and upon meeting with a refusal, he withdrew secretly; wandered about in disguise for some time; and at last took shipping, and arrived safely at Gravelines.

The violent and unjust prosecution of Becket had a natural tendency to turn the public favour on his side, and when once that had taken root, it became extremely against him, and his departure from all oats and engagements, as well as the enormity of those ecclesiastical privileges, of which he affected to be the champion. There was the greater danger, because in all which proceedings for the defence and protection in foreign countries. Philip, Earl of Flanders, and Lewis, King of France, jealous of the rising greatness of Henry, were well pleased to give him due attention to the government that he had become the common cause of princes, they affected to put very respectively the condition of the exiled prelate; and the latter even honoured him with a visit at Stourton, in which city he had invited him to fix his residence.* The Pope, whose interests were more immediately concerned in supporting him, gave a cold reception to a magnificent embassy which Henry sent to accuse him; while Becket himself, who had come to Sees in order to justify his cause before the sovereign pontiff, was received with the greatest marks of distinction. The king, in revenge, sequestered the revenues of Canterbury; and by a conduct which might be esteemed arbitrary, there had been at that time any regular charges, a very liberal, he handed all of the prince's relations and domestics, to the number of four hundred, whom he obliged to swear before their departure, that they would immediately join their patron. But this policy, by way of provocation, seemed to require to be followed by necessity, lost its effect. The Pope, when they arrived beyond sea, absolved them from their oath, and distributed them among the convents in France and Flanders. A residence was assigned to Becket himself, in the convent of Poitiers, where he lived for some years in great magnificence, partly from a pension granted him on the revenues of that abbey, partly from remittances made him by French monarchs.

The more to ingratiate himself with the Pope, Becket returned into the see of Canterbury, to which, he affirmed, he had been unconsciously elected by the abbey of the royal monastery, and Alexander, in his turn, besides investing him anew with that dignity, pretended to abrogate, by a bull, the sentence which the great council of England had passed against him. Henry, after attempting in vain to procure a conference with the Pope, who departed soon after for Rome, when the present state of his affairs now invited him, made provisions against the consequences of that breach which impeded between his kingdom and the apostolic see. He issued orders for the security of his persons, in that all appeals to the Pope or archbishop; forbidding any one to receive any mandates from them, or apply in any case to their authority; declaring it treasonable to bring from either of them, or to send them to the king, and punishable in secular clergyman by the loss of their eyes and by castration, in regular by imputation of their fact, and in lieu of death; and menacing with sequestrements and imprisonment the persons themselves, as well as their kindred, who should pay obedience to any such interdict. And he further obliged all his subjects to swear to the observance of those orders. These were edicts of the utmost importance, affected the lives and properties of all the subjects, and even changed for the time the national religion, by breaking off all communication with Rome; yet were enacted by the sole authority of the king, and were derived entirely from his will and pleasure.

The ceremonies, which, in the primitive church, were in a great measure dependent on the civil, had, by a gradual process, reached an equality and independence; and though the limits of the two jurisdictions were difficult of a precise division, the hierarchy, and, on the other hand, the government on both sides, government might still have been conducted in that imperfect and irregular manner which attended all human institutions. But as the ignorance of the age encouraged the ecclesiastics daily to extend their privileges, and even to advance maxims totally incompatible with civil government; Henry had thought it high time to put an end to their pretensions, and, formally, in a public council, to abrogate the laws by which he had been distin-

Prince therefore principle stood on the one side, power on the other; and if the English had been actuated by conscientious motives, it was impossible that they should have been speedily disposed to the prince; and as soon, by the general defection of Henry's subjects, have been decided against him. Becket, in order to forward this event, filled all places with exclamations against the violence which he had suffered. He compared himself to Christ, who had been condemned by a lay tribunal, and who was crucified anew in the present oppressions under which his church laboured. He took it for granted, as a point inseparable, that his cause was the cause of God; he assumed the character of champion for the propagation of the divinity; he pretended to be the spiritual father of the king and all the people of England: he even told Henry, he was regarded solely by the authority of the church; and thought he had no right to interfere in affairs of State so openly on the one side, than that prince had on the other, he seemed still, from the general favour borne him by the ecclesiastics, to have all the advantage in the argument. The king, on the other hand, having the power remaining in his hands, suspended the payment of Peter's pence: he made advances towards an alliance with the emperor, Frederic Barbarossa, who was at that time engaged in dread wars with Alexander; he recovered some intentions of acknowledging Pascal III. the present Anti-pope, who was protected by that emperor; and by these expedients he endeavoured to terrify the en cerprises of the French monarch, and prevent the sovereign pontiff, from proceeding to extremities against him.

But the violence of Becket, still more than the nature of the controversy, kept affairs from remaining long in suspense between the parties. That prelate, instigated by revenge, and animated by the present glory attending his situation, pushed matters to a decision, and issued a censure, excommunicating the king's chief minister, and compelling all the clergy who had favoured or opposed the Constructions of Clarendon. These Constitutions he abrogated and annulled; he absolved all men from the oaths which they had taken to observe them; and he suspended the spiritual thunder over Henry, who were penalised by the prince that might avoid the blow by a timely repentance.

The situation of Henry was so unhappy, that he could employ no expedient for saving his ministers from this terrible storm, and he was involved, without being able to extricate himself, and having recourse to a tribunal whose authority he had himself attempted to abridge in this very article of appeals, and which he knew was so deeply engaged on the side of his adversary. But even this expediency was not likely to be long effectual. Becket had obtained from the Pope a legatine mission over England; and in virtue of that authority, which admitted of no appeal, he summoned the bishops of London, Salisbury, and others, to attend him, and ordered, under pain of excommunication, the ecclesiastics, sequestered on his account, to be restored in two months to all their benefices. But John of Oxford, the king's general, who represented the Pope, had ordered the bishops for suspending this sentence; and he gave the pon tiff such hopes of a speedy reconciliation between the king and Becket, that two legates, William of Paria and Otto, were sent to Normandy, where the king then resided, and they were to alter his measures of conduct there. But the pretensions of the parties were as yet too opposite to admit of an accommodation. The king required, that all the Constitutions of Clarendon should be ratified; Becket, that previously to any agreement, he and his adherents should be restored to their possessions; and as the legates had no power to pronounce a definitive sentence on either side, the negotiation soon after came to nothing. The Cardinal of Pisa also, being much attached to Henry, took a hand in making offers, in which he was supported by a number of counsellors; and to procure him every possible indulgence from the see of Rome. About this time, the king had also the address to interpose in the persons of the archbishops of Canterbury and York, and to settle by a formal sentence the two cases. The legates, Geoffrey, with the bearess of Brittany; a concession which, considering Henry's demerits towards the church, gave great scandal both to Becket, and to his zealous patron, the King of France.

The intricacies of the feudal law had, in that age, rendered the boundaries of power between the prince and his vassals, and between one prince and another, as uncertain as these between the crown and the mites; and all wars took their origin from disputes, which, had there been any tribunal possessed of power to enforce their decrees, ought to have been decided only before a court of jurisdiction. Henry, in prosecution of some object in which he was involved with the Count of Auvergne, a vassal of the duchy of Guienne, had invaded the territories of that nobleman, who had recourse to the King of France, his superior lord, for the redress of his wrongs between the two monarchs. But this war was, as usual, no less feeble in its operations, than it was frivolous in its cause and object; and after occasioning some mutual depredations, the French army, composed of the forces of Poitou and Guienne, was terminated by a peace. The terms of this peace were rather disadvantageous to Henry, and prove that this prince had, by reason of his contest with the church, lost the superiority which he had hitherto maintained over the crown of France; an additional motive to him for accommodating those differences.

The Pope and the king began at last to perceive, that, in the present situation of affairs, neither of them could expect a final and decisive victory over the other, and that they had more to fear than to hope from the duration of the controversy. Though the vigour of Henry's government had confirmed his authority in all his dominions, his throne might be shaken by a sentence of excommunication; and if England itself could, by its situation, be more easily guarded against the contigence of superstitious prejudices, his French provinces at least, whose communica- tion with some of the southern parts of France was so much exposed, on that account, to some great revolution or convulsion. He could not, therefore, reasonably imagine that the Pope, while he retained such a check over him, would suffer the constitutions of Clarendon, which both put an end to the presbyteries in England, and would give an example to other states of ascertaining a like independence. Pope Alexander on the other hand, being still engaged in dangerous wars with the Emperor Frederic, might, justly apprehend, that Henry, rather than relinquish claims of such importance, would join the party of his enemy; and as the trials hitherto made of the spiritual weapons by Becket had not succeeded to his expectation, and every thing had remained quiet in all the king's dominions, nothing seemed impossible to the capacity and vigilance of so great a monarch. The disposition of minds on both sides, produced frequent attempts towards an accommodation; but as both parties knew that the essential articles of the dispute could not then be terminated, they entertained a perpetual jealousy of each other, and were resolved not to lose the least advantage in the negotiation. The munificence, Grisantes and Vivian, having received a commission to endeavour a reconciliation, met with the king in Normandy; and after all differences seemed to be adjusted, Henry offered to make such concessions as should make his eternal conciliator, the Popes, give such assurance to Becket, that the interdict, in the end, became fruitless, and the excommunications were renewed against the king's ministers. Another negotiation was conducted at Montmirial, in presence of the King of France, and the French prelates; where Becket also offered to make his submissions, with a salvo to the honour of God, and the liberties of the church; which, for the like reason, was extremely offensive to the king, and rendered the treaty abortive. A third conference, under the same mediation, was broken off, by Becket's insisting on a like reserve in his submissions; yet a fourth was undertaken; the terms were adjusted, and when the primate expected to be introduced to the king, and to receive the kiss of peace, which it was usual for princes to grant in those times, and which was regarded as a sure pledge of Henry's good faith, he refused him that honour; under pretence, that, during his anger, he had made a rash vow to that purpose. This formality served, among such jealous spirits, to prevent the conclusion of the treaty; and though the difficulty was attempted to be overcome by a dispensation which the Pope granted to Henry from his vow, that prince could not be prevailed on to depart from the resolution which he had taken.

In one of these conferences, at which the French king was present, Henry said to that monarch: "There have been many Kings of England, some of greater, some of less authority than myself; there have also been many Archbishops of Canterbury, and others of great pretensions. It is not entitled to every kind of respect: let Becket but act towards me with the same submission which the greatest of his predecessors have paid to the least of mine, and there shall be no controversy between us." The Pope, therefore, made with this state of the case, and with an offer which Henry made to submit his cause to the French clergy, that he could not forbear condemning the primate, and withdrawing his friendship from him during some time; but the bigotry of that prince, and other common animosities against Henry, soon produced a renewal of their former good correspondence.

All difficulties were at last adjusted between the parties; and the king allowed Becket to return, on conditions which may be esteemed both honourable and advantageous to that prelate. He was not required to give up any rights of the church, or resign any of those pretensions which had been the original ground of the controversy. It was agreed that all these questions should be buried in oblivion; but that Becket and his adherents should, without making further submission, be restored to all the livings, and that even the possessors of such benefits as depended on the see of Canterbury, and had been filled during the primate's absence, should be expelled, and Becket have liberty to supply the vacancies. The kings returned to Clarendon, and so deeply on the honour and dignity of the crown, Henry respected only the advantage of seeing his ministers absolved from the sentence of excommunication pronounced against them, and of preventing the interdict, which, if these hard conditions had not been complied with, was ready to be laid on all his dominions. It was easy to see how much he dreaded that event, when a prince of so high a spirit could submit to terms so dishonourable in order to prevent it. So anxious was Henry to accommodate all differences, and to reconcile himself fully with Becket, that he took the most extraordinary steps to flatter his vanity, and even, on both sides, made proposals to hold the stirrup of that haughty prelate while he mounted.

But the king attained not even that temporary tranquility which he had hoped to reap from these expedients. During the heat of his quarrel with Becket, which was every day expecting an interdict to be laid on his kingdom, and a sentence of excommunication to be fulfilled against his person, he had thought prudent to have his son, Prince Henry, associated with him in the royalty, and named him in a diploma to the King of Scotland, and Archbishop of York. By this precaution he both insured the succession of that prince, which, considering the many past irregularities in that point, could not but be esteemed somewhat precarious; and he preserved at least his family on the throne, if the sentence of excommunication should have the effect which he dreaded, and should be finally pronounced against him. Though this design was conducted with expedition and secrecy, Becket, before he was carried into execution, had got intelligence of it; and being desirous of obstructing all his would-be measures, as well as anxious to prevent this affront to himself, who pretended to the sole right, as Archbishop of Canterbury, to officiate in the coronation, he had inhibited all the prelates of England from assisting at it, or from performing any public service, or from proceeding from the Pope, a express avowal of these disputed prerogatives. Conscious also of his own violence in attempting to break or subdue the inlexible prince, he was not disposed to unto that measure which had given his enemies reason to believe that he meant to contest and to resist the contrary views of the Pope in the same manner which the controversy should terminate in that ambiguous manner, which was the utmost that princes, in those ages, could hope to obtain in their disputes with the see of Rome. Though in his own person, and in the name of Becket, he still reserved to himself the right of maintaining, that the Constitutions of Clarendon, the original ground of the quarrel, were both the ancient customs and the present law of the realm; and though he knew that the papal cipher asserted them to be impious in themselves, as well as abrogated by the sentence of the sovereign pontiff, he intended, in spite of their clamours, steadily to put those laws in execution, and to trust to his own abilities, and to the course of events, for success in that perilous enterprise. He hoped that Becket’s experience of a six years’ exile would, after his pride was fully gratified by his restoration, be sufficient to teach him more prudence and more discretion than he had shown in the past. But he thought that, as a further satisfaction, recover his rights by officiating in this coronation. But the violent spirit of Becket, elated by the power of the church, and by the victory which he had already obtained over his sovereign, was not content with this voluntary compensation, but resolved to make the injury, which he pretended to have suffered, a handle for taking revenge on all his enemies. On his arrival in London, and the second day of Christmas, the Archbishop of York and the Bishops of London and Salisbury, who were on their journey to the King in Normandy: he notified to the archbishop the sentence of suspension, and to the two bishops that of excommunication, which, at his solicitation, the Pope had pronounced against them. Hugnald de Warresme, and Gervase de Cornhill, two of the king’s ministers who were employed on their duty in Kent, asked him, on hearing of this bold step, whether he meant to bring fire and sword into the kingdom? But the prince, heedless of the reproach, proceeded, in the most ostentatious manner, to take possession of his diocese, and all the towns which he possessed, he was received with the shouts of triumph and acclamations of the populace. As he approached Southwark, the clergy, the laity, men of all ranks and ages, came forth to meet him, and celebrated with hymns of joy his triumphant entrance. And though he was obliged, by order of the young prince, who resided at Woodstock, to return to his diocese, he found that he was not mistaken, when he reckoned upon the highest generation of the public towards his person and his dignity. He proceeded, therefore, with the more courage, to dart his spiritual thunders: he issued the sentence of excommunication against Robert de Brock, and Nigel de Sackville, with many others, who either had assisted at the coronation of the prince’s son, or been active in the late persecution of the exiled clergy. This violent measure, by which he in effect denounced war against the king himself, is commonly ascribed to the vindication of the disposition and imperious character of Becket; but as this prelate was also a man of acknowledged abilities, we are not, in his passion alone, to look for the cause of his conduct, when he proceeded to these extremities against his enemies. His sagacity had led him to distinguish, in this instance, the intention of others, to the utmost of their expectations, by the bold and unexpected assault, to prevent the execution of the king, from his experience of the dispositions of his people, was become sensible that his enterprise had been too bold in establishing the Constitutions of Clarendon, in defining all the branches of royal power, and in endeavouring to put down the monarchical power of the king, and that it was impossible for him, the Pope, to express avowal of these disputed prerogatives. Conscious also of his own violence in attempting to break or subdue the inflexible prince, he was not disposed to undo that measure which had given his enemies reason to believe that he meant to contest and to resist the contrary views of the Pope in the same manner which the controversy should terminate in that ambiguous manner, which was the utmost that princes, in those ages, could hope to obtain in their disputes with the see of Rome. Though in his own person, and in the name of Becket, he still reserved to himself the right of maintaining, that the Constitutions of Clarendon, the original ground of the quarrel, were both the ancient customs and the present law of the realm; and though he knew that the papal cipher asserted them to be impious in themselves, as well as abrogated by the sentence of the sovereign pontiff, he intended, in spite of their clamours, steadily to put those laws in execution, and to trust to his own abilities, and to the course of events, for success in that perilous enterprise. matters, and reproaches against him, he was so incapable of that, that, without uniting it with the latter, his violence, he immediately went to St. Benedict's church to hear vespers. They followed him thither, attacked him before the altar, and having laid him prostrate, he retired without meeting any opposition. This was the tragic end of Thomas à Becket, a prelate of the most lofty, intrepid, and inflexible spirit, who was able to cover, to the world, and probably to himself, the enterprises of public integrity, with the air of a saint, and the armor for the interests of religion: an extraordinary person, surely, had he been allowed to remain in his first station, and had directed the vehemence of his character to the support of law and justice; instead of being engaged by the prejudices of the times, to sacrifice all private duties and public connexions to ties which he imagined, or represented, as superior to every civil and political consideration. But no man, who enters into the genius of that age, can reasonably doubt of this prelate's sincerity. The spirit of superstition was so prevalent, that in factually caught every careless reasoner, much more every one of his hearers, and ambition, were engaged to support it. All the wretched literature of the times was enlisted on that side: some faint glimmerings of common sense might sometimes pierce through the thick cloud of ignorance, or, what was worse, the illusion of knowledge would have embellished them, and enveloped the face of nature: but those who preserved themselves untainted by the general contagion, proceeded on no principles which they could pretend to justify: they were more inclined to their total want of instruction, than to their knowledge, if they still retained some share of understanding: folly was possessed of all the schools as well as all the churches; and her votaries assumed the gurh of philosophers, together with the ensigns of spiritual dignities. Throughout that large collection of letters, which bears the name of St. Thomas, we find, in all the retainers of that aspiring prelate, no less than in himself, a most entire and absolute conviction of the reason and purity of their own party, and a disdain of their antagonists: nor is there less cant and prudence in their style, when they address each other, than when they compose manifestos for the perusal of the public. The spirit of revenge, violence, and ambition, which accompanied their conduct, instead of forming a presumption of hypocrisy, are the surest pledges of their sincere attachment to a cause, which so much flattened these domineering passions.

Henry, on the first report of Becket's violent measures, had purposed to have him arrested, and had already taken some steps towards the execution of this intention, when the party of the}

ner threw the prince into great consternation; and he was immediately sensible of the dangerous consequences which he had reason to apprehend from so unexpected an event. An archbishop of reputed sanctity, assassinated before the altar, in the exercise of his functions, and on account of his zeal in maintaining ecclesiastical privileges, must attain the highest honours of martyrdom; while his murderer would be ranked among the most bloody tyrants that ever were exposed to the hatred and detestation of mankind, interdicts and excommunications, weaons in themselves so terrible, would, he foresaw, be armed with double force, when employed in a cause so much calculated to work on human passions, and peculiarly adapted to the eloquence of popular preachers and declaimers. In vain would he plead his own innocenee, and even his total ignorance of the fact: he was sufficiently guilty, if the charge of revolt, and of the assassination of his predecessor, should be made to a prelate from all suspicion, he took no care to conceal the depth of his affliction. He shut himself up from the light of day, and from all commerce with his servants: he even refused, during three days, all food and succour to the courtiers, and, precluding dangerous effects from his despair, he was last obliged to break in upon his solitude; and they employed every topic of consolation, induced him to accept of nourishment, and occupied his leisure in taking precautions against any possible attempt against him, which was so justly apprehended from the murder of the prince.

The point of chief importance to Henry was, to convince the Pope of his innocenee; and submission of the king. The Archbishops of Rothen, the Bishops of Worcester and Foras, with five persons of inferior quality, were immediately despatched to Rome, and orders were given to perform their journey with the utmost expedition. Though the name and authority of the court of Rome were so terrible in the remote countries of Europe, which were sunk in profound ignorance, and were entirely unacquainted with its character and conduct; the Pope was so little revered at home, that his invertebrate enemies surrounded the gates of Rome itself, and even controlled his government in that city; and the ambassadors, who, from distant extremity of France, came to him the humblest, or rather the abject admissions of the greatest potentates of the age, found the utmost difficulty to make their way to him, and to throw themselves at his feet. It was at length agreed, that Richard Basset should be one of these munificent gifts, sent behind, and run all the hazards of the passage, in order to prevent the fatal consequences which might ensue from any delay in giving satisfaction to His Holiness. He found, on his arrival, that Alexander was already brought up to the greatest rage against the king, that Becket's partisans were daily stimulating him to revenge; that the King of France had exhorited him to fulminate the most dreadful sentence against England; and that all very mention of Henry's name before the sacred college was received with every expression of horror and execration. The Thursday before Easter was now approaching, when it is customary for the Pope to pronounce annual curses against all his enemies; and it was expected, that Henry should, with all the preparations peculiar to the discharge of that sacred artillery, be solemnly comprehended in the number. But Rome found means to appease the pontiff, and to deter him from a measure which, if it failed of success, could not afterwards be easily recalled: the anathemas were only levelled in general against all the actors, accomplices, and abettors of Becket's murder. The Abbot of Vaux-le-Vicomte, and the Archbishop of Calais and Lisseaux, with others of Henry's ministers, who soon after arrived, besides ascertaining their prince's innocenee, made oath before the whole consistory, that he would never return to the Pope without his taking the submission that should be required of him. The terrible blow was thus artfully eluded; the Cardinals Albert and Theodin were appointed legates to examine the cause, and were ordered to proceed to Normandy for that purpose; and though Henry's foreign dominions were already laid under an interdict by the Archbishop of Sens, Becket's great partisan, and the Pope's legate in France, the general expectation was, that the monarch would easily exculpate himself from any concurrency in the guilt, kept up one in suspense, and prevented all the bad consequences which might be dreaded from that sentence.

The clergy, meanwhile, though their race was happily diverted from fatal consequences, by the murder of Becket, were attempting to exalt the sanctity of Becket; in extolling the merits of his martyrdom; and in exalting him above all that devoted tribe, who in several ages had, by their blood, cemented the fabric of the church. The Pope, with the consent of his court, procured for him the testimony by their sufferings to the general doctrines of Christianity; but Becket had sacrificed his life to the power and privileges of the clergy; and this peculiar merit challenged, and not in vain, a suitable acknowledgment of his merits, without the shadow of an imputation of the same nature to his virtues; and the miracles wrought by his relics were more numerous, more sensible, and more impudently attested, than those which ever filled the legend of any confessor or martyr. Two years after his death he was canonized by Pope Alexander; a solemn jubilee was established for celebrating his merits; his body was removed to a magnificent shrine, enriched with presents from all parts of Christendom; pious pilgrimages were permitted to take place with intercession to heaven; and it was computed, that in one year above a hundred thousand pilgrims arrived in Altenburg, and paid their devotion at his tomb. It is indeed a mortifying reflection to those who seek for the means by which divine providence has extinguished the last infirmity of noble minds, that the wisest legislator, and most exalted genius that ever reformed or enlightened the world, can never expect such tributes of popular affection as are paid on the memory of whose whole conduct was probably, to the last degree, odious or contemptible, and whose industry was entirely directed to the pursuit of objects pernicious to mankind. It is only a conqueror, a personage no less entitled to our hatred, who can pretend to the attainment of equal renown and glory.

It may not be amiss to remark, before we conclude the subject of Thomas à Becket, that the king, during his controversy with that prelate, was on every occasion more anxious than usual to express his zeal for religion, and to avoid all appearance of a profane negligence on that head. He gave his consent to the imposition of a tax on all his domains for the defrayment of the war against the holy Land, now threatened by the famous Saladin; this tax amounted to two pence a pound for one year, and a penny a pound for the four subsequent. Almost all the princes of Europe had in like manner imposed on their subjects, which received the name of Saladin’s tax. During this period, there came over from Germany about thirty heretics of both sexes, under the direction of one Gerard; simple ignorant people, who could give no account of their faith, but declared themselves ready to suffer for the tenets of their master. They made only one convert in England, a woman as ignorant as themselves; yet they gave such umbrage to the clergy, that they were deprived of their arment, and were punished by being burned on the foreheads, and then whipped through the streets. They seemed to exult in their sufferings, and as they went along, sang the laudation, when men hate you and persecute you. After they were whipped, they were thrust out almost naked in the midst of winter, and perished through cold and hunger; no one daring, or being willing, to give them the least relief. We are ignorant of the particular number of these people; for it would be impossible to rely on the representations left of them by the clergy, who affirm that they denied the efficacy of the sacraments, and the unity of the church. It is probable that their departure was due to the weight of the weather still more sudden and minute. They seem to have been the first that ever suffered for heresy in England.

As soon as Henry found that he was in no immediate danger from the thunders of the Vatican, he undertook an expedition against Ireland; a design which he had long projected, and by which he hoped to recover his credit, somewhat impaired by his late transactions with the hierarchy.

As Britain was first peopled from Gaul, and Ireland was divided to it; Ireland probably from Britain; and the inhabitants of all these countries to have been so many tribes of the Celts, who derive their origin from an antiquity that lies far beyond the records of any history or tradition. The Irish, from the beginning of time, had been buried in the most profound barbarism and ignorance; and as they were never conquered, or even invaded, by the Romans, from whom all the western nations were delivered by its civility, they continued still in the most rude state of society, and were distinguished by those vices alone, to which human nature, not tainted by education, or restrained by laws, is for ever subject. The small principalities, into which the country was so unjustly divided, were exercised by violence and rack against each other; the uncertain succession of their princes was a continual source of domestic convulsions; the usual title of each petty sovereign was the same as the Cape Verdeans, they were envied, and for the supposed exercised in the commission of crimes, were more honoured than any pacific virtues; and the most simple arts of life, even tillage and agriculture, were almost wholly unknown among them. They had felt the bloody wars of the Danes and the other northern tribes; but these inroads, which had spread barbarism in other parts of Europe, tended rather to improve the Irish; and the only towns which were to be found in the island, had been planted along the coast by the freebooters of Norway and Denmark. The other inhabitants exercised pasturage in the open country; sought protection from any danger in their forests and marts; and being divided by the statue of liberty, had no interest in the public welfare, except the intent on the means of mutual injury, than on the expedi-ents for common or even for private interest.

Besides many small tribes, there were in the age of Henry II. five principal empires, or confederations, in Ireland, Munster, Leinster, Meath, Ulster, and Connaught; and as it had been usual for the one or the other of these to take the lead in their wars, there was commonly some prince, who seemed to have the upper hand, as was the case of Roderick O’Connor, King of Connaught, who was then advanced to this dignity; but his government, ill obeyed even within his own territory, could not unite the people in any common rendezvous, and the country, though for defence against foreigners. The ambition of Henry had, very early in his reign, been moved, by the prospect of these advantages, to attempt the subjection of Ireland; and his prince was only wanting to join the unhappy states, who, being always confined to their own island, had never given any reason of complaint to any of their neighbours. For this purpose, he had recourse to Rome, which assumed a right to dispose of kingdoms and empires; and, not considering the danger of such an invasion, one day to maintain with that, he helped, for presence, or rather for an imaginary, convenience, to give sanction to claims which were now become dangerous to all sover- eignties; and as he thought the country too small to be held by birth an Englishman; and being, on that account, the more disposed to oblige Henry, he was easily persuaded to act as master of the world, and to make, without any hazard or expense, the acquisition of a great island for his spiritual jurisdiction. The Irish had, by preceding mis-sions from the Britons, been imperfectly converted to Christianity; and, what the Pope regarded as the surest mark of their imperfect conversion, he followed the doctrines of their first teachers, and had never acknowledg-ed any submission to the see of Rome. Adrian, therefore, in the year 1156 issued a bull in favour of Henry; in which, after premising that this prince had ever shown an anxious desire to enlarge the church of God on earth, and to increase the number of his saints and elect in heaven; he represents his design of subduing Ireland as derived from the same pious motives: he considers his care of previously applying for the apostolic sanction a sure earnest of success and victory; and having establish-ed it as a point incontrovertible, that all christian kingdoms belong to the patrimony of St. Peter, he acknowledges it to be his own duty to secure among them the souls of the gospel, which might in the last day fructify to their eternal salvation: he exorts the king to invade Ireland, in order to extirpate the vice and wickedness of the natives, and oblige them to pay an annual tribute, a penny to the see of Rome; he gives him entire right and authority...
In prosecution of these views, he sent over a messenger to the Earl of Strigil, challenging the performance of his promise, and displaying the mighty advantages which might now be reaped by a reinforcement of warlike troops from England. Richard, not satisfied with the general permission given by Henry to all his subjects, went to demand the special permission of his own prince, then in Normandy; and having obtained a cold and ambiguous permission, prepared himself for the execution of his designs. He first sent over Raymond, one of his companions, with ten hundred men and several ships, landing near Waterford, defeated a body of three thousand Irish that had ventured to attack him; and as Richard himself, who brought over two hundred horse, and a body of archers, joined his forces. In the course of a few days after, they made themselves masters of Waterford, and proceeded to Dublin, which was taken by assault. Roderic, in revenge, cut off the head of Dermot's natural son, who had been left as a hostage in his hands; and Richard, marrying Eva, became soon after, by the death of Dermot, master of the kingdom of Leinster, and prepared to extend his authority over all Ireland. Roderic, and the other Irish princes, were alarmed at the danger; and combining together, besiegéd Dublin with an army of thirty thousand men; but Earl Richard, making a sudden sally at the head of ninety knights, with their followers, put this numerous army to rout, chased them off the field, and pursued them with great slaughter. After this, Ireland now dared to oppose themselves to the English.

Henry, jealous of the progress made by his own subjects, sent orders to recall all the English, and he made forthwith proposals to attack Ireland in all offices of Richard and the other adventurers, found means to appease him, by making him the most humble submissions, and offering to hold all their acquisitions in vassalage to his crown. The monarch had been at home, and at the head of his armed knights, besides other soldiers: he found the Irish dissatisfied by their late misfortunes, that, in a progress which he made through the island, he had no other occupation than to destroy the homage of his new subjects. He left most of the Irish chieftains in princes in possession of their ancient territories: bestowed some lands on the English adventurers; gave Earl Richard the commissary of Seneschal of Ireland; and after a stay of a few months, returned in triumph to England. By these trucal exploits, scarcely worth relating, except for the importance of the consequences, was Ireland subdued, and annexed to the English crown.

The loss of the Norman and Irish, during those ages, made it impracticable for princes to support regular armies, which might retain a conquered country in subjection; and the extreme barbarism and poverty of Ireland could not be so easily conquered. It was a mere impotent, by which a durable conquest could then be made or maintained, was by pouring in a multitude of new inhabitants, dividing among them the lands of the vanquished, establishing them once more from their own authority, and thereby transforming the ancient inhabitants into a new people. By this policy, the northern invaders of old, and of late the Duke of Normandy, had been able to fix their dominions, and to erect kingdoms, which remained stable on their foundations, and were transmitted to the posterity of the first conquerors. But the state of Ireland rendered that island so little inviting to the English, that only a few of desperate fortunes could be persuaded, from time to time, to seek their fortune there, and instead of reclaiming the natives from their uncultivated manners, they were gradually assimilated to the ancient inhabitants, and degenerated from the customs of their own nation. It was also found requisite to establish great military and arbitrary powers on the leaders, who commanded a handful of men amidst such hostile multitudes; and law and equity in a little time became as much unknown in the English settlements, as it had been among the Irish tribes. Factions were erected in favour of the new adventurers; independent authority conferred; the natives, never fully subdued, still returned their animosity against the conquerors; their hatred was retal by his injuries; and from these causes, the Irish, during the course of four centuries, remained still savage and untractable. It was not till the latter end of Elizabeth's reign, that the island was fully subdued; nor till that of her successor, that it gave hopes of becoming a useful conquest to the English nation.

Besides that the easy and peaceable submission of the Irish left Henry no further occupation in that island, he was recalled from it by another incident, which was of the last importance to his interest and safety. The two legates, Albert and Theodom, to whom was committed the trial of his conduct in the murder of Archbishop Bekket, were arrived in Normandy; and being impatient of delay, sent him letters full of menace; if he pretended any longer making his appearance before them.3 He hastened therefore to Normandy, and had a conference with them at Savary, where their demands were so exorbitant, that he broke off the negotiation, threatened to return to Ireland, and made them do their worst against him. They perceived that the season was now past for taking advantage of that tragic incident; which, had it been hotly pursued by interdicts and excommunications, was capable of throwing the whole kingdom into combustion. But the time which Henry had happily gained had contributed to appease the minds of men. The event could not now have the same influence as when it was a slight; and as was the custom every day looked for an accommodation with the king, they had not opposed the pretensions of their partisans, who had been very industrious in representing to the people his principal greatness and public service, and in the murder of the archbishop, and ignorance of the designs formed by the assassins. The legates therefore found themselves obliged to lower their terms; and Henry was so fortunate as to conclude an accordation with them. He declared upon oath, before the legates of his own accord, that, so far from commanding or desiring the death of the archbishop, he was extremely grieved when he received intelligence of it. But as the passion, which he had expressed on account of that perturbation, was immediate, and probably no notion of being a murder, he stipulatad the following conditions, as an atonement for the offence. He promised, that he should pardon all such as had been implicated in the said murder, and, through them in their lives; that the see of Canterbury should be reestablished in all its ancient possessions; that he should pay the Templars a sum of money sufficient for the subsistence of two hundred knights during a year in the Holy Land; that he should himself take the cross at the Christmas following; and, if the Pope required it, serve three years against the infidels either in Spain or Palestine; and should, during the absence of such customs, derogatory to ecclesiastical privileges, as had been introduced in his own time; and that he should not obstrue appeals to the Pope in ecclesiastical causes, but should content himself with executing sufficient security from such clerks as left his dominions to prosecute an appeal, that they should attempt nothing against the rights of his crown.4 Upon signing these concessions, Henry received absolution from the legates, and was confirmed in the grant of Ireland made by Pope Adrian; and nothing proves more strongly the great abilities of this monarch, than his extracting himself, on such easy terms, from so difficult a situation. He had always trusted, that the laws established at Clarendon contained not any new claimings but the ancient customs of the kingdom; and he was still at liberty, notwithstanding the articles of this agreement, to maintain his pretensions. Appeals to the Pope were not done imputed by that treaty; but so long as he was permitted to exact reasonable securities from the parties, and might stretch his demands on this head as far as he pleased, he had it virtually in his power to prevent the Pope from acting these concessions. And, on the whole, the Conventions of Clarendon remained still the law of the realm, though the Pope duftel terms of his father; and soon after, in concert with Lewis, made his escape to Paris, where he was protected and supported by that monarch.

While Henry was alarmed at this incident, and had the prospect of dangereous intriguers, or even of a war, which, whether successful or not, must be extremely calamitous and disagreeable to him, he received intelligence of new misfortunes, which must have affected him in the most sensible manner. Queen Elizabeth, who had disgraced her first husband by her gallantries, was now less offensive to his second by her jealousy; and after this manner carried to extremity, in the different periods of her life, every circumstance of female weakness. She communicated her discontents against Henry to her two younger sons, Geoffrey and Richard; persuaded them that they were also entitled to present possession of the territories assigned to them; engaged them to fly secretly to the court of France, and engaged them to come secretly to the court of France, and engaged them by oath to adhere to the cause of young Henry.

Henry, reduced to this perils and disagreeable situation, had recourse to the court of Rome: though sensible of the danger of his position, partly alarmed at the disposition of his courtiers, and partly by a wish to support them in these unnatural and absurd pretensions.

Henry, to exert his power in so justifiable a cause, issued the bulls required by him: but it was soon found, that these spiritual weapons had not the same force as when employed in a state of perfect concord, and that the clergy were very negligent in supporting a sentence which was nowise calculated to promote the immediate interests of their order. The king, after taking in vain this humiliating step, was obliged to have recourse to arms, and to use such extraordinary, as are the usual resources of tyrants, and have seldom been employed by so wise and just a monarch.

The loose government which prevailed in all the states of Europe, the many princes wars carried on among the neighbouring nobles, and the impossibility of enforcing any general execution of the laws, had caused a tribe of banditti to disturb everywhere the public peace, to infest the highways, and to have their hands full of the civil magistrate, and even the communications of the church, which were fulminated against them.

Troops of them were sometimes enlisted to defend the people against the potential calamity of another: they often acted in an independent manner, under leaders of their own: the peaceable and industrious inhabitants, reduced to poverty by their ravages, were frequently obliged, for subsistence, to betake themselves to a disorderly course of life; and a continual intestine war, pernicious to industry, as well as to the execution of justice, was thus carried on in the bowels of every kingdom.

These desperate refugees received the name sometimes of Branchemans, sometimes of Rouriers or Couteux; but for what reason is not agreed by historians: and they formed a kind of society or government among themselves, which set at defiance the rest of mankind. The greater part of them were employed, on occasion, to have recourse to their assistance: and as their habits of war and depredation had given them experience, hardiness, and courage, they generally composed the most formidable troops of them they had acquired, and the situation of his affairs rendered even such banditti the only forces on whose fidelity he could repose any confidence. His licentious barons, disgusted with a vigilant government, were more desirous of being ruled by young princes, ignorant of public affairs, remiss in their conduct, and profuse in their grants; and as the king had mercenary, his sons the succession to every particular province of his dominions, the nobles dreaded no danger in adhering to those who, they knew, must some time become their sovereigns. Prompted by these motives, much of his nobility had deserted to his son Henry; the Breton and Gascon barons seemed equally disposed to embrace the quarter of Geoffrey and Richard. Disaffection had crept in among the English; and the Earls of Leicester and Chester in particular had openly declared against the king. Twenty thousand Branchemans, therefore, joined to some troops which he brought over from Ireland, and a few barons of approved fidelity, formed the sole force with which he set about his enterprises. The two continents.

Lewis, in order to bind the confederates in a closer union, summoned at Paris an assembly of the chief vassals of the crown, received their approbation of his measures, and engaged them by oath to adhere to the cause of young Henry. This prince, in return, bound himself by a like tie never to desert his French allies; and having made a new great seal, he faithfully distributed among them his letters to the French barons, of the terms in which he was disposed to conquer from his father. The Counts of Flanders, Boulogne, Blois, and Eu, partly moved by the general jealousy arising from Henry's power and ambition, by the prospect of being deprived of his aid. and from the inconsiderate temper and the necessities of the young prince, declared openly in favour of the latter. William, King of Scotland, had also entered into this formidable confederacy; and a plan was concerted for a general invasion on different parts of the king's extensive and factional dominions.

Hostilities were first commenced by the Counts of Flanders and Boulogne, on the frontiers of Normandy. Those princes laid siege to Aumale, which was delivered into their hands by the treachery of the count of that name: this nobleman surrendered himself prisoner; and on pretence of thereby paying his ransom, opened the gates of all his other fortresses.

In another quarter, the King of France, being strongly assisted by his vassals, assembles a great army of seven thousand knights and their followers in horses, and a considerable number of infantry: carrying young Henry along with him, he laid siege to Verneuil, which was vigorously defended by Hugh de Lacy and Hugh de Beauchamp, the governor. After many days of on and off, he had it at length agreed that the besieged should be permitted to capitulate; and they engaged, if not relieved within three days, to surrender the town, and to retire into the citadel. On the last of these days, Henry appeared with his army upon the heights above Verneuil. Lewis, dreading an attack, sent the Archbishop of Sens and the Count of Blois to the English camp, and desired that next day should be appointed for a conference, in order to establish a general peace, and terminate the difference between Henry and his sons. The king, who passionately desired this accommodation and suspected no fraud, gave his consent; but Lewis, that morning, obliging the garrison to surrender, set fire to the place, and began to retire with his army. Henry, provoked at this intrigue, attacked the rear with vigour, put them to rout, did some execution, and took several prisoners. The French army, as the king had expected, immediately dispersed themselves into their several provinces; and left Henry free to prosecute his advantages against his other enemies.

The nobles of the Britains, instigated by the Earl of Chester and Ralph de Fougerei, were all in arms; but their progress was checked by a body of Brabançons, which the king, after Lewis's retreat, had sent against them. The two armies came to an action near Dol; where the rebels were defeated, fifteen hundred killed on the spot, and the leaders, the Earls of Chester and Cornwall, obliged to take shelter in the town of Dol. Henry hastened to form the siege of that place, and carried on the attack with such ardour, that he obliged the governor and garrisons of the towns to open their gates by these vigorous measures and happy successes, the insurrections were entirely quelled in Brittany; and the king, thus fortunate in all quarters, willingly agreed to a conference with Lewis, who had suppressed all their mighty efforts entirely frustrated, would terminate hostilities on some moderate and reasonable conditions.

The two monarchs met between Trie and Gisors; and Henry had here the mortification to see his three sons in the retinue of his mortal enemy. As Lewis had no other pretence for war, than supporting the claims of the young princes, the king made them such offers as children might be ashamed to insist on, and could be extorted from him by nothing but his paternal affection, or by the present necessity of his affairs. He insisted only on retaining the sovereign authority in all his dominions; but offered young Henry half the revenues of England, with some presents of state, in that kingdom; if he rather chose to reside in Normandy, half the revenues of that duchy, with all those of Anjou. He made a like offer to Richard in Guise; he promised to resign Brittany to Geoffrey; and the insurrections were so insufficient, he agreed to add to them whatever the Pope's donation and legate, when present, should require of him. The Earl of Leicester was also present at the negotiation; and either from the impetuosity of his temper, or from a view of abruptly breaking off a correspondence which must cover the allies with confusion, he gave vent to the most violent reproaches against Henry, and he even put his hand to his sword, as if he meant to attempt some violence against him. This further alarmed the king of Burgundy in an enemy company into confusion, and put an end to the treaty.

The chief hopes of Henry's enemies seemed now to depend on the state of affairs in England, where his authority was exposed to the most imminent danger. One article of Prince Henry's agreement with his foreign confederates was, that he should resign Kent, with Dover, and all its other fortresses, to the hands of the Earl of Flanders; yet so little national or public spirit prevailed amongst the independent English nobility, so wholly bent were they on the aggrandisement of each himself and his own family, that notwithstanding this pernicious concession, which must have produced the ruin of the kingdom in a few years' time if continued, so many of them had returned to it, and supported to the prince's pretensions. The king's principal resource lay in the church and the bishops, with whom he was now in perfect agreement; whether that the decency of their character made them ashamed of supporting so unnatural a rebellion, or that they were entirely satisfied with Henry's atonement for the murder of Becket, and for his former invasion of ecclesiastical immunities. That prince, however, had resigned none of the essential rights of his crown in the accommodation; he maintained still the same prudent jealousy of the court of Rome; admitted no legate into England, without his swearing to attempt nothing against the royal prerogatives of his own majesty, in the person of the archbishop of Canterbury, who pretended to a free election on the vacancy made by the death of Becket, to choose Roger, prior of Dover, in the place of that turbulent prelate.

War with Scotland. The King of Scotland made an irruption into Northumberland, and committed great devastations; but being opposed by Richard de Lucy, whom Henry had left guardian of the realm, he retreated northwards, and agitated hisSubjects of his own kingdom. This truce enabled the guardian to march southward with his army, in order to oppose an invasion, which the Earl of Leicester, at the head of a great body of Flemings, had made against Suffolk. The Flemings had been joined by Hugh Bigot, who made the town of Framlingham; and marching into the heart of the kingdom, where they hoped to be supported by Leicester's vassals, they were met by Lucy, who, assisted by Humphrey Bohun, the Constable, and the Earls of Arundel, Gloucester, and Devon, had advanced to Framlingham, with a less numerous but a braver army to oppose them. The Flemings, who were mostly weavers and artificers, for manufactures were now beginning to be established in England,Relation to the war, were defeated, ten thousand of them put to the sword, the Earl of Leicester, the king's eldest son, taken prisoner, and the remains of the invaders glad to compound for a safe retreat into their own country.

This great defeat did not dismay the king's subjects, being supported by the alliance of so many foreign princes, and encouraged by the king's own sons, determined to persevere in their enterprise. The Earl of Ferrars, Roger de Mowbray, Archibald de Malleray, Richard de Moreville, Hamo de Masee, together with many friends of the Earls of Leicester and Chester, rose in arms: the fidelity of the Earls of Clare and Gloucester was suspected; and the guardian, though vigorously supported by Geoffrey, Bishop of Lincoln, the king's natural son by the fair Rosamond, found it difficult to defend himself on all quarters, from so many open and concealed enemies. The more to augment the confusion, the King of France, on the expiration of the truce, broke into the northern provinces with five thousand men; which, though undisciplined and disorderly, and better fitted for committing devastation, than for executing any military enterprise, was become dangerous from the presence of the rebellious followers of the young Henry, who had baffled all his enemies in France, and had put his footprints in a posture of defence, now found England the seat of danger; and he determined by his presence to overawe rebellions, and by his conduct and courage to subdue them. He landed at Southampton; and knowing the influence of monachorum, he conferred superintendence over all the monasteries, and made the monastic clergy his counsellors, and the chief executors of his commands. He attended to the ashes of Thomas à Becket, and tendered his submissions to a dead enemy. As soon as he came within sight of the church of Canterbury, he dismounted, walked barefoot towards it, prostrated himself before the shrine of the saint, remained in fasting, and prayer during a whole day, and watched all night the holy reliques.

Not content with this hypocritical devotion towards a man, whose violence and ingratitude had so long disquieted the kingdom, and had produced the most inveterate animosity, he submitted to a penance still more singular and humiliating. He assembled a chapter of the monks, disrobed himself before them, put a scourage of disordered hair, and a habit of the poor, threw the shoulders to the lashes which these ecclesiastics successively inflicted upon him. Next day he received absolution; and departing for London, got so soon after the agreeable intelligence of a great victory which he had obtained over the Scots, and which being gained, as was reported, on the very day of his absolution, was regarded as the earnest of his final reconciliation with Heaven and with Thomas à Becket.

William King of Scots, though repulsed before the castle of Prudlow, and other fortified places, had committed the most horrid depredations upon the northern provinces; but on the approach of Ralph de Glanville, the famous Oakenhammer, and his troops, led by Robert de Stutelye, Odonele de Umfrewe, William de Vesci, and other northern barons, together with the gallant Bishop of Lincoln, he thought proper to retreat nearer his own country, and be fixed there. He had there weakened his army extremely, by sending out numerous detachments in order to extend his ravages; and he lay absolutely safe, as he imagined, from any approach of the king. But in the consideration of his situation, made a hasty and fatiguing march to Newcastle; and, allowing his soldiers only a small interval for refreshment, he immediately set out towards evening for Alnwick. He marched that night above thirty miles, and arrived there in the morning of 13th July.
Henry II.

With glory, and absolute master of his dominions, might take revenge for the many dangers and disquietudes which the arms, and still more the intrigues, of France, bad, in his disputes both with Becket and his sons, found means to raise him. After making a freshcession of arms, a conference was held near Tours, where he granted his sons much less advantageous terms than he had formerly offered, and he received their submissions. The most material of his concessions were the king's assent to some penitential written to be stipulated to them, and some castles which he granted them the place of their residence; together with an indemnity for all their adherents, who were restored to their estates and holdings.

Of all those who had embraced the cause of the young princes, William, King of Scotland was the only considerable loser by that invidious and unjust enterprise. Henry delivered from confinement, without exacting any ransom, about nine hundred knights whom he had taken prisoners; but it cost William the ancient independency of his crown as the price of his liberty. He stipulated to do homage to Henry for Scotland and all his other possessions; he engaged that all the barons and nobility of his kingdom should also do homage; that the bishops should take an oath of fealty; that both should swear to adhere to the King of England against their native prince; and that William should return to France the castles of Edinburgh, Stirling, Berwick, Roxborough, and Jedeborough, should be returned into Henry's hands, till the performance of articles. This was delivered into his hands, and the two sovereigns concluded the treaty in its full rigour. William, being released, brought up all his barons, prelates, and abbots; and they did homage to Henry in the cathedral of York, and acknowledged and his successors for their subjects.

The English monarch stretched still further the rigour of the conditions which he exacted. He engaged the king and states of Scotland to make a perpetual cession of the castles of Edinburgh, Stirling, Roxborough, and to allow the castle of Edinburgh to remain in his hands for a limited time. This was the first great ascendant which England obtained over Scotland; and indeed the first important transaction which had passed between the kingdoms.

Few princes have been so fortunate as to gain considerable advantages over the weaker neighbours with less violence and injustice than was practised by Henry against the King of Scots, whom he had taken prisoners to his own advantage, and who had wantonly engaged in a war against which all the neighbours of that prince, and even his own family, were, without provocation, combined against him.

Henry having thus, contrary to expost—King's enmity, extricated himself with honour from a situation in which his throne was exposed to great danger, was employed for several years in the administration of justice, in the execution of the laws, and in guarding against those inconveniences, which either the past cessions of his state, or the political institutions of that age, unavoidably occasioned. The provisions which he made above laments of thought as qualified him for being a legislator; and they were commonly calculated as well for the future as the present happiness of his kingdom.

He enacted severe penalties against rob-bery, murder, false spying, arson, and ordained that these crimes should be punished by the amputation of the right hand and right foot. The pecuniary commutation for crimes, which has a false appearance of lenity, had been in general, and had been entirely abolished by the rigour of these statutes. The superstitious trial by water ordeal, though condemned by the church, still subsisted; but Henry ordained, that any man accused of murder, or any heinous felony by the oath of the legal knights of the county, should

Some Scotch historians pretend that William paid, besides, 100,000 pounds of ransom, which is quite incredible. The ransom of Robert I. was only 30,000 marks, and yet was levied with great difficulty. Indeed, two-thirds of it could not be levied without hazard. The expense of maintaining a hundred knights was only 30,000 marks, and yet was levied with great difficulty. Indeed, two-thirds of it could not be levied without hazard. even though acquitted by the ordeal, be obliged to abjure the realm.\(^1\)

All advances towards reason and good sense are slow and gradual. Henry, though sensible of the great absurdity of the trial by duel of bishops, did not venture to abuse it: he only admitted either of the parties to challenge a trial by an assize or jury of twelve fire-bearers.\(^2\) This latter method of trial seems to have been very sacred in England, and was fixed by the laws of King Alfred: but the barbarous and violent genius of the age had of late given more credit to the trial by battle, which had become the general method of deciding all important controversies. It was never abolished by law in England; and there is an instance of its use so late as the reign of Elizabeth: but the institution revived by this king, being found more reasonable and more suitable to a civilized people, gradually prevailed over it.

The government of France into districts, and the appointment of itinerant justices to go the circuit in each division, and to decide the causes in the counties, was another important ordinance of this prince, which had a dear devoted, had not, at this time, become to protect the inferior gentry and common people in their property. Those justices were either prelates or considerable noblemen; who, besides carrying the authority of the throne, were able to hold up the dignity of their own character, to give weight and credit to the laws.

That there might be fewer obstacles to the execution of justice, the king was vigilant in demolishing all the newerections, both ecclesiastical and non-ecclesiastical, so far as his foreign dominions: and he permitted no fortress to remain in the custody of those whom he found reason to suspect.

But lest the kingdom should be weakened by this de-omination of the fortresses, the king fixed an assize of arms, by which all his subjects were obliged to put themselves in a situation for defending themselves and the realm. Every man of a certain age, and a knight of a certain age, was ordained to have for each the coat of mail, a helmet, a shield, and a lance; every free boy, possessed of goods to the value of sixteen marks, was to be armed in like manner; every one that possessed two marks was obliged to have an iron gorget, a cap of iron, and a lance. The king also ordered that all his subjects should have a cap of iron, a lance, and a wambast; that is, a coat quilted with wool, tow, or soch like materials.\(^3\) It appears that archery, for which the English were after-warly renowned, had not at this time, become very common among them. The spear was the chief weapon employed in battle.

The clergy and the laity were, during that age, in a situation altogether new. The former were employed to endeavour to make the laity as ignorant as possible of all things which may seem totally incompatible with a civilized, and indeed, with any species of government. If a clergyman were guilty of murder, he could be punished by degradation; if he were guilty of theft, he was punished as posed to nothing but excommunication and ecclesiastical sustenances; and the crime was stoned for by penances and submission.\(^4\) Hence the assassins of Thomas à Becket himself, though guilty of the most atrocious wickedness, and the most repugnant to the sentiments of that age, lived securely in their own houses, without being called account by Henry himself, who was so much concerned, both in honour and interest, to punish that crime and who professed, or affected on all occasions, the most extreme abhorrence of it. It was not till they found their presence shunned by every one as excommunicated persons, that they were induced to take a journey to Rome, and throw themselves at the feet of the pontiff, and to submit to the penances imposed upon them; after which they continued to possess, without molestation, their honours and fortunes, and seemed even to have recovered the good opinion of good opinion of the king, as the king, by the Constitutions of Clarendon, which he endeavoured still to maintain, had subjected the clergy to a trial by the civil magistracy, it seemed but just to give them the protection of that power to which they owed obedience: it was enacted, that the murderers of clergymen should be tried before the justiciary, in the presence of the bishop or his official; and besides the usual punishment of having their hand subject to a forfeiture of their estates; and a confiscation of their goods and chattels.\(^5\)

The king passed an equitable law, that the goods of a vassal should not be sequestrated by the king, unless the vassal be surety for the debt; and that the rents of vassals should be paid to the creditors of the lord, not to the lord himself. It is remarkable that this law was enacted by the king in a council which he held at Verneuil, and which consisted of the greatest prelates and knights of England, as well as some of Normandy, Poictou, Arjou, Maine, Touraine, and Brittany; and the statute took place in all these last-mentioned territories; though the king meant that it should apply only to England; and he viewed it as a signal superintendence; how irregular the ancient feudal government was, and how near the sovereigns, in some instances, approached to despoticism, though in others they seemed scarcely to the old sons. He probably thought it would end all people, who, during several years, contain little memorable. Scotland remained in that state of feudal subjection to which he had reduced it, d and gained to himself the title of its overlord.

The king of meted land had the care of the exalted above him, turn his back on him, and such but of Philip, was soon after struck with an apoplexy, which deprived of his understanding: Philip, though in the age of fifteen,

Charlemagne. The superior years, however, and experience of Henry, while they moderated his invention, gave him such an ascendancy over this prince, that dangerous rivalry, for a long time, arose between them.
The English monarch, instead of taking advantage of his own situation, rather increased his good offices in composing the quarrels which arose in the royal family of France; and he was successful in mediating a reconciliation between Philip and his mother and uncle. These services were but all required by Philip, who, when he came to the throne, distributed among his kinsmen and conquest of Ireland, to numerous barons and members of that country to the Languedoc parliament. Mediator's Case of Ireland, p. 64. 65.

\(^16\) It was moed for the kings of England, after the incapable of using it, renewed to the king the demand of his resigning Normandy; and on meeting with a refusal, he fled with his consort to the court of France; but not finding Philip at that time disposed to enter into war for his sake, he accepted of his father's offers of reconciliation, and made him submissions. It was a cruel circumstance in the king's fortune, that he could hope for no tranquillity from the criminal enterprises of his sons but by their mutual destruction; and he was so disconsolate at his family's fall, and threw his state into convulsions. Richard, whom he had made master of Guienne, and who had displayed his valour and military genius, by suppressing the revolts of his mutinous followers; and Henry's own mutiny against his sons, redressed his family's wrongs against his elder brother for that duchy, and he defended himself against young Henry and Geoffrey, who, uniting their arms, carried war into his territories. The king, with some difficulty, composed this difference; but immediately recovered his eldest son engrossed in conspiracies, and ready to take arms against himself. While the young prince was conducting these criminal intrigues, he was seized with a fever at Martel, a castle near Turrene, to which he had retired in discontent; and seeing the approaches of death, he was at last struck with remorse for his unfaithful behaviour towards his father. He sent a message to the king, who was not far distant; expressed his contrition for his faults; and, before the face of a vast, that he might at least die with the satisfaction of having obtained his forgiveness. Henry, who had so often experienced the prince's ingratitude and violence, apprehended that his son would do nothing to make him repent, not mistrust himself into his son's hands. But when he soon after received intelligence of young Henry's death, and the proofs of his sincere repentance, this good prince was affected with the deepest sorrow. He therefore made his own grief a defence for his son's, and lamented that he had deprived that prince of the last opportunity of making atonement for his offences, and renewing once more the royal house of his deceased father. This prince died in the twenty-eighth year of his age.

The behaviour of his surviving children did not tend to give the king any consolation for the loss. As Peter, Henry had left no postercity, Richard became heir to all his dominions; and the king intended that John, his third surviving son and favourite, should inherit Guienne as his appanage. But Richard refused his consent, fled into that duchy, and even made preparations for carrying on war, as well against his father as against his brother Geoffrey, who was now put into possession of Brittany. Henry sent for Eleanor his Queen, the hermit of Guienne, and some men of war to defend the territory of that duchy against all intruders; and the king, with great resolution, at the head of those who remained of his retinue, advanced to this resolution of the Guiscons in her favour, or restraining some sence of duty towards her, readily performed; and he presently returned to his father's court. No sooner was this quarrel accommodated, than Geoffrey, the most vicious perhaps of all Henry's unhappy family, broke out into violence; demanded Anjou to be annexed to his dominions of Brittany, and on meeting with a refusal, fled to the court of France, and levied forces against his father. Henry was freed from this danger by his son's death, who was killed in a tournament at Paris. The young prince was slain after his decease, when he was delivered of a son, who received the name of Arthur, and was invested in the duchy of Brittany, under the guardianship of his grandfather, who, as Duke of Normandy, was also superior lord of that territory. Philip, as lord paramount, dispossessed him of this title to the duchy of Brittany; but was obliged to yield to the inclinations of the Bretons, who preferred the government of Henry.

Cranes. But the enmity between those potentates, the first occasion of glory in either their houses, was now to have given place to the general passion for the relief of the Holy Land, and the expulsion of the Saracens. These incidents, though obliged to yield to the immense consumption of Christians in the first Crusade, had recovered courage after the torrent was past; and attacking on all quarters the settlements of the Europeans, had reduced these adventurers to great difficulties, and obliged them to apply again for succours from the West. A second Crusade, under the Emperor Conrado and Lewis VII, King of France, in which there perished above 200,000 men, brought them but a temporary relief; and those princes, after losing such immense armies, and seeing the flower of their nobility and valor to see, required assistance to maintain their dominions into Europe. But these repeated misfortunes, which drained the western world of its people and treasure, were not yet sufficient to curce men of their passion for those holy and spiritual adventures; they began to imagine new felicity; to dry the zeal of the ecclesiastics and military adventurers among the Latin Christians. Saladin, a prince of great generosity, bravery, and conduct, having fixed himself on the throne of Egypt, began to extend his conquests over the East; and finding the settlement of the Christians in Palestine an invincible obstacle to the progress of his arms, he bent the whole force of his policy and valour to subdue that small and barren, but important territory. Taking advantage of dissensions which prevailed among the champions of the cross, and having secretly gained the Count of Tripoli, who commanded their armies, he invaded the frontiers with a mighty power, and, aided by the treachery of that Count, gained over them a complete victory, which utterly annihilated the force of the already languishing kingdom of Jerusalem.

The holy city itself fell into his hands, after a fierce resistance. A considerable part of it was almost entirely subdued; and except some maritime towns, nothing considerable remained of those boasted conquests, which, near a century before, it had cost the efforts of all Europe to acquire.

The western Christians were astonished on receiving this dismal intelligence. Pope Urban III. it is pretended, died of grief, and his successor, Gregory VIII. employed the whole time of this short pontificate in robbing arms to all the Christians by whom he had been supported: the general cry was, that they were unworthy of enjoying any inheritance in heaven, who did not vindicate from the dominion of the infidels, the inheritance of God on earth, and the blood of the martyrs which had been spilt by the footsteps of their Redeemer. A. D. 1187.

William, Archbishop of Tyre, having procured a conference between Henry and Philip near Gisors, enforced all these topics, gave a pathetic description of the miserable state of the eastern Christians, and employed every argument to excite the ruling passions of the age, superstition, and jealousy of military honour. The two monarchs immediately took the cross; many of their most generous vassals, and the Emperor Frederick I., entered into the same confederacy, some well-grounded hopes of success were entertained; and men flattered themselves that an enterprise which had failed under the conduct of many independent leaders, or of imprudent princes, might at last, by the efforts of such potent and able monarchs, be brought to a happy issue. The kings of France and England imposed a tax amounting to the tenth of all movable goods, on such as remained at home; but as they exempted from this burden most of the regular clergy, the secular aspired to the same immunity; pretended that their duty obliged them to assist the Crusade with their prayers alone; and it was with some difficulty they were constrained to desist from an opposition, which in them, who had been the chief promoters of those pious enterprises, appeared with the worst grace imaginable. This backwardness of the clergy is perhaps a symptom, that the enthusiastic ardour which had at first seized the people for Crusades, was now by time and ill success considerably abated; and that the phrenzy was chiefly supported by the military genius and love of glory in the West.

But before this great machine could be put in motion, there were still many obstacles to surmount. Philip, jealous of Henry's power, entered into a private confederacy with young Richard; and, working on his na-hious and impatient temper, persuaded him, instead of supporting and abasing that monarchy which he was one day to inherit, to seek present power and independence by disturbing and dismembering it. In 1190, Philip, in order to give a pretence for hostilities between the two kings, Richard broke into the territories of Raymond, Count of Toulouse, who immediately carried complaints of this to the King of France. Philip demonstrated with the King of France, who might have been covered with shame and confusion by this detection, still prosecuted his design, and invaded the provinces of Berri and Auvergne, under colour of ravaging the quarrel of the Count of Toulouse. Henry retaliated by making inroads upon the frontiers of France, and burning Dreux. As this war, which destroyed all hopes of success in the projected Crusade, gave great scandal, the two kings held a conference at the accustomed place between Grisost and Trie, in order to find means of accommodating their differ-cences: they separated on worse terms than before; and Philip, to show his disapprobation of the act, escaped from the conference, and was conducted by his subjects out of the town.

Henry retaliated by making inroads upon the frontiers of France, and burning Dreux. As this war, which destroyed all hopes of success in the projected Crusade, gave great scandal, the two kings held a conference at the accustomed place between Grisost and Trie, in order to find means of accommodating their differences: they separated on worse terms than before; and Philip, to show his disapprobation of the act, escaped from the conference, and was conducted by his subjects out of the town.
private as well as in public life, is almost without a blemish; and he seems to have possessed every accomplishment, both of body and mind, which makes a man either a subject of esteem or a model of morality, and his character was strong, and well proportioned; his countenance was lively and engaging; his conversation affable and entertaining; his education easy, persuasive, and ever at command. He loved peace, but possessed both bravery and conduct in war; he was provident without timidity; severe in the execution of justice without rigour; and temperate without austerity. He preserved health, and kept himself from corrupcy, to which he was somewhat inclined, by an abstemious diet and bath. He was heedful of economy in everything, particularly in hunting. When he could enjoy leisure, he rehearsed himself either in learned conversation or in reading; and he cultivated his natural talents by study, above any prince of his time.

His affections, as well as his enmities, were warm and durable; and his long experience of the ingratitude and infidelity of men never destroyed the natural sensibility of his temper, which disposed him to friendship and society. His character has been transmitted to us by several writers who were his contemporaries; and it extremely resembles, in its most remarkable features, that of his maternal grandfather Henry I.: excepting only, that ambition, which was a ruling passion in both, found not merely the death of so eminent a person a justifying itself, and pushed that prince into measures, which were both criminal in themselves, and were the cause of further crimes, from which his grandson's conduct was far removed.

This prince, like most of his predecessors of the Norman line, except Stephen, passed more of his time on the continent than in this island: he was surrounded with the English gentry and nobility, when abroad: the French gentry and nobility attended him when he resided in England: both nations acted in the government as if they were the same people; and, on many occasions, the legislatures seem not to have been distinguished. As the French, so the English barons were of French extraction, the manners of that people acquired the ascendant, and were regarded as the models of imitation. All foreign improvements, therefore, such as they were, in literature and politeness, in laws and arts, seem now to have been, in a good measure, transplanted into England; and that kingdom was become little inferior, in all the fashionable accomplishments, to any of its neighbours on the continent. The more honestly but more sensible manners and principles of the Saxons were exchanged for the affectations of chivalry, and the subsities of school philosophy: the feudal ideas of civil government, the Norman sentiments in religion, have taken the better possession of the people; by the former, the sense of submission towards princes was somewhat diminished in the barons; by the latter, the devoted attachment to papal authority was much augmented among the clergy. The Norman and other foreign families established in England, bad now struck deep root; and being entirely incorporated with the people, whom at first they oppressed and despised, they no longer thought that they needed the protection of the crown for the enjoyment of their possessions, or considered their tenure as precarious. They aspired to the same liberty and independence which they saw enjoyed by their brethren on the continent, and desired to restrain those excesses of prerogatives and arbitrary practices, which the necessities of war and the violence of conquest had at first obliged them to indulge in their monarch. That memory also of a more equal government under the Saxon princes, which remained with the English, diffused still further the spirit of liberty, and made the barons both desirous of more independence to themselves, and willing to indulge it to the people. And it was not long ere this secret revolution in the sentiments of mankind, which had been germinating in the state, then an evident alteration in the maxims of government.

The history of all the preceding Kings of England since the Conquest, gives evident proofs of the disorders attending the feudal institutions; the licentiousness of the barons, their spirit of rebellion against the prince and laws, their contempt of armies, the poverty of the state, the debasement of the barons in the transmarine dominions of those monarchs, afforded perhaps still more flagrant instances of these convulsions; and the history of France, during several ages, consists almost entirely of narrations of this nature. The cities, during the course of that event, could neither be very numerous nor populous; and there occur instances which seem to evince, that, though these are always the first seat of law and liberty, their police was in general loose and unregular. But the same disorders with those by which the country was generally infested. It was a custom in London for great numbers, to the amount of a hundred or more, the sons and relations of considerablen citizens, to form themselves into a licentious confederacy, to break into rich houses and plunder them, to rob and murder the passengers, and to commit with impunity all sorts of disorder. By these crimes, it had become so dangerous to walk the streets by night, that the citizens durst no more venture abroad after sun-set than if they had been exposed to the incursions of a public enemy. The brother of the Earl of Ferrars had been murdered by some of those nocturnal rioters; and a rich person, which was more than that of many thousands of an inferior station, so provoked the king, that he swore vengeance against the criminals, and became therefore more rigorous in the execution of the laws.

There is another instance given by historians, which proves to what a height such riots had proceeded, and how open these criminals were in committing their robberies. A band of them had attacked the house of a rich citizen, with an intention of plundering; they had broken through a stone wall with hammers and wedges; and had already entered the house sword in hand; when the citizen, armed cap-a-pie, and supported by his faithful servants, appeared in the passage to oppose them: he cut off the right hand of the first robber that entered; and made such stout resistance, that his neighbours had leisure to assemble, and come to his relief. The man who lost his hand was taken; and was tempted by the promise of pardon to reveal his confederates; among whom was one John Senex, esteemed among the richest and best-born citizens in London. He was convicted by the ordeal; and though he offered five hundred marks for his life, the king refused the money, and ordered him to be hanged. It appears from a statute of Edward I. that these disorders were not remedied even in that reign. It was then made penal to go out at night after the hour of the curfew, to carry a weapon, or to wear a livery or liveryknow.' It is said in the preamble to this law, that, both by night and by day, there were continual frays in the streets of London.

Henry's care in administering justice had gained him so great a reputation, that even foreign and distant princes made him arbiter, and submitted their differences to his judgment. Sanchez, King of Navarre, having some controversies with Alphonso, King of Castile, was contented, though Alphonso had married the daughter of Henry, to choose this prince for a referee; and they agreed, each of them to consign three castles into neutral hands, as a pledge of their not departing from his award. Henry made the cause be examined before his great council, and gave a sentence, which was submitted to by both parties. These two Spanish kings sent each a stout champion to the court of England, in order to defend his cause by arms, in case the way of duel had been chosen by Henry. Henry so far abolished the barbarous and absurd practice of contesting ships which had been wrecked on the coast, that he ordained, if one man or animal were alive in the ship, that the vessel and goods should be restored to the owners.

The reign of Henry was remarkable also for an innovation which was afterwards carried further by his successors, and was attended with the most important consequences. This prince was disgusted with the species of military force which was established by the feudal institutions, and which, though it was essentially burdensome to the subject, yet rendered very little service to the sovereign. The barons, or military tenants, came late into the field; they were obliged to serve only forty days; they were unskilful and disorderly in all their operations; and they were apt to overreach the crown in the money, the barons and knights' fees, instead of requiring the personal attendance of his vassals. There is mention made, in the History of the Exchequer, of these scutages in his second, fifth, and eighteenth years; and other writers give us an account of three more of them. When the prince had thus obtained money, he made a contract with some of those adventurers in which Europe at that time abounded. They found him soldiers of the same character with themselves, who were bound to serve for a stipulated time: the numbers were less numerous, but more useful, than when composed of all the military vassals of the crown: the feudal institutions began to relax: the kings became rapacious for money, on which all the other taxes depended; the barons, seeing no end of exactions, sought to defend their property: and as the same causes had nearly the same effects in the different countries of Europe, the several crowns either lost or acquired authority, according to their different success in the contest.

This prince was also the first that levied a tax on the movables or personal estates of his subjects, nobles as well as commoners. Their zeal for the holy wars made them submit to this innovation; and a precedent being once obtained, this taxation became, in following reigns, the usual method of supplying the necessities of the crown. The tenor of himself, so generally odious to the nation, was remitted in his reign.

It was a usual practice of the kings of England, to repeat the ceremony of their coronation three every year, on assembling the states at the three great festivals. Henry, after the first years of his reign, never renewed this ceremony, which was found to be very expensive and very useless. None of his successors revived it. It is considered as a great act of grace in this prince, that he mitigated the rigour of the feudal laws, and punished any transgressions of them, not capitably, but by fines, imprisonments, and other more moderate penalties.

Since we are here collecting some detached incidents, which have a connexion with the age, and which could not, well enter into the body of our history, it may not be improper to mention the quarrel between Roger, Archbishop of York, and Richard, Archbishop of Canterbury. We may judge of the violence of military men and laymen, when ecclesiastics could proceed to such extremities. Cardinal Huguenin being sent, in 1176, as legate into Britain, summoned an assembly of the clergy at London; and as both the archbishops pretended to sit on his right hand, this question of precedence begot a controversy between them. The monks and retainers of Archbishop Richard fell upon Roger, in the presence of the cardinal and of the synod, threw him to the ground, trampled him under foot, and so bruised him with blows, that he was taken up half dead, and his life was, with difficulty, saved from their violence. The Archbishop of Canterbury was obliged to pay a large sum of monies to the legate, in order to suppress all complaints with regard to this enormity.

We are told by Gynaldus Cambrensis, that the monks and prior of St. Swithin threw themselves one day prostrate on the ground in the monastery, accusing, complaining, with many tears and much doleful lamentation, that the Bishop of Winchester, who was also their abbot, had cut off three dishes from their table. How many has he left you? said the king. Ten only, replied the discontented monks. I myself, exclaimed the king, never have more than three; and I enjoin your bishop to reduce you to the same number. This king left two legitimate sons, Richard who succeeded him, and John who inherited no territory, though his father had often intended to leave him a part of his extensive dominions. He was the eldest son, Henry, left three legitimate daughters; Matilda, born in 1156, married to Henry, Duke of Saxony; Eleanor, born in 1162, and married to Alphous, Prince of England; Joan, born in 1165, and married to William, King of Jerusalem.

Henry, as is told by ancient historians to have been of a very amorous disposition. They mention two of his natural sons by Rosamond, daughter of Lord Clifford; namely, Richard Longespée, or Longsword, (so called from the sword he usually wore,) who was afterwards Earl of Pembroke, and is afterwards Earl, the daughter and heir of the Earl of Salisbury; and Geoffrey, first Bishop of Lincoln, then Archbishop of York. All the other circumstances of the story, commonly told of that lady, seem to be fabulous.

I.-The king's heroic actions in Palestine—His return from Palestine—Captivity in Germany—War with France—The king's delivery—Return to England—War with France—Death—Character of the king—Miscellaneous transactions of this reign.

The composition of Richard for his unctuous behaviour towards his father was durable, and influenced him in the choice of his ministers and servants after his accession. Those who had seconded and favoured his rebellion, instead of meeting with that trust and honour which they expected, were surprised to find that they lay under disgrace with the new king, and were on all occasions shunned and despised by him. The well-disposed ministers of Henry, who had vigorously opposed all the enterprises of his sons, were received with open arms, and were continued in those offices which they had honourably discharged to their former master. This prudent conduct might be the result of reflection; but in a prince, like Richard, so much guided by passion, and so little by policy, it was commonly ascribed to a principle still more virtuous and more honourable.

Richard, that he might make atonement to one parent for his breach of duty to the other, immediately sent orders for releasing the queen dowager from the confinement in which she had long been detained; and he intrusted her with the government of England till his arrival in that kingdom. His bounty to his brother John was rather profuse and imprudent. Besides bestowing on him the county of Mortagne, in Normandy, granting him a pension of four thousand marks a year, and marrying him to Aviss, the daughter of the Earl of Gloucester, by whom he inherited all the possessions of that opulent family, he increased his appanage, which the late king had destined him, by other extensive grants and concessions. He conferred on the whole estate of William Peverel, which he had bequeathed to the crown; he put him in possession of eight castles, with all the forests and honours annexed to them: he delivered over to him no less than six earldoms, Conwent, Devon, Somerset, Nottingham, Dorset, Lancaster, and Derby. And endeavouring, by favours, to fix that vicious prince in his power, he put it too much in his power, whenever he pleased, to depart from it.

The king, inspired more by the love of the holy war, the king's pre-eminent military glory than by superstition, entered on the Crusade.
This zeal against infidels, being communicated to his subjects, broke out in London on the day of his coronation, and made them find a Crusade less dangerous, and attended with more immediate profit. The prej udices of the age had made the lending of money on interest pass by the invidious name of usury; yet the necessity of the pressing case still continued it. The greater part of that kind of dealing fell everywhere into the hands of the Jews; who, being already infamous on account of their religion, had no honour to lose, and were apt to exercise a profession, odious in itself, by every kind of rigour, and even sometimes by rapine and extortion. The industry and cingulity of this people had put them in possession of all the ready money, which the avarice and profusion, common to the English with other European nations, enabled them to lend at exorbitant and unequal interest. The monkish writers represent it as a great stain on the wise and equitable government of Henry, that he had carefully protected this infidel race from all injuries and insults; but the zeal of Richard afforded the populace a pretence for venting their animosity against them. The king had issued an edict prohibiting their appearance at his coronation; but some of them, bringing large presents from their nation, presumed, in confidence of that merit, to approach the hall in which he dined; being discovered, they were exposed to the insults of the bystanders; they took to flight; the people pursued them; and many were cut down without quarter, their houses plundered, after having murdered the owners; where the Jews barricaded their doors, and defended themselves with vigour, the rabble set fire to the houses, and made way, as before, for the pillage of the same vainKindom; the usual licentiousness of London, which the sovereign power with difficulty restrained, broke out with fury, and continued these outrage; the houses of the richest citizens, though Christians, were next attacked and plundered; and wantonness and salliness at last put an end to the disorder: yet, when the king empowered Glanville, the justiciary, to inquire into the authors of these crimes, the guilt was found to involve so many of the most con siderable citizens, that it was deemed more prudent to drop the prosecution; and very few suffered the punishment due to this enormity. But the disorder stopped not at London. The inhabitants of other cities of England, hearing of these proceedings, followed the example: in York, five hundred of that nation, who had retired into the castle for safety, and found themselves unable to defend the place, murdered their own wives and children, burnt their own houses, plundered the populace, and then setting fire to the houses, perished in the flames. The gentry of the neighbourhood, who were all indebted to the Jews, went to the cathedral, where their bonds were kept, and made a solemn bonfire of the papers before the altar. The compiler of the Annals of Waverley, in relating these events, blesses the Almighty for thus delivering over this impious race to destruction.8

The ancient situation of England, when the people possessed little riches and the public no credit, made it impossible for sovereigns to bear the expense of a steady or durable war, even on their frontiers; much less could they find regular means for the support of distant expeditions like those into Palestine, where were more the result of popular frenzy, than of sober reason or deliberate policy. Richard, therefore, knew that he must carry with him all the treasure necessary for his enterprise, and that both the remoteness of his own country and its poverty, made it unable to furnish him with those continued supplies, which the exigencies of so perilous a war must necessarily require. His father had left him a treasure of about 100,000 marks; a sum quite insufficien t of every consideration but his present end. He proceeded to augment this sum by all expedients, how per nicious soever to the public, or dangerous to royal authority. He put to sale the revenues and monas of the crown, the offices of greatest trust and power, even those of forester and sheriff, which anciently were so important, became venal; the dignity of chief justiciary, in whose hands was lodged the whole execution of the laws, was sold to Hug de Puyas, Bishop of Durham, for a thousand marks; the same prelate bought the castellum of Northumberland for life;9 many of the champions of the cross, who had re pented of their vow, purchased the liberty of violating it; and Richard, who stood less in need of men than of money, dispensed, on these conditions, with their attendance. Elated with the hopes of fame, which, in that age, attended no war but those against the infidels, he was blind to every other consideration; and when some of his wiser ministers objected to this dissipation of the revenue and power of the crown, he replied, that he would sell London itself, could he find a purveyor.10 Nothing, indeed, could be a stronger proof how negligent he was of all future interests in comparison of the Crusade, than his selling, for so small a sum as 10,000 marks, the vaissage of Scotland, together with the fortresses of Roxburgh and Berwick, the greatest acquisition that had been made by his father during the course of his victorious reign; and his accepting the homage of William in the usual terms, merely for the territories which that prince held in Eng land.11 The English and all mankind has been compressed by numerous exactions; menaces were employed, both against the innocent and the guilty, in order to extort money from them: and where a pretence was wanting against the rich, the king obliged them, by the fear of his displeasure, to lend that which, he knew, it would never be in his power to repay.

But Richard, though he sacrificed every interest and consideration to the success of this pious enterprise, carried so little the appearance of sanctity in his conduct, that Fulk, curate of Neunly, a zealous preacher of the Crusade, who, from that merit, had acquired the privilege of speaking the boldest truths, advised him to rid himself of his notorious vice, and particularly his avarice, and voluptuousness, which he called the king's three favourite daughters. You counsel well, replied Richard, and I hereby dispose of the first to the Templars, of the second to the Benedictines, and of the third to my prelates. Richard, jealous of attempts which might be made on England during his absence, laid Prince John, as well as his natural brother, Geoffrey, Archbishop of York, under engagements, confirmed by their oaths, that neither of them should enter into any agreement whereby any of the immense sums of money, which had been created, should be thought proper, before his departure, to withdraw this prohibition. The administration was left in the hands of Hugh, Bishop of Durham, and of Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, whom he appointed as overseers of the whole of the realm. The latter was a Frenchman, of mean birth, and of a violent character; who, by art and address, had insinuated himself into favour, with Richard, whom he created chancellor, and whom he had engaged the Pope also to invest with the legantine authority, that, by centring every kind of power in his person, he might the better insulate the public tranquillity. All the military and turbulent spirits flocked about the person of the king, and were impatient to distinguish themselves against the infidels in Asia; whither his inclinations, his engagements, led him, and whither he was impelled by messages from the King of France, ready to embark in this enterprise. The Emperor Frederick II, a prince of great spirit and conduct, had already taken the road to Palestine, at the head of 150,000 men, collected from Germany and all the northern states. Having surmounted every obstacle thrown in his way by the efforts of the Greeks and the influence of the Pope, he had penetrated to the borders of Syria; when, bating in the cold river Cevdros, during the greatest heat of the summer season, he was seized with a mortal distemper, and left his men to finish his rash enterprise.12 His army, under the command of his son, Conrad, reached Palestine; but was so diminished by fatigue, famine, maladies, and the sword, that it scarcely amounted to eight thousand men, and was unable to make any progress against the great power, valour, and conduct of Saladin. These reiterated calamities attending the Crusaders, had taught the Kings of France and Burgundy, on another river road to the Holy Land; and they determined to conduct their armies thither by sea, to carry provisions along with them, and, by means of their naval power, to maintain an open communication with their own state, and with the western parts of Europe. The place of rendezvous was appointed in the plains of Vezelay, on the borders of Burgundy: Philip and Richard, on their arrival there, 1193., found their combined army amount to 100,000 men; a mighty force, composed with glory and religion, conducted by two warlike monarchs, provided with every thing which their several dominions could supply, and not to be overcome but by their own misconduct, or by the unsurmountable obstacles of nature.

The French prince and the English here reiterated their promises of cordial friendship, pledged their faith not to invade each other's dominions during the Crusade, mutually exchanged the oaths of all their barons and prätés to the same effect, and subjected themselves in the penalty of interdicts and excommunication, if they should ever violate this public and solemn compact. They then took the road to Gisors, Richard that to Marseilles, with a view of meeting their fleets, which were severally appointed to rendezvous in these harbours.

18th Sept. They met to sea; and not at the same time, were obliged, by stress of weather, to take shelter in Messina, where they were detained during the whole winter. This incident laid the foundation of animosities which were to impede their enterprises.

Richard and Philip were, by the situation and extent of their dominions, rivals in power; by their age and inclinations, competitors for glory; and these causes of emulation, which had the princes been employed in the field against the common enemy, were now stimulated to their mutual enterprises, soon excited, during the present leisure and repose, quarrels between monarchs of such a fiery character. Equally haughty, ambitious, intransigent, and unyielding, they were irritated by the least appearance of injury, and were incapable, by mutual concessions, to efface those causes of complaint, which unavoidably arose between them. Richard, candied, sincere, undaunting, imperious, violent, laid himself open on every occasion, to the designs of his antagonist; who, provident, interested, intriguing, failed not to take all advantages against him: and thus, both the circumstances of the case and their temper, were fatal, and they in which they differed, rendered it impossible for them to persevere in that harmony which was so necessary to the success of their undertaking.

Transjersns in Sicily. The last King of Sicily and Naples was sickly. William H. who had married Joan, sister to Richard, and who, dying without issue, had bequeathed his dominions to his paternal aunt, Constantia, the only legitimate descendant surviving of Roger, the first sovereign of those states who had been honoured with the royal title. This princess had, in expectation of that rich inheritance, been married to Henry VI. the reigning emperor, but Tancred, her natural brother, had fixed such an interfering impediment to his advantage, that Henry's absence, he had acquired possession of the throne, and maintained his claim, by force of arms, against all the efforts of the Germans. The approach of the crusaders naturally gave little apprehensions for his unstable government; and he was uncertain whether he had most reason to dread the presence of the French or of the English monarch. Philip was engaged in strict alliance with the emperor. Richard was disgusted by his rage towards the queen dowager, whom the Sicilian prince had confined in Palermo, because she had opposed with all her interest his succession to the crown. Tancred, therefore, sensible of the present necessity, resolved to pay court to both these formidable princes; and he was not unsuccessful in his endeavours. He persuaded Philip that it was highly improper for him to interrupt his enterprise against the infidels, by any attempt against a Christian state: he restored Queen Joan to her liberty; and alarmed the empress Cornelia by representations, which she stipulated by treaty to marry his nephew, Arthur, the young Duke of Brittany, to one of the daughters of Tancred. But these terms of friendship were settled, Richard, Conrad, and of the inhabitants of Messina, had taken his quarters in this small fragment of the island, which he had possessed himself of a small fort, which commanded the harbour; and he kept himself extremely on his guard against their enterprises. The citizens took umbrage at these innovations, and their quarrel with the French and English, Philip, who had quartered his troops in the town, endeavoured to accommodate the quarrel, and held a conference with Richard for that purpose. While the two kings, meeting in the open fields, were engaged in discourse on this subject, a body of those Sicilians seemed to be drawing towards them; and Richard pushed forwards, in order to impinge into the reason of this extraordinary movement. The English, insolent from their power, and inflamed with former animosities, wanted but a pretence for attacking the Messines: they soon clashed them off the field, drove them into the town, and captured the fort; the garrison, under the king employed his authority to restrain them from pil- laging and massacring the defenceless inhabitants; but they gave orders, in token of his victory, that the standard of England should be erected on the walls. Philip, who considered that place as his quarters, explained against the insult, and ordered some of his troops to pull down the standard; but Richard informed him by a messenger, that, though he himself would willingly remove that mark of his ground and power, he would not permit it by others; and if the French king attempted such an insult upon him, he should not succeed but by the utmost effusion of blood. Philip, content with this species of haughty submission, and his own victory, the difference was seenally accommodated; but still left the remains of rancour and jealousy in the breasts of the two monarchs.

Tancred, who, for his own security, desired to inflame their mutual hatred, employed an artifice which might have been attended with consequences still more fatal. He showed Richard a letter, signed by the French king, and delivered to him by Tancred. The letter pretended, by the Duke of Burgundy; in which that monarch desired Tancred to fall upon the quarters of the English, and promised to assist him in putting them to the sword, as common enemies. The unwary Richard gave credit to this intelligence; but could not fail to betray his discontent to Philip, who absolutely denied the letter, and charged the Sicilian prince with forgery and falsehood. Richard either was, or pretended to be, entirely satisfied.

Lest those jealousies and complaints should multiply between them, it was proposed, that they should, by a solemn treaty, obviate all future differences, and adjust every point that could possibly hereafter become a controversy between them. But this expedient started a new dispute, which might have proved more dangerous than any of the foregoing, and which deeply concerned the honour of Philip. The English and the French were both in treaty, with the late king, mistook so strenuously on being allowed to marry Alice of France, he had only sought a pretence for quarrelling; and never meant to take his head, as a princes, suspected of a criminal amour with his own father. After he became master, of all the disposal of that alliance: he even took means for espousing Berengaria, daughter of Sanchez, King of Navarre, with whom he had become enamoured during his abode in Germany; but this project was at last laid aside. The marriage was at last, 1195, when Philip renewed to him his application for espousing his sister Alice, Richard was obliged to give him an absolute refusal. It is pretended by Hoveden and other historians, that he was able to produce such convincing proofs of Alice’s infidelity, and even of her having borne a child to Henry, that her brother desired from his applications, and having settled all other controversies with that prince, he immediately set sail for the Holy Land. Richard awaited some time the arrival of his mother and bride; and when the lady of Ptolemais, his bride, was conducted to the Knights of St. John, he turned his fleet and squadrons, and set forward on his enterprise. Queen Eleanor returned to England, but Berengaria, and the queen dowager of Sicily, her sister, attended him on the expedi- tion. 8

The English fleet, on leaving the port of Messina, met with a furious tempest, and the squadron on which the two princesses were embarked, was driven on the coast of Cyprus, and some of the vessels were wrecked near Limioso so that island. Isaac Prince of Cyprus, who assumed the magnificent title of Emperor, pillaged the ships that were stranded, threw the seamen and passengers into prison, and even refused to the prince the usual tribute levied of merchants on shipping to the harbour of Limioso. But Richard, who arrived soon after, took ample vengeance on him for the injury. He disembarked his troops; defeated the tyrant, who opposed him; and Isaac, who had long envied the reputation of all the Saracen princes, was obliged to surrender himself upon which, Richard ordered silver fetters to be made for him; and this emperor, pleased with the distinction, expressed a sense of the generosity of his conqueror. 9

The time here espoused Bouillon, the capital of Cyprus; a dangerous rival, who was believed to have seduced the affections of his husband. Such were the libertine character and conduct of the heroes engaged in this pious enterprise. 10

The English army arrived in time to paral- lize of Palestine. take in the glory of the siege of Acre or Ptolemais, which had been attacked for above two years by the united force of all the Christians in Palestine, and had been defended by the utmost efforts of Saladin and the Saracens. The remains of the German army, conducted by the Emperor Frederick, and the separate bodies of adventurers in that country, who had not the means to enable the King of Jerusalem to form this important enterprise; but Saladin, having thrown a strong garrison into the place under the command of Caracos, his own master, who was married to a princess, and needed the assistance of continual attacks and assails, had protracted the success of the enterprise, and wasted the force of his enemies. The arrival of Philip and Richard inspired new life into the Christians; and these princes, acting by concert, and sharing the honour and danger of every action, gave hopes of a final victory over the infidels. They agreed on this plan of operations: when the French monarch attacked the town, the English guarded the trenches; next day, while these two kings engaged and conducted the assault, the English proceeded, Richard in the vanguard, and Philip, and more agreeable to the romantic spirit of that age, drew to himself the general attention, and acquired a great and splendid reputation. But this harmony was of short duration: the events which soon arose between these jealous and haughty princes.

monarchs stood in awe of this Prince of the Assassins, (for that was the name of his people; whence the word has passed into most European languages,) and it was the highest satisfaction of his orders, that he was able at length to offend and affront him. The inhabitants of Tyre, who were governed by that nobleman, had put to death some of this dangerous people: the prince demanded satisfaction; for as his orders, however, were not efficacious, he had his regular and established formalities in requiring atonement: Conrade treated his messengers with disdain; the prince issued the fatal orders: two of his subjects, who had denounced themselves to Conrade's guards, openly, in the streets of Sidon, wounded him mortally; and when they were seized and put to the most cruel tortures, they triumphed amidst their agonies, and rejoiced that they had been destined by Heaven to suffer so long.

Every one in Palestine knew from what hand the blow came. Richard was entirely free from suspicion. Though that monarch had formerly maintained the cause of Lusignan, and had exerted himself in various ways to remove the bad effects attending those dissensions, and had voluntarily conferred on the former the kingdom of Cyprus, on condition that he should resign to his rival all pretensions to the throne of Jerusalem and the entire western coast of Asia; and, in the dying breath, had recommended his widow to the protection of Richard; but the Prince of the Assassins avowed the action in a formal narrative which he sent to Europe;[1] yet, on no account could the prince accommodate himself to build the most egregious calumnies, and to impute to Richard the murder of the Marquis of Montferrat, whose elevation he once openly opposed. He filled all Europe with the news of the death of the last heir of the house of Antioch, ascribed to him, and ascribed to him alone. The events of the war were engaged with so much glory in a war, universally acknowledged to be the common cause of Christendom.

But Richard's heroic actions in Palestine were the best apology for his conduct. The Christian adventurers under his command, after opening the campaign, attempted the siege of Ascalon, in order to prepare the way for that of Jerusalem; and they marched along the sea-coast with that intention. Saladin purposed to intercept their passage; and he placed himself on the road with an army, amounting to 300,000 combatants. On this occasion a great battle was fought, in which the Christian forces, under Richard, were engaged with such prosperity that they obtained the right wing of the Christians, commanded by d'Avenosa, and the left, conducted by the Duke of Burgundy, were, in the first attack, completely routed. Richard, who led in the main body, restored the battle, attacked the enemy with intrepidity and presence of mind; performed the part both of a consummate general and valiant soldier; and not only gave his two wings leave to recover from their confusion, but obtained a complete victory over the Saracens, of whom forty thousand are said to have perished in the field. Ascalon soon fell into the hands of the Christians; and on the 25th of April a truce was carried on with equal success: Richard was even able to advance within sight of Jerusalem, the object of his enterprises; where he had the mortification to find, that he must abandon all hopes of immediate success, and must put a stop to his enterprise, and are not displeased with the advantages which they could enjoy, in which case the Crusaders, animated with an enthusiastic ardour for the holy wars, broke at first through all regards to safety or interest in the prosecution of their purpose; and trusting to the immediate assistance of Heaven, sallied before defeated; with the fame and victory in this world, and a crown of glory in the next. But long absence from home, fatigue, disease, want, and the variety of incidents which naturally attend war, had gradually abated that fury, which nothing was able directly to withstand; and every one, except the King of England, expressed a desire of speedily returning into Europe. The Germans and the Italians declared their resolution of desisting from the enterprise; the French were still more obstinate in this purpose: the Duke of Burgundy, in order to court Philip, took all opportunities of mortifying and opposing Richard—and there appeared an absolute necessity of abandoning for the present all hopes of further conquest, and of securing the king in his dominions, the district of Normandy, which had been de- ed; representing the impolicy of detaining in prison the most illustrious prince that had yet carried the banners of Christ into the Holy Land; claiming the protection of the apostolic see, which was due even to the memory of those adventurers; and upbraiding the Pope that he had a cause where justice, religion, and the dignity of the church were so much concerned, a cause which it might well belt his Holiness himself to support, by taking in person a journey to Germany, on which he had so long and in vain busied himself in Jerusalem un molested. This truce was concluded for three years, three months, three weeks, three days, and three hours; a magical number, which had probably been devised by the Europeans, and which was suggested by a superstition well suited to the object of the war.

The liberty, in which Saladin indulged the Christians, to perform their pilgrimages to Jerusalem, was an easy sacrifice on his part; and the famous war which he waged in defence of the barren territory of Judea was not with him, as with the European adventurers, the result of super- stition, but of policy. The advantage indeed of science, moderation, humanity, was at that time entirely on the side of the Saracens. The power of the Holy Roman Empire was puerile, displayed, during the course of the war, a spirit and generosity, which even his biggest enemies were obliged to acknowledge and admire. Richard, equally mortal, displayed a character; and was guilty of acts of ferocity, which threw a stain on his celebrated victories. When Saladin refused to ratify the capitulation of Acre, the King of England ordered all prisoners, to the number of five thousand, to be butchered; and the Saracens found themselves obliged to retaliate upon the Christians by a like cruelty. Saladin died at Damascus soon after concluding this truce with the French prince; and his death is memorable, that he, before he expired, ordered his winding-sheet to be carried as a standard through every street of the city; while a crier went before, and proclaimed with a loud voice, This is all that remaineth to the mighty Saladin, the conqueror of the East. By his last will he ordered charities to be distributed to the poor, without distinction of Jew, Christian, or Mahometan.

The King's return
There remained, after the truce, no business in Palestine, that had been布置 to detain Richard in that country; and the intelligence which he received, concerning the intrigues of his brother John, and those of the King of France, made him sensible that his presence was necessary in England. Having crossed over to France, he sailed to the Adriatic; and being shipwrecked near Aquila, he put on the disguise of a pilgrim, with a purpose of taking his journey secretly through Germany. Pursued by the Governor of Istera, he was forced out of the direct road to England, and was obliged to pass by Venia; where his expenses and liberality betrayed the monarch in the habit of the pilgrim; and on December 6th, he was arrested by orders of Leopold, Duke of Austria. This prince had served under Richard at the siege of Acre; but being disgusted by some insult of that haughty monarch, he was so ungenerous as to seize the present opportunity of gratifying at once his avarice and his greatness, and to pretend to the possession of his former provinces.

A. D. 1193.

The emperor, Henry VI., who also considered Richard as an enemy, on account of the alliance contracted by him with Tancred King of Sicily, despised this pretension, went to England, and, in order to dispose of his treasures, put up the house of New-chapel, Neufelle, Gisors, Pacy, Jirve. He subdued the counties of Eu and Annuale; and advancing to form the siege of Rouen, he threatened to put all the inhabitants to the sword if they dared to make resistance. Happily, Robert Earl of Leicester appeared in that critical moment; a gallant nobleman, who had acquired great honour during the Crusade, and who, being more fortunate than his master in finding his passage homewards, took on him the command in Rouen, and exalted himself by his achievements and example, to infuse courage into the dismayed Normans. Philip was repulsed in every attack; the time of service from his vasals expired; and he consented to a truce with the emperor, that he even received injuries in return for the promise of 20,000 marks, and had four castles put into his hands, as a security for the payment. Prince John, who, with a view of increasing the general confusion, went to England, and, being left there, resolved to take advantage of the disorder in his enterprises. He was only able to make himself master of the castles of Windsor and Wallingford; but when he arrived in London, and claimed the kingdom as heir to his brother, of whose death he pretended to be in receipt, he was seized the same night, he was ransomed by all the barons, and measures were taken to oppose and subdue him. The justiciaries, under the general affection of the people, provided so well for the defence of the king-domain, that John was obliged, after some fruitless effors, to conclude a truce with them; and before its expiration, he thought it prudent to return into France, where he openly avowed his alliance with Philip.

The highest spirit of Richard suffered in Germany every kind of insult and indignity. The French ambassadors, in their master's name, renounced him as a vassal to the crown of France, and declared all his fiefs to be forfeited and unjustly held. The pope, also, by the excommunication, made him repent more impatient for the recovery of his liberty, and make him submit to the payment of a larger ransom, treated him with the greatest severity, and reduced him to a state even worse than that of the nearest malversation. He was even produced before the diet of the empire at Worms, and accused by Henry of many crimes and misdemeanors; of making an alliance with Tancred, the usurper of Sicily; of turning the arms of the kingdom against a Christian prince, and subduing Cyprus; of affronting the Duke of Austria before Acre; of obstructing the progress of the Christian arms by his quarrels with the King of France; of assassinating Conrade, Marquis of Montferrat; and of concluding a truce with Saladin, and leaving Jerusalem in the hands of the Saracen emperor. Richard, whose spirit was not broken by his misfortunes, and whose genius was rather roused by these frivolous scandalous imputations; after promising, that his dignity exempted him from answering before any jurisdiction, except that of Heaven; yet condescended, for the sake of his reputation, to justify his conduct before that great assembly. He then maintained, that he had no hand in the treaty and only concluded a treaty with a prince whom he found in possession of the throne; that the king, or rather tyrant of Cyprus, had provoked his indignation by the most ungenerous and unjust proceedings; and thought he chastised this aggressor, he had not retarded a moment the progress of his chief enterprise. That if he had at any time been wanting in civility to the Duke of Austria, he had already been sufficiently vindicated for that ungracious passion; and that he was better become men, embarked together in so holy a cause, to forgive each other's infirmities, than to pursue a slight offence with such unrelenting vengeance. That he had sufficiently appeared by the event, whether the King of France or he were most zealous for the conquest of the Holy Land, and were most likely to sacrifice private passions and animosities to that great object. That if the whole term of his life had not shown him incapable of base assassination, and justified him from that imputation in the eyes of his very enemies, it was in vain for him, at present, to make his apology, or plead the many irreparable errors committed by his adversary, which could produce in his own favour. And that, however he might regret, or even abhor the conduct of his national troops, he could yet obtain such conditions from the most powerful and most warlike emperor that the East had ever yet produced. Richard, after this disingenuous apology for his conduct, burst out into indignation at the cruel treatment which he had met with; that he, the champion of the Cross, still wearing that honourable badge, should, after expending the blood and treasure of his subjects in the common cause of Christendom, be intercepted by Christian princes in his return to his own country, be thrown into a dungeon, be loaded with irons, be obliged to plead his cause, as if he were a subject and a misdemeanour, and what he still more regretted, be thereby prevented from making preparations for a new Crusade, which he had projected, after the expiration of the truce, and from redeeming the sepultures of Christ, which had so long been profaned by the dominion of infidels. His spirit and eloquence of Richard made such impression on the German princes, that they exclaimed loudly against the conduct of the emperor; the Pope threatened him with excommunication, and he was threatened to the proposals of the King of France and Prince John, found that it would be impracticable for him to execute his and their base purposes, or to detain the King of England any longer in captivity. He therefore concluded the King's desire with him a treaty for his ransom, and agreed to restore him to his freedom for the sum of 150,000 marks, about 300,000 pounds of our present money; which 100,000 marks were to be paid before he received his liberty, and sixty-seven hostages delivered for the remainder.8 The emperor, as if to gloss over the infamy of this transaction, made at the same time a present to Richard of the lands of Arles, condemned to perpetual slavery, Vespasian, Narbonne, and other states, over which the empire had some antiquated claims; a present which the king very wisely neglected.

This treaty, the superior lord was one of the cases provided for by the feudal tenures; and all the vassals were in that event obliged to give an aid for his ransom. Twenty shillings were therefore levied on each knight's fee in England; but this money came in slowly, and was not sufficient for the intended purpose, the voluntary zeal of the people readily supplied the deficiency. The churches and monasteries melted down their plate, to the amount of 30,000 marks; the bishops, abbots, and nobles paid a fourth of their yearly rents; the parochial clergy contributed a tenth of their tithes; and the requisite sum being thus collected, Queen Eleanor, and Walter, Archbishop of Rouen, shared for the German emperor the money to the emperor and the Duke of Austria at Mentz; delivered them hostages for the remainder; and freed Richard from captivity. His escape was very easily contrived. He had been detected by the visitation of the Bishop of Liége, and in an attempt of a like nature on the Duke of Louvain; and finding himself extremely obnoxious to the German princes on account of these odious practices, he had determined to seek support from an alliance with the King of France; to enrich, by the enemy's fire, the perpetuity of his capital; to keep in his hands the money which he had already received for his ransom; and to exert fresh sums from Philip and Prince John, who were very liberal in the kind. But Richard, the enemy of his prince, should be pursued and arrested; but the king, making all imaginable haste, had already embarked at the mouth of the Schelde, and was out of sight of land, when the messengers of the emperor reached Antwerp.

The joy of the English was extreme on King's return to the appearance of their monarch, who had suffered so many calamities, who had acquired so much glory, and who had gained the reputation of their name into the furthest East, whether their fame had never before been able to extend. He gave them, soon after his arrival, an opportunity of publicly displaying their exultation, by ordering leases of his possession at Westminster, if any remained, by that ceremony, to reinstate himself in his throne, and to wipe off the ignominy of his captivity. Their satisfaction was not damped, even when he declared his purpose of resuming all those exorbitant claims, which he had been oblig'd to make before his departure for the Holy Land. The barons, also, in a great council, consecrated, on account of his treason, all Prince John's possessions in England; and they assisted the king in reducing the fortresses which still remained in the hands of his brother's adherents. Richard, having settled every thing in England, passed over with an army into Normandy; being impecunious to make war on Philip, and to revenge himself for the many injuries which he had received from that monarch. As soon as Philip heard of the king's delivery from captivity, he wrote to his confederate John, in these terms: 'Tike care? answered: 'the devil is in front.'

When we consider such powerful and war with mortal monarchs, inflamed with personal animosity against each other, enraged by mutual injuries, about 300,000 pounds, instead of a sum of 100,000 marks,instigating the spirit and violence of their own temper; our curiosity is naturally raised, and we expect an obstinate and furious war, distinguished by the greatest events, and concluded by some remarkable catastrophe. Yet are we not to be overpowered by the number of plausible stories, that scarce any carcan can entertain such a description for military despatches as to venture on a detail of them:

a Byrner, vol. i. p. 81.
a certain proof of the extreme weakness of princes in those ages, and of the little authority they possessed over their refractory vassals! The whole amount of the exploits on both sides is, the taking of a castle, the surprise of a straggling party, a ransack of horse, which resembles more a rout than a battle. Richard obliged Philip to raise the siege of Virendo; he took Loches, a small town in the marches of France, and placed some of his barons there. The other places of little consequence; and after these trivial exploits, the two kings began already to hold conferences for an accommodation. Philip insisted, that, if a general partition of the barons on each side should, for the future, be prohibited from carrying on private war against each other: but Richard replied, that this was a right claimed by his vassals, and he could not debar them from it. After this fruitless negotiation, there ensued an action between the French and English cavalry at Fretteval, in which the former were routed, and the King of France's cartulary and records, which commonly at that time attended his person, were taken. But this victory leading to no important advantages, a truce for a year was at last, from mutual weakness, concluded between the two monarchs.

During this war, Prince John deserted from Philip, this prince's uncle, and joined the son of his royal predecessor, for his offences, and by the intercession of Queen Eleanor was received into favour. I forgive him, said the king, and hope I shall as easily forget his injuries, as he will my part.

A.D. 1196. The king also made advances for Richard's ransom and amity: the conduct of John, as well as that of the emperor and Duke of Austria, had been so base, and was exposed to such general odium and reproach, that the king deemed himself sufficiently avenged for those injuries; and he seemed never to have entertained any project of vengeance against any of them. The Duke of Austria, about this time, having crushed his leg by the full of his horse at a tournament, was thrown into a fever; and being struck, on the approach of death, with remorse for his injustice to Richard, he ordered by will all the English hostages in his hands to be set at liberty, and the remainder of the debt due to him to be remitted: his son, the bishop, was about to make complaint of this, was constrained by his ecclesiastics to execute it. The emperor also made advances for Richard's friendship, and offered to give him a discharge of all debts he had yet paid to him, provided he would enter into an open alliance with him, the king of France; a proposal which was very acceptable to Richard, and was greedily embraced by him. The treaty with the emperor took no effect; but it served to rekindle the war between France and England before the expiration of the truce. This war was not distinguished by any more remarkable incidents than the foregoing. After mutually ravaging the open country, and taking a few insignificant castles, the two kings concluded a peace at Louviers, and made an exchange of some territories with each other. Their inability to wage war occasioned the peace: their mutual apathy engaged them again in it; and the two months expired, Richard imagined, that he had now found an opportunity of gaining great advantages over his rival, by forming an alliance with the Counts of Flanders, Toulouse, Boulogne, Champagne, and Normandy. But the sooner he engaged, the sooner he was engaged. The Marshal of Champagne, the Duke of Beaufort, a martial prate, who was of the family of Dreux, and a near relation of the French king's. Richard, who hated that Bishop, threw him into prison, and loaded him with iron; and when the Pope demanded his liberty, and claimed him as his son, the king sent to his Holiness the coat of mail which the prelate had worn in battle, and which was all besmeared with blood: and he replied to him, in the terms employed by Jacob., Tell him, that if he had not brought him the head of the prelate, nor whether it be thy son's coat or not. This new war between England and France, though carried on with such animosity that both kings frequently put out the eyes of their prisoners, and all men before them were furnished by a brush of five years; and immediately after signing this treaty, the kings were ready, on some new offence, to break out again into hostilities; when the mediation of the Cardinal of St Mary, the Pope's legate, accommodated the difference. This peace even engaged the prince for a time to govern for a more durable peace; but the death of Richard put an end to the negotiation.

Vidomar, Viscount of Limoges, a vassal of the king's, had found a treasure, of which he sent part to that prince as a present. Richard, as superior lord, claimed the whole; and, at the head of some Brabancon, besieged the viscount in the castle of Chalus, near Limoges, in order to make him comply with his demand. The garrison offered to surrender; but the king replied, that since he had taken the pains to come thither and besiege the person in person, he would take by force, and would hang every one of them. This same day, Richard and the Duke of Marende, leader of his Brabancon, approached the castle in order to survey it; when one Bertrand de Gourdon, an archer, took aim at him, and pierced his shoulder with an arrow. However, he gave orders for the assault, and the place, and hanged all the garrison, except Gourdon, who had wounded him, and whom he reserved for a more deliberate and more cruel execution.

The wound was not in itself dangerous; but the unskillfulness of the surgeon made it mortal: be so rankled Richard's shoulder in pulling out the arrow, that a gangrene ensued; and that prince was now sensible that his life was drawing to a close. He was engaged with much remorse for his injustice to Richard, he ordered by will all the English hostages in his hands to be set at liberty, and the remainder of the debt due to him to be remitted: his son, the bishop, was about to make complaint of this, was constrained by his ecclesiastics to execute it. The emperor also made advances for Richard's friendship, and offered to give him a discharge of all debts he had yet paid to him, provided he would enter into an open alliance with him, the king of France; a proposal which was very acceptable to Richard, and was greedily embraced by him. The treaty with the emperor took no effect; but it served to rekindle the war between France and England before the expiration of the truce. This war was not distinguished by any more remarkable incidents than the foregoing. After mutually ravaging the open country, and taking a few insignificant castles, the two kings concluded a peace at Louviers, and made an exchange of some territories with each other. Their inability to wage war occasioned the peace: their mutual apathy engaged them again in it; and the two months expired, Richard imagined, that he had now found an opportunity of gaining great advantages over his rival, by forming an alliance with the Counts of Flanders, Toulouse, Boulogne, Champagne, and Normandy. But the sooner he engaged, the sooner he was engaged. The Marshal of Champagne, the Duke of Beaufort, a martial prate, who was of the sound and well-regulated policy. As military talents make great impression on the people, he seems to have been much beloved by his English subjects; and he is remarked to have been the first prince of the Norman line that bore any sincere regard to them. He passed however only four months of his reign in that kingdom: the Crusade employed him near three years; he was detained about another year in Italy, the rest of his reign was spent either in war, or preparations for war, against France; and he was so pleased with the fame which he had acquired in the East, that he determined, notwithstanding his past misfortunes, to have further exhausted the resources of his kingdom, and have exposed himself and all at least to new hazards, by conducting another expedition against the infidels.

Though the English pleased themselves with the glory which the king's martial genius procured them, his reign was very oppressive and somewhat arbitrary, by the high taxes which he levied on them, and often without consent of the states or great council. In the ninth year of his reign, he levied five shillings on each hyde of land; and because the clergy refused to contribute their share, he put them out of the protection of law, and ordered the civil courts to give them no sentence for any debts which they might charge and rece in his reign he ordered all his charters to be sealed anew, and the parties to pay fees for the renewal. It is said that Hubert, his justiciary, sent him over to France, in the space of two years, no less a sum than 1,000,000 of silver ducats, besides bonds of the value of the public credit in that kingdom. But this accretion is quite incredible, unless we suppose that Richard made a thorough dilapidation of the demesnes of the crown, which it is not likely he could do with any advantage after his former resources. A king, who possessed such a revenue, could never have endured fourteen months' captivity, for not paying 150,000 marks to the emperor, and be obliged at last to leave hostages for a third of the sum. The resources in this latter period, as he had also a certain proof that no such enormous sum could be levied on the people. A hyde of land, or about a hundred and twenty acres, was commonly let at twenty shillings a year, money of that time. As these were 243,000 these in England, it is easy to compute the amount of all the landed rents of the kingdom. The general and stated price of an ox was four shillings; of a labouring horse, the same; of a sow, one shilling; of a sheep with fine wool, ten pence; with coarse wool, sixpence. These commodities seem not to have advanced in their prices since the conquest, and to have still been ten times cheaper than at present. But Richard was so eager the severe laws which transgressors in his forests, whom he punished by castration and putting out their eyes, as in the reign of his great-grandfather. He established by law one weight and measure throughout his kingdom: a useful institution, which the mercantile necessities of his successor engaged him to dispense with for money.

The disorders in London, derived from its bad policy, had risen to a great height during this reign; and in the year 1196, there seemed to be formed to regular a conspiracy among the numerous malefactors, as threatened the city with destruction. There was one William Fitz-Osbert, commonly called Longbeard, a lawyer, who had rendered himself extremely popular among the lower rank of citizens; and, by defending them on all occasions, had acquired the appellation of the advocate or saviour of the poor. He exerted his authority, by injuring and insulting the rich and opulent citizens, with whom he lived in a state of hostility, and who were very much exposed to the most outrageous violence from him and his licentious emissaries. Murders were daily committed in the streets; houses were broken open and pillaged in day-light; and it is pretended that no less than fifty-few persons had entered into an association, by which they bound themselves to obey all the orders of this dangerous ruffian. Archbishop Hubert, who was then chief justice, summoned him before the council to answer for his conduct; but he came so well attended, that no one dared accuse him, or give evidence against him; and the privy council, finding the importune of law, contented himself with exacting from the citizens hostages for their good behaviour. He kept, however, a watchful eye on Fitz-Osbert; and seizing a favourable opportunity, attempted to commit him to custody; but the criminal, murdering one of the public officers, escaped with his companion to the church of St. Mary-le-Ward, where he defended himself by force of arms. He was there taken, condemned, and executed, amidst the regrets of the populace, who were so devoted to his memory, that they stole his gibbet, paid the same veneration to it as to the cross, and were equally zealous in propagating and attesting reports of the miracles wrought by it. But though the sectaries of this superstition were punished by the justiciary, it received so little encouragement from the established clergy, whose property was endangered by such seditious practices, that it suddenly sunk and vanished.

It was during the Crusades, that the custom of using coats of arms was first introduced into Europe. The knights, cased up in armour, had no way to make themselves known and distinguished in battle, but by the devices on their shields; and these were gradually adopted by their posterity, and families, who were proud of the pious and virtuous, or the distinguished ancestors of their houses. King Richard was a passionate lover of poetry; there even remain some poetical works of his composition: and he bears a rank among the Provengal poets or Troubadours, who were the first of the modern Europeans that distinguished themselves by attempts of that nature.

Arrhenius of the king—His marriage—War with France—Murder of Arthur, Duke of Brittany—The king expelled the French princes—the king's quarrel with the court of Rome—A solemn league appointed Archbishop of Canterbury—Inhabitants of the kingdom—Incontinent of the king—The king's submission to the Pope—Deposition of the barons—Incorruption of the barons—Massa Charta—Removal of the civil wars—The king's licence called over—Dissolution of the king.

The noble and free genius of the ancients, which made the government of a single absolute prince on the person be always regarded as a species of tyranny and usurpation, and kept them from forming any conception of a legal and regular monarchy, had rendered them entirely ignorant both of the rights of primogeniture and a representation in succession; inventions so necessary for preserving order in the lines of princes, for obviating the evils of civil discord and of usurpation, and for begetting moderation in that species of government, by giving security to the ruling sovereign. These innovations arose from the feudal law; which, first introducing the right of primogeniture, made such a distinction between the families of the elder and younger brothers, that the son of the former was thought entitled to succeed to his grandfather, preferably to his uncles, though nearer allied to the deceased monarch. But though this progress of things was natural, it was gradual. In the age of which we treat, the practice of representation was indeed introduced, but not thoroughly established; and the minds of men fluctuated between opposite principles. Richard, when he entered on the Holy War, desired peace; and Arthur, Duke of Brittany, his successor; and by a formal deed, he set aside, in his

3 udin, in his Etanmica, cap. 14, tells us, that in the 20th of December, 1190, Richard committed eighty pounds sterling, many of that age: 200 sheep, twenty-two pounds ten shillings, or, at the rate of 4l. 2s. 4d. per sheep; 200 pigs, four pounds three shillings, fifteen breeding mares, two pounds twelve shillings and one penny, and twenty two logs, one pound two shillings. Cen-
favour, the title of his brother John, who was younger than Geoffrey, the father of that prince. But John so late acquiesced in that destination, that, when he gained the ascendancy in the English ministry, by expelling Longchamp, the chancellor and great justiciary, he engaged all the English barons to swear, that they would maintain his right of succession; and Richard, on his return, took no steps towards restoring him to it. He was even careful, by his last will, to declare his brother John heir to all his dominions; 3 whether, that he now thought Arthur, who was only twelve years of age, incapable of asserting his claim against John, and to the future succession. But his mother, who hated Constantin, the mother of the young duke, and who dreaded the credit which that princess would naturally acquire if her son should mount the throne. The authority of a testament was great in that age, even where the succession of a kingdom was concerned; and John had reason to hope, that this title, joined to his plausible right in other respects, would insure him the succession. But the idea of representation seems to have made, at this time, greater progress in France than in England: the barons of the transmarine provinces, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, immediately declared in favour of Arthur, who had not been consumed by the French monarch as their superior lord. Philip, who desired only an occasion to embarrass John, and dismember his dominions, embraced the cause of the young Duke of Brittany, took him under his protection, and sent him to Rome, to have him consecrated king of France. In this emergency, John hastened to establish his authority in the chief members of the monarchy; and after sending Eleanor to Pontois and Guinevere, where her right was uncontested, he readily acknowledged, he married to Rouen, and having secured the duchy of Normandy, he passed over, without loss of time, to England. Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the justiciary, the three most favoured ministers of the late king, were already engaged on his side; 4 and the submission or acquiescence of all the other barons put him, without opposition, in possession of the throne.

The king soon returned to France, in order to conduct the war against Philip, and to recover the revolted provinces from his nephew, Arthur. The alliances which Richard had formed with the Earl of Pembroke, and other powerful French princes, though they had not been very effectual, still subsisted, and enabled John to defend himself against all the efforts of his enemy. In an action between the French and English ships in the Cambray, was taken prisoner by the former; and when the Cardinal of Capua claimed his liberty, Philip, instead of complying, reproached him with the weak efforts which he had made to support the house of Jesus, who was in a like condition. The legate, to show his impartiality, laid, at the same time, the kingdom of France and the duchy of Normandy under an interdict; and the two kings found themselves obliged to make an exchange of these military prelatures.

1900. Nothing enabled the king to bring this war to a happy issue so much as the selfish intriguing character of Philip, who acted, in the provinces that had declared for his uncle, with no regard to the interests of that prince. Constantia, seized with a violent jealousy that he intended to usurp the entire dominion of them, 5 found means to carry off her son secretly from Paris; she put him into the hands of his uncle; restored the provinces which had adhered to the young prince; and made him do homage for the duchy of Brittany, which was regarded as a mere-fief of Normandy. From this hour, Philip, to avoid the Bishop of Jenschau, which was in a like condition. The legate, to show his impartiality, laid, at the same time, the kingdom of France and the duchy of Normandy under an interdict; and the two kings found themselves obliged to make an exchange of these military prelatures.

1900. Nothing enabled the king to bring this war to a happy issue so much as the selfish intriguing character of Philip, who acted, in the provinces that had declared for his uncle, with no regard to the interests of that prince. Constantia, seized with a violent jealousy that he intended to usurp the entire dominion of them, 5 found means to carry off her son secretly from Paris; she put him into the hands of his uncle; restored the provinces which had adhered to the young prince; and made him do homage for the duchy of Brittany, which was regarded as a mere-fief of Normandy. From this hour, Philip, to avoid the Bishop of Jenschau, which was in a like condition. The legate, to show his impartiality, laid, at the same time, the kingdom of France and the duchy of Normandy under an interdict; and the two kings found themselves obliged to make an exchange of these military prelatures.

John, now secure, as he imagined, on the side of France, indulged his passion for Isabella, the daughter and heir of Aymer Tuffley, Count of Angouleme, a lady with whom he had become much enamoured. His queen, the heiress of the family of Gloucester, was still alive; Isabella was married to the Count de la Marche, and was already consigned to the care of that nobleman; though, by reason of her tender years, the marriage had been concluded before she could overlook all these obstacles: he persuaded the Count of Angouleme to carry off his daughter from her husband; and, having, on some pretence or other, procured a divorce from his own wife, he espoused Isabella; The king's marriage was the result of his having been induced to marry a princess, who claimed on the contrary, and who was compelled against these illegal proceedings, and of the resentment of the injured count, who soon found means of punishing his powerful and insolent rival.

John had not the art of attaching himself to barons either by affection or by fear. The Count de la Marche, and his brother, the Count d'Eau, taking advantage of the general discontent against him, excited commotions at the court of the King of Navarre, and obliged the king to have recourse to arms, in order to suppress the insurrection of his vassals. He summoned together the barons of England, and required them to pass the sea under his standard, and to quell the rebels; he found that he possessed as little authority in that kingdom as in his transmarine provinces. The English barons unanimously replied, that they would not attend him on this expedition, unless he would promise to restore and preserve their privileges; 5 the first symptom of a regular association and plan of liberty among those noblemen! But affairs were not yet fully ripe for the revolution projected. John, by menacing the barons, broke the concert; and both engaged many of them to follow him into Normandy, and obliged the rest, who staid behind, to pay him a sumptuous of two marks on each knight's fee, as the price of their exemption from the service.

The force which John had collected with him, and that which joined him in Normandy, rendered him much superior to his malcontent barons; and so much the more as Philip did not publicly give them any countenance, and seemed as yet determined to persevere steadily in the alliance which he had contracted with England. But the king, elated with his superiority, advanced chims which gave a universal alarm to his vassals, and dispersed still wider the general discontent. As the jurisdic-
The king had here a conference with his nephew; represented to him the folly of his pretensions; and required him to renounce the French alliance, which had encouraged him to live in a state of enmity with all his subjects; but the brave though imprudent youth, rendered more haughty from misfortunes, maintained the justice of his cause; asserted his claim, not only to the French provinces, but to the duchy of Aquitaine; and in his turn, required the king to restore the son of his elder brother to the possession of his inheritance. John, sensible, from these symptoms of spirit, that the young prince, though now a prisoner, might hereafter prove a dangerous enemy, determined to betray his pet future heir, and, obliterating his nephew; and Arthur was never more heard of. The circumstances which attended this deed of Murther of Arthur Duke of Brittany, were so exasperating to the Bretons, as to cause, by historians; but the most probable account is as follows: The king, it is said, first proposed to William de la Bray, one of his servants, to despatch Arthur; but William replied, that he was a gentleman, not a hangman; and he positively refused compliance. Another instrument of murder was found, and was despatched with proper orders to Falaise; but Hubert de Bourc, chamberlain, who was sent by the king to secure the young prince, signs that he himself would execute the king's mandate, set back the assassin, spread the report that the young prince was dead, and publicly performed all the ceremonies of his interment; but finding that the Bretons vowed revenge upon the murderer, and that all the rid of his duchy, who was now rising to man's estate, sensible of the dangerous character of his uncle, determined to seek both his security and elevation by an union with Philip and the malevolent barons. He joined the French army, which had begun hostilities against the King of England: he was received with great marks of distinction by Philip; was knighted by him; espoused his daughter Mary; and was invested not only in the duchy of Brittany, but in the counties of Anjou and Maine, which he had formerly resigned to his uncle. Every attempt succeeded with the allies. Tillieres and Bouvattant were taken by Philip, after the taking a few days' resistance; and Lyon fell into his hands almost without resistance. That prince next invested Gournay; and opening the sluices of a lake which lay in the neighbourhood, poured such a torrent of water into the place, that the garrison deserted it, and the French marched in, without stirring a blow, made himself master of that important fortress. The progress of the French army was rapid, and promised more considerable success than usually in that age attended military enterprises: yet, it was of no avail to every advance of the king; the king marched towards peace. Philip still insisted, that he should resign all his transmarine dominions to his nephew, and rest contented with the kingdom of England; when an event happened, which seemed to turn the scales in favor of John, and to give him a decisive superiority over his enemies. Young Arthur, fond of military renown, had broken into Poictou at the head of a small army; and passing near Mirebeau, he heard that his grandmother, Queen Eleanor, who had always opposed his interests, was lodged in that place, and was protected by a weak garrison and ruinous fortifications. He immediately determined to lay siege to the fortress, and make himself master of that person: but John, roused from his indolence by so pressing an occasion, collected an army of English and Breton forces, and advanced from Normandy with hasty marches to the relief of the queen-mother. He fell on Arthur's camp before that prince was aware of the danger; dispersed his army; took him prisoner, together with the Count de la Marche, Geoffrey de Lusignan, and the most considerable of the other barons. The young prince, lying before Arques in that duchy, raised the siege and retired, upon his approach. The greater part of the prisoners were sent over to England; but Arthur was shut up in the castle of Falaise.

so many considerable fiefs, which, during several ages, had been dissaniered from it. Many of the other great vasals, whose jealousy might have interposed, and have obstructed the execution of this project, were not at present in a situation to oppose it; and the rest either looked on with indifference, or gave their assistance to this dangerous aggrandizement of their superior lord. The Earl of Flanders and Blois were engaged in the holy war; the Count of Flanders, by his command, their vassals; and Philip, the duchy of Brittany, enraged at the murder of his princes, vigorously promoted all his measures; and the general deflection of John's vassals made every interference unnecessary against him. Philip, after taking several castles and fortresses beyond the Loire, which he either garrisoned or dismantled, received the submissions of the Count of Alençon, who deserted John, and delivered up all the places under his command to the French: upon which Philip broke up his camp, in order to give the troops some repose after the fatigues of the campaign. John, suddenly collecting some forces, laid siege to Alençon; and Philip, whose dispersed army could not be brought together in time to succour it, saw himself exposed to the disgrace of suffering the oppression of his friend and confederate. But his active and fertile genius found an expeditious against this evil. There was held at that very time a parliament of the barons of all the chief nobility of France and the adjoining countries, had resolved, in order to signalize their prowess and address. Philip presented himself before them; craved their assistance in the enterprise, and having broken out the gates of Alençon as the most honourable field in which they could display their generosity and martial spirit. Those valorous knights vowed, that they would take vengeance on the base traitors, the stain of arms and of chivalry; and putting themselves in the command of Philip, instantly marched to raise the siege of Alençon. John, hearing of their approach, fled from before the place; and, in the hurry, abandoned all his tents, machines, and baggage.

This feeble effort was the last exploit of that slothful and cowardly prince for the defence of his dominions. He thenceforth remained in total inactivity at Rouen; passing all his time, with his young wife, in pastime and amusements, as if his state had been in the most profound tranquillity, or his affairs in the most prosperous condition. If he ever mentioned war, it was only to give himself vaunting airs; which, in the eyes of some, considered him still more despicable and ridiculous. Let the French go on, said he; I will retake in a day what it has cost them years to acquire. His stupidity and indecision appeared so extraordinary, that the people endeavoured to account for the inactivity of him, at Montfort, his brother, and his brother-in-law, who, instead of marching into this leaguer by some magic or witchcraft. The English barons, finding that their time was wasted to no purpose, and that they must suffer the disgrace of seeing, without resistance, the progress of the French arms, withdrew from their colours, and secretly returned to their own country. No one thought of defending a man, who seemed to have deserted himself; and his subjects regarded his fate with the same indifférence, to which, in this pressing exigency, they saw him totally abandoned.

John, while he neglected all domestic resources, had the means to betake himself to a foreign power, whose protection he applied to the Pope, Innocent III., and entreated him to impose his authority upon him and the French monarch. Innocent, pleased with an occasion of exerting his superiority, sent Philip to stop the progress of his arms, and to make peace with the King of England. But the French barons received the message with indignation; declared the temporal authority assumed by the pontiff; and, vowed, that they would, to the utmost, assist their prince against all his enemies, and to this end, instead of obeying the Pope's envoys, they laid siege to Chateaudun, the most considerable fortress which remained to guard the frontiers of Normandy.

Chateaudun was situated partly on an island in the Seine river, partly on a rock opposite to it; and was secured by every advantage which either art or nature could bestow upon it. The late king, having cast his eye on this favourable situation, had spared no labour or expense in fortifying it; and it was defended by Roger de Laci, constable of Chester, a determined officer, at the head of a numerous garrison. Philip, who despaired of taking the place by force, purposed to reduce it by famine; and that he might cut off its communication to it, he threw his army across the Seine, while he himself, with his army, blockaded it by land. The Earl of Pembroke, the man of greatest vigour and capacity in the English court, formed a plan for breaking through the French lines and throwing relief into the place. He carried with him an army of 4000 infantry and 3000 cavalry, and suddenly attacked, with great success, Philip's camp in the night-time, having left orders, that a fleet of seventy flat-bottomed vessels should sail up the Seine, and fall at the same instant on the bridge. But the wind and the current of the river, by retarding the vessels, disconcerted this plan of operations; and it was morning before the fleet appeared; when Pembroke, though successful in the beginning of the action, was already repulsed with considerable loss, and the King of France had leisure to defend himself against these new assailants, who also met with a repulse. After this mishap, Philip, in further efforts for the relief of Chateaudun, sent the Earl of Pembroke, the Constable, and Philip, and had all the leisure requisite for conducting and finishing the siege. Roger de Laci defended himself for a twelvemonth with great obstinacy; and in the end compelled him to yield. Thus, after all the hardships of famine, he was at last overpowered by a sudden assault in the night-time, and made prisoner of war, with his garrison. Philip, who knew how to respect valour even in an enemy, treated him with civility, and gave him the whole city of Paris for the place of his confinement.

When this bulwark of Normandy was once subdued, all the province lay open to the inroads of Philip; and the King of England despaired of being any longer able to defend it. He secretly prepared vessels for a scandalous flight, and that the Normans might no longer doubt of his resolution to abandon them, he ordered the fortifications of Pont de l'Arche, Mollevaux, and Jonville l'Amaury, to be demolished. Not daring to refuse confidence in any of his barons, whom he believed to be universally engaged in a conspiracy against him, he intrusted the government of the province to Archain Martin and Lucpeaux the, century Harbonçois, whom he had retained in his service. Philip, now secure of his prev, pushed his conquests with vigour and success against the dismayed Normans. Falaise was first besieged, and Lucpeaux, who commanded in this siege, was long in retaking it, after the English had enlisted himself with his troops in the service of Philip, and carried on hostilities against his ancient master. Caen, Coutances, Sees, Ernux, Basieux, soon fell into the hands of the French monarch, and all the lower Normandy was reduced under his dominion. To forward his enterprises on the other division of the province, Gui de Thouars, at the head of the Bretons, broke into the territories, and took Mount St. Michael, Arranches, and all the other fortresses in that neighbourhood. The Normans, who abhorred the French yoke, and who would have defended themselves to the last extremity, if their prince had appeared to conduct them, found no resource but in submission; and every city opened its gates as soon as Philip appeared before it. Rouen alone, Arques, and Verneuil, determined to maintain their liberties; and A. D. 1204. formed a confederacy for mutual defence.

Philip began with the siege of Rouen: the inhabitants were so intrenched with hatred to France, that on the appearance of his army, they fell on all the natives of that country, whom they found within their walls, and put them to death. With the French, he threw his forces with success, and had taken some of their outworks, the citizens, seeing no resource, offered to capitulate; and demanded only thirty days to advertise their disbanding their forces against the enemy. Upon the expiration of the term, as no supply had arrived, they opened their gates to Philip; and the whole province soon after imitated the example, and submitted to the victor. This was the most important territory re-unitied to the crown of France about three centuries after the cession of it by Charles the Simple to Rolle, the first duke; and the Normans, sensible that this conquest was probably final, demanded the submission of their great : who, on the refusal of Philip, making a few alterations on the ancient Norman customs, readily granted them. But the French monarch had too much ambition and genius to stop in his present career of success. He carried his victorious arms into the provinces lately disunited, Savoy, Tournion, and part of Picardy; and in this manner, the French crown, during the reign of one able and active prince, received such an accession of power and grandeur, as, in the ordinary course of things, it would have required several ages to attain.

John, on his arrival in England, that he might cover the disgrace of his own conduct, exclaimed loudly against his barons, who, he pretended, had deserted his standard in Normandy; and he arbitrarily extorted from them a seventh of all their moveables, as a punishment for the offence. Soon after he forced them to grant him a scatage of two marks and a half on each knight's fee for an expedition into Normandy; but he did not attempt to execute the service for which he pretended to exact it. Next year he summoned all the barons of his realm to attend him on this foreign expedition, and collected troops from all the seven-ports; but meeting with opposition from some of his ministers, and abandoning his design, he dismissed both fleet and army, and then renewed his excommunications against the barons for deserting him. He next put to sea with a small escort of his subjects. Believing himself enabled to expose himself to the utmost hazard for the defence and recovery of his dominions: but they were surprised, after a few days, to see him return again into harbour, without attempting any thing. In the subsequent season, he had the courage to carry his hostile measures a step further. Gui de Thouars, who governed Brittany, jealous of the rapid progress made by his ally, the French King, prevailed to join the King of England, with all his forces; and John ventured abroad with a considerable army, and landed at Rochelle. He marched to Angers; which he took and reduced to ashes. But the approach of Philip with an army threw him into a panic; and he immediately made proposals for peace, and fixed a place of interview with his enemy; but instead of keeping this engagement, he stole off with his army, embarked at Rochelle, and returned, loaded with new shame and disgrace. The murder of the Pope enraged him at last a truce for two years with the French monarch; almost all the transmarine provinces were ravished from him; and his English barons, though harried with arbitrary taxes and fruitless expeditions, saw themselves and their country baffled and affronted in every enterprise.

In an age when personal valour was regarded as the chief accomplishment, such conduct as that of John, always disgraceful, must be exposed to peculiar contempt; and he must thenceforth have expected to rule his turbulent vassals with a very doubtful authority. But the government exercised by the Norman princes had wound up the royal power to so high a pitch, and so much beyond the usual tenour of the feudal constitutions, that it still behoved him to be debased by new affronts and disgraces, ere his barons could entertain the view of complying with him, in order to reconquer his principalties. The church, which, at that time, declined not a contest with the most powerful and most vigorous monarchs, took first advantage of John's imbecility; and, with the most aggravating circumstances of insolence and scorn, fixed her yoke upon him.

A. D. 1207.

The papal chair was then filled by Innocent III. who, having attained that dignity at the age of forty-seven years, and being endued with a lofty and enterprising genius, gave full scope to his ambition, and attempted, perhaps more than any of his predecessors, to con-vert that superiority which was yielded him by all the European princes, into a real dominion over them. The hierarchy, protected by the Roman pontiff, had already carried to an enormous height its usurpations upon the civil power; but in order to extend them further, and render the French crown a mere appendage, it was necessary to reduce the ecclesiastics themselves under an absolute monarchy, and to make them entirely dependent on their spiritual leader. For this purpose, Innocent first attempted to place those taxes at pleasure upon the clergy; and in the first year of this century, taking advantage of the popular frenzy for Crusades, he sent collectors over all Europe, who levied, by his authority, the fourth of all ecclesiastical revenues for the relief of the Holy Land, and received the voluntary contributions of the clergy in like amount. The same year Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, attempted another innovation, favourable to ecclesiastical and papal power: in the king's absence, he summoned, by his legateary authority, a synod of all the English clergy, contrary to the inhibition of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the chief justiciary; and no proper censure was ever passed on this encroachment, the first of its kind, upon the royal power, which continued to subvert the law, and soon after happened, which enabled so aspiring a pontiff as Innocent to extend still further his usurpations on so contemptible a prince as John.

Hubert was excommunicated A. D. 1205; and as the monks or canons of Christ-church, Canterbury, possessed a right of voting in the election of their archbishop, some of the juniors of the order, who lay in wait for that event, met clandestinely the very night of Hubert's death; and without any concern for his dignity or his desires, he was reelected instead of his successor; installed him in the archiepiscopal throne before midnight; and, having enjoined him the strictest secrecy, sent him immediately to Rome, in order that the choice of the pope might be known. The vanity of Reginald prevailed over his prudence; and he no sooner arrived in Flanders, than he revealed to every one the purpose of his journey, which was immediately known in England. That event was resented at the novel and temerity of the attempt, in filling so important an office without his knowledge or consent: the suffragan bishops of Canterbury, who were accustomed to concur in the choice of their own bishop, were so much displeased at the exclusion given them in this election: the senior monks of Christ-church were injured by the irregular proceedings of their juniors; the juniors themselves, ashamed of their conduct, and disgusted with the levity of Reginald, who ruled the See of Canterbury, and the Pope were willing to set aside his election; and all men concurred in the design of remedying the false measures which had been taken. But as John knew that this affair would be canvassed before the same tribunal, where the interpo- sition of royal authority in bestowing ecclesiastical benefices was very invidious; where even the cause of suffra- gan bishops was not so favourable as that of monks; he determined to make the new election entirely unexception- able: he submitted the affair wholly to the canons of Christ-church, and departing from the right claimed by his predecessors, ventured no further than to inform them privately, that they would do him an acceptable service, if they chose John de Gray, Bishop of Norwich, for their primate.

The election of that prelate was accordingly made without a contradictory vote; and the king, to oblige all content, endeavoured to persuade the suffragan bishops not to insist on their claim of competing in the election: but those prelates, persevering in their pretensions, sent an agent to maintain their cause before Innocent; while the king, and the convent of Christ-church, despaired of the two monks of that order to supply the place of the pope, and the same tribunal, the election of the Bishop of Norwich, Thus there lay three different claims before the Pope, whom all parties allowed to be the supreme arbiter in the consequences of this question. There being an un- site to the usual maxims of the Papal court, was soon act aside: the election of Reginald was so obviously fraudulent and irregular, that there was no possibility of defend- ing it: but Innocent maintained, that, though this election was null and invalid, it ought previously to have been declared such by the sovereign pontiff, before the monks could proceed to a new election; and that the choice of the next from them was a barbarous act of violence, without that of his competitor.1 Advantage was, therefore, taken of this subtlety for introducing a precedent, by which the see of Canterbury, the most important dignity in the church, might ever after be at the disposal of the court of Rome.

While the Pope maintained so many fierce contests, in order to wrest from princes the right of granting investi- tures, and to exclude laymen from all authority in con- cerning the disposal and properties of souls and bodies, the person on whom he bestowed preferment. The canons which regulated elections were purposely rendered intricate and involved; frequent disputes arose among candidates: appeals were every day carried to Rome: the apostolic see, by pretending pecuniary advantages from these contests, often exercised the power of setting aside both the litigants, and on pretence of appealing faction, nominated a third person, who might be more acceptable to the intending parties.

The present controversy about the election to the see of Canterbury afforded Innocent an opportunity of claiming this right; and he failed not to perceive and avail himself of the advantage. All benefit was bestowed by the convert to maintain the cause of the Bishop of Norwich; and commanded them, under the penalty of excommunication, to choose for their pri- mate, Cardinal Langton, an Englishman by birth, but educated in France, and connect- ed, by his interest and attachments, with the see of Rome. In vain did the monks represent, that they had received from their convert no authority for this step, and that they would put out nothing which was a mark of the King, would be deemed highly irregular; and that they were merely agents for another person, whose right they had no power or pretence to abandon. None of these reasons were ever deemed sufficient, except one, Elias de Brantheld: all the rest, over come by the menaces and authority of the Pope, complied with his orders, and made the election required of them.

Innocent, sensible that this first usurpation would be highly resented by the court of England, wrote John a mollifying letter; sent him four golden rings set with precious stones; and endeavoured to enhance the value of the present, by informing him of the many mysteries im- planted in it. He desired him to consider seriously the form of the rings, their number, their matter, and their colour. Their form, he said, being round, shadowed out eternity, which had neither beginning nor end; and he ought thence to learn his duty of aspiring from earthly objects to heavenly, from things temporal to things eternal. The number four, being a square, denoted steadiness of mind, not to be subverted either by adversity or pros- perity, but to be inviolable in all circumstances. Gold, which is the matter, being the most precious of metals, signified wisdom, which is the most valuable of all accomplishments, and justly preferred by Solomon to riches, power, and all external attainments. The blue colour of the sapphire represented Faith; the verdure of the emerald, Hope; the redness of the ruby, Charity; and the splendour of the topaz, Good Wishes. By these attributes, Innocent endeavoured to repay John for one of the most important prerogatives of his crown, which he had ravished from him; conceals probably admired by Innoc- cent himself; for it is easily possible for a man, especially endowed with the arts of a statesman, to make one of his competing for business with an absurd taste for literature and the arts.

John was inflamed with the utmost rage, when he heard of this attempt of the court of Rome; and he immedi- ately vented his indignation on the monks, whom he from whom he claimed the sawdromes, commanded the prior and the monks to depart the kingdom, and me- naced them, that in case of disobedience, they would instantly burn them with the convent.1 Innocent prog- nosticating, from the violence and imprudence of these measures, that John would finally sink in the contest, persevered the more vigorously in his pretensions, and exhorted the king not to oppose God and the church any longer, nor to persecute that cause for which the holy mar- tY, St. Thomas, had sacrificed his life, and which had exalted him equal to the highest saints in heaven: a clear proof that by the example of this famous saint, he did not remember the prejudices and established principles of his subjects, who bore a profound veneration to that martyr, and regarded his merits as the subject of their chief glory and exultation.

Innocent, finding that John was not sufficiently tamed to submission, sent three prelates, the bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester, to intimate, that if he persevered in his disobedience, the sovereign pontiff would be obliged to lay the kingdom under an interdict, and the other prelates throw themselves on their knees before him, and entreated him, with tears in their eyes, to prevent the scandal of this sentence, by making a speedy submission to his spiritual head, by receiving from his hands the new-elected primate, and by restoring the monks of Christ- church to all their rights and possessions. He burst out into the most indelicate invectives against the prelates; swore by God's teeth, (his usual oath,) that if the Pope presumed to lay his kingdom under an interdict, he would send to him all the bishops and clergy in England, and would con-fiscate all their estates; and threatened, that, if henceforth he caught any Romans in his dominions, he would cause them to be strangled; and that he would set a mark upon them which might distinguish them from all other nations.1 Amidst all this idle violence, John stood on such bad terms with his nobility, that he could hardly draw up his forces, and, in so just a cause, would probably have adhered to any other monarch, and have defended with vigour the liberties of the nation against these palpable usurpations of the court of Rome. Innocent, therefore, per- mitted the covering the king's weakness, fulminated at last the sentence of interdict, which he had for some time held suspended over him.2

The sentence of interdict was at that time the great in- strument of vengeance and policy employed by the court of Rome; was denounced against sovereigns for the lightest offences; and made the guilt of one person involve the ruin of millions, even in their spiritual and eternal welfare. The execution of it was calculated to strike the senses in the highest degree, and to operate with irresistible force on the最容易 minds of the people. The nation was of a sudden deprived of all exterior exercise of power; the courts were deserted; the townsmen and the countrymen, the crosses, the relics, the images, the statues of the saints, were laid on the ground; and, as if the air itself were profaned, and might pollute them by its contact, the priests carefully covered them up, even from their own approach and veneration. The use of bells entirely ceased in all the churches; the bells themselves were removed from the steepleps, and laid on the ground with the other sacred utensils. Mass was celebrated with shut doors, and none but the priests were admitted to that holy institution. The daily partook of no religious rite, except baptism to new-born infants, and the communion to the dying; the dead were not interred in consecrated ground: they were thrown into ditches, or buried in common fields; and their obsequies were not attended with prayers or any hallowed ceremony. Marriage was considered as an unlawful act, and every action in life might bear the marks of this deplorable situation. The people were prohibited the use of meat, as in Lent, or times of the highest penance; were debarred from all pleasures and entertainments; and were forbidden even to salute each other; so much so that, below their being shut and gave any decent attention to their person and apparel. Every circumstance earned symptoms of the deepest distress, and of the most immediate apprehension of divine vengeance and indignation.

The king, that he might oppose his temporal to their spiritual terror, immediately, from his own authority, confiscated the estates of all the clergy who obeyed the interdict; fnished the prelats, confined the monks in their convents; and gave them only such a small allowance from their own estates as would suffice to provide them with food and raiment. He treated with the utmost rigor such archbishops and bishops as knew that they would proceed to any disposition to obey the commands of Rome: and in order to distress the clergy in the tenderest point, and at the same time expose them to reproach and ridicule, he threw into prison all their concubines, and required high fines as the price of their liberty.

After the canons which established the celibacy of the clergy were, by the zealous endeavours of Archbishop Anselm, more rigorously executed in England, the ecclesiastical penalties were universally, and without any discretion, in the use of conclavages; and the court of Rome, which had no interest in prohibiting this practice, made very slight opposition to it. The custom was become so prevalent, that the common view of the clergy was to take an oath, to observe the Reformations, the laws not only permitted, but, to avoid scandal, enjoined, the use of concubines to the younger clergy; and it was usual every where for priests to apply to the ordinary, and obtain from him a formal liberty for this indulgence. The bishop commonly took care to prevent the practice from degenerating into licentiousness: he confined the priest to the use of one woman, required him to the consecration of his bed, obliged him to provide for her subsistence and that of his children; and though the offseason was, in the eye of the law, deemed illegitimate, this commerce was really a kind of inferior marriage, such as is still practised in Germany among the nobles; and the clergy, through the candid and easy appeal from the tyranny of civil and ecclesiastical institutions, to the more virtuous and more unerring laws of nature.

The quarrel between the king and the see of Rome continued for some years; and though many of the clergy, from the fear of punishment, obeyed the orders of John, and celebrated divine service, they complied with the utmost reluctance, and were regarded, both by themselves and the people, as men who betrayed their principles, and sacrificed their conscience to temporal regards and interests. During this violent situation, the king, in order to give a lustre to his government, attempted military expeditions against Scotland, against Ireland, against the Welsh; and he commonly was the more from the weakness of his enemies, than from his own vigour or abilities. Meanwhile, the danger to which his government stood continually exposed from the discordants of the ecclesiastics, increased, his natural propensity to tyranny; and he seems to have even wantonly disregarded all orders of men, especially his nobles, from whom alone he could reasonably expect support and assistance. He distributed the regiments by lot, left to his own caprice the persons he thought proper to seize him, to throw him into prison, to cover his head with a great leaden cope; and, by this and other severe usage he soon put an end to his life. He was buried in the church of St. Mary de Becket, to exalt him to an equal station in heaven with that great and celebrated martyr. Hugh de Wells, the Conscious of the general hatred A.D. 1208. which he had incurred, he required his nobles to prevent the brief hasty interdictions; and they were obliged to put into his hands their sons, nephews, or near relations. When his messengers came with like orders to the castle of William de Braose, a baron of great note, the lady of that nobleman replied, 'That she held not her son as one who had murdered his own nephew while in his custody. Her husband reproved her for the severity of this speech; but, sensible of his danger, he immediately fled with his children, and concealed himself; and the king discovered the unhappy family in their retreat; seized the wife and son, whom he starved to death in prison; and the baron himself narrowly escaped by flying into France.

The court of Rome had artfully contrived a gradation of sentences, by which it kept offenders in awe; still affording them an opportunity of preventing the most heinous proceedings; and, in case of their obstinacy, was able to refresh the horror of the people against them, by new denunciations of the wrath and vengeance of Heaven. As the sentence of interdict had not produced the desired effect on John, and as his vassals, though extremely disaffected, had hitherto been restrained from rising in open rebellion against him, he was soon to look for the sentence of excommunication; and he had reason to apprehend, that, notwithstanding his late submission, the consequences might ensue from it. He was witness of the other scenes which, at that very time, were acting in Europe, and which displayed the unbounded and unconscious power of the crowned gentleman, and his desire of gain, his contempt for oath and law, his incapacity for the governance of nations, his incapacity for the service and defence of his kingdom. He was witness of the other scenes which, at that very time, were acting in Europe, and which displayed the unbounded and unconscious power of the crowned gentleman, and his desire of gain, his contempt for oath and law, his incapacity for the governance of nations, his incapacity for the service and defence of his kingdom. chancellor, being elected by the king's appointment, Bishop of Lincoln, upon a vacancy in that see, desired leave to go abroad, in order to receive consecration from the Archbishop of Rouen; but he had no sooner obtained leave from the king, than he hastened to Pontegny, where Langton then resided, and paid submission to him as his primate. The bishops, finding themselves exposed either to the jealousy of the king, or hatred of the council, left the kingdom, and, at last, there remained only three prelates to perform the functions of the episcopal office. Many of the nobility, terrified by John's tyranny, and obnoxious to his suspicion, either submitted to the church, or went into exile; but most of the bishops; and of those who remained, were, with reason, suspected of having secretly entered into a confederacy against him. John was alarmed at his dangerous situation; a situation which precluded, vigour, and popularity, might formerly have prevented, but which no virtues or abilities were now sufficient to retrieve. He desired a conference with Langton at Dover; offered to acknowledge him as primate to submit to the Pope, to restore the exiled clerics, even to pay them a limited sum as a compensation for the rents of their confiscated estates. But Langton, perceiving his advantage, was not satisfied with these concessions; he demanded that full restitution and indemnity be made to all the clerics; a condition so exorbitant, that the king, who probably had not the power of fulfilling it, and who foresaw that this estimation of damages might amount to an immense sum, finally broke off the conference.

The next gradation of papal sentences was to absorb John's subjects from their oaths of fidelity and allegiance, and to declare every one excommunicated. He had already taken military, and even civil, authority in private; at his table, in his council, or even in private conversation: and this sentence was accordingly, with all imaginable solemnity, pronounced against him. But as John still persisted in all the crimes which he had committed before the example of the Papal Primate, it was not all that he had been guilty of. Indeed he was accused of sedition, of procuring the death of the four lords, who were, at that time, in the king's service, and who were, consequently, deprived of their posts. It was also alleged that, in order to procure these sentences, the king had not only employed means of a judicial nature, but had recourse to a violent and seductive art. He had been accused of having seduced the king, and the bishops, and many of the prelates and nobility; and of de-" of which, however offensive to all the English, no one present, even the Archbishop of Dublin, dared to take any notice. But though Pandolf had brought the king to submit to these base conditions, he still refused to free him from the excommunication and interdict, till an estimation should be taken of the losses of the ecclesiastics, and full compensation made for them. Meanwhile, John, reduced to this abject situation under a foreign power, still showed the same disposition to tyranny over his subjects, which had been the chief cause of all his misfortunes. One Peter of Pomfret, a hermit, had foretold that the king, this very year, should lose his crown; and for that rash prophecy he had been thrown into prison in Corfe-castle. John now determined to bring him to punishment as an impostor; and though the man professed that his prophecy was fulfilled, and that the king had lost the royal and independent crown which he formerly wore, the defence was supposed to aggravate his guilt: he was therefore sentenced to imprisonment, of Watham, and there hanged on a gibbet with his son.1

When Pandolf, after receiving the homage of John, returned to France, he congratulated Philip on the success of his arms, and was about to return to Dublin, and thereby render it impossible for the terror of the French arms, had now come to a just sense of his guilt; had returned to obedience under the apostolic see, and even consented to do homage to the French crown; and had made his kingdom a part of St. Peter's patrimony, had rendered it impossible for any Christian prince, without the most manifest and most flagrant impiety, to attack him.2 Philip would not admit such an interpretation of that having, at the Pope's instigations, undertaken an expedition, which had cost him above 60,000 pounds sterling, he was frustrated of his purpose, at the time when its success, which he had expected, was almost in the expense had fallen upon him; all the advantages had accrued to Innocent: he threatened to be no longer the dupe of those hypocritical pretexts: and, assembling his vassals, he laid before them the ill treatment which he had received from the Pope, expressed the interest and fraudulent conduct of the Pope, and required their assistance to execute his enterprise against England, in which he told them, that notwithstanding the prohibitions and menaces of the legate, he was determined to persevere. The French barons, in that age, little less ignorant and superstitious than the English: yet, so much does the influence of those religious principles depend on the present dispositions of men, even in the most enlightened, that the interest of Pandolf, and thereby rendered it impossible for him to proceed any further in his enterprise. John, exulting in his present security, insensible to his past disgrace, was so elated with this success, that he thought of no less than invading France in his turn, and revenging all those provinces which the prosperous arms of Philip had formerly ravished from him. He proposed this expedition to the barons, who were already assembled for the defence of the kingdom. But the English nobles both had they all resolved to follow their prince, and the king, of course, had no success to any enterprise conducted by such a leader; And pretending that their time of service was elapsed, and all their provisions exhausted, they refused to second his undertaking. The king, however, resolved in his purpose, embarked with a few followers, and sailed in Jersey, in the foolish expectation that the barons would last be ashamed to stay behind.3 But finding himself disappointed, he returned to England; and raising some troops, threatened to take vengeance on all his nobles for their desecration and disobedience. The Archbishop of Canterbury's charge to his clergy to maintain their independence here interposed; strictly inhibited the king from thinking of such an attempt; and threatened him with a renewal of the sentence of excommunication, if he pretended to levy war upon any of his subjects, before the kingdom were freed from the sentence of interdict.4

The church had recalled the several anathemas pronounced against John, by the same gradual progress with which he had at first refused them. By receiving his homage, and admitting him to the rank of a vassal, his deposition had been virtually annulled, and his subjects were again bound by their oaths of allegiance. The sentence of interdict, however, was still upheld against the kingdom. A new legate, Nicholas, Bishop of Fresnay, came into England in the room of Pandolf; and he declared it to be the Pope's intentions never to be lenient that sentence till full reparation was made to the clergy of England; every thing taken from them, and ample reparation for all damages which they had sustained. He only permitted mass to be said with a low voice in the churches, till those losses and damages could be estimated to the satisfaction of the parties. Certain barons were appointed to take an account of the claims; and John was assomated at the greatness of the sums to which the clergy made their losses to amount, and he was at thirty thousand marks for a full acquittal. The clergy rejected the offer with disdain; but the Pope, willing to favour his new vassal, whom he found zealous in his declarations of fealty, and reward the zeal of that prince, which had occasioned his deposition, accepted his legate to accept of forty thousand. The issue of the whole was, that the bishops and considerable abbots got reparation beyond what they had any title to demand: the inferior clergy were obliged to sit down contented with their losses; and the king, after the interdict was taken off, renewed, in the most solemn manner, and by a new charter, sealed with gold, his professions of homage and obedience to the see of Rome. When this vexatious affair was at last brought to a conclusion, the king, as if he had nothing further to attend to but triumphs and victories, went over to Poitou, which still acknowledged his authority5 and he carried war into Philip's dominions. He besieged a castle near Angiers; but the approach of Prince Lewis, Philip's son, obliged him to raise the siege with such precipitation, that he left his standards, machines, and baggage behind him; and he returned to England with his troops in a great disgrace. About the same time, he heard of the great and decisive victory gained by the King of France at Bornes over the Emperor Otho, who had entered France at the head of 150,000 Germans; a victory which established for ever the glory of Philip, and gave full security to all his dominions. John could therefore think henceforth of nothing further, than of ruling peaceably his own kingdom; and his close connexions with the Pope, whose enmity was determined at any price to maintain, insured him, as he imagined, the certain attainment of that object. But the last and most grievous scene of this prince's misfortunes still awaited him; and he was destined to pass through the most of his misfortunes undiminished, than had ever yet fallen to the lot of any other monarch.

Documents of the appointment of the new king. England by William the Conqueror had much infringed the terms of the charter, given by the Anglo-Saxons in their ancient government, and had reduced the whole people to a state of vassalage under the king or barons, and even the greater part of them to a state of real slavery. The necessity also of mistrusting great power in the hands of a prince, who was to maintain military dominion over a vanquished nation, had engaged the Norman barons to submit to a more severe and absolute prerogative, than that to which men of their rank, in other feudal governments, were commonly subjected. The power of the crown, once raised to a high pitch, was not easily reduced; and the nation, during the course of a hundred and fifty years, was governed by an authority unkempt by any restraint, excepting those given by the northern conquerors. Henry I. that he might allure the people to give an exclusion to his elder brother Robert, had granted them a charter, favourable to many particulars to which they appeared to be attached. Heed had then H. 11. had confirmed it: but the concessions of all these princes had still remained without effect; and the same unmitigated, at least irregular, authority continued to be exercised both by them and their successors. The only happiness, that arms were never yet ravished from the hands of the barons and people. The nation, by a great confidence, might still vindicate its liberties; and nothing was more likely, than the character, conduct, and fortunes of the younger prince, to produce a greater union and combination against him. Equally odious and contemptible, both in public and private life, he affronted the barons by his insolence, dis honoured their families by his gallantries, enraged them by his tyranny, and gave discontent to all ranks of men by his endless exactions and impositions. The effect of these lawless practices had already appeared in the general demand made by the barons of a restoration of all their privileges; and after he had reconciled himself to the Pope, by abandoning the independence of the kingdom, he appeared to all his subjects in so mean a light, that they universally thought they might with safety and hope recover their ancient rights.

But nothing forwarded this confidence so much as the concurrence of Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury; a man whose memory, though he was o.bstructed on the nation by a palpable encroachment of the see of Rome, ought always to be respected by the English. This prelate, whether he was moved by the generosity of his nature and his affection to public good; or had entertained an animosity against John on account of the long opposition made by that prince to his election; or thought that an acquisition of liberty to the people would serve to increase and secure the privileges of the church; had formed the plan of reforming the government, and had prepared the way for the great revolution, by inserting those singular clauses above mentioned in the oath by which he administered to the king, before he would absolve him from the sentence of excommunication. Soon after, in a private meeting of some of the barons at Lambeth, he shewed them a copy of Henry I.'s charter, which he said he had happily found at a monastery; and he exhorted them to insist on the renewal and observance of it. The barons swore, that they would sooner have it ruptured than part from a promise already made. The confidence began now to spread wider, and to comprehend almost all the barons in England; and a new and more numerous meeting was summoned by Langton at St. Edmundsbury, under colour of devotion. He again produced to the assembly the old charter of Henry; renewed his exhortations of unanimity and vigour in the prosecution of their purpose; and represented to the strongest colours the tyranny of the young prince, the defects in his government, and the manner in which he treated all that were near and distant; and from which he now beheld them to free themselves and their posterity. The barons, inflamed by his eloquence, incited by the sense of their own wrongs, and encouraged by the appearance of their power and numbers, solemnly took an oath, before the bishop, to adhere to each other, to insist on their demands, and to make endless war on the king, till he should submit to grant them. They agreed, that after the festival of Christmas, they would perfect the bodily coercion of their king; and in the mean time, they separated, after mutually engaging, that they would put themselves in a posture of defence, would enlist men and purchase arms, and would supply their castles with the necessary provisions.

The barons appeared in London on the day appointed; and demanded of the king, that, in consequence of his own oath before the primate, as well as in deference to their just rights, he should grant them a renewal of Henry's charter, and a confirmation of the laws of St. Edward. The king, alarmed with their zeal and unanimity, as well as with their power, required a delay; promised that, at the festival of Easter, he would give them a promise, on their promise, to summon them to the barons, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Ely, and the Earl of Pembroke, the marshal, as sureties for his fulfilling this engagement. The barons accepted of the terms, and promised to return to their castles.

During this interval, John, in order to break or subdue the league of his barons, endeavoured to avail himself of the ecclesiastical power, of whose influence he had, from his own recent misfortunes, had such fatal experience. He granted to the clergy a charter, re- finishing for ever that important prerogative, for which his father and all his ancestors had zeulously contended; yielding to them the free election on all great occasions, reserving only the power to issue a congé d'elire, and to subjoin a confirmation of the election; and declaring that, if either of these were withheld, the choice should nevertheless be deemed just and valid. He made a vow to lead an army into Palestine against the infidels, and he took on him the cross, in hopes that he should receive from the church that protection which she tendered to every one that had entered into this sacred and meritorious engagement. And he sent to Rome his agent, William de Macclure, to order to appeal to the Pope against the violence of his barons, and procure him a favourable sentence from that powerful tribunal. The barons also were not negligent on their part in endeavouring to procure the deposal of the king. They despatched Eustace de Vescie to Rome; laid their case before Innocent as their feudal lord; and petitioned him to interpose his authority with the king, and oblige him to restore and confirm their charters and ancient rights.

Innocent beheld with regret the disturbances which had arisen in England, and was much inclined to favour John in his pretensions. He had no hopes of retaining and extending his newly acquired superiority over that kingdom, but by supporting so base and degenerate a prince, who was willing to sacrifice every consideration to his present safety. And he foresaw, that if the administration should fall into the hands of those gallant and high spirited barons, they would vindicate the honour, liberty, and independence of the nation, with the same ardour which they now exerted in defence of their own. He wrote letters therefore to the prelates, to the nobility, and to the bishops, inciting them to engage in good offices in conciliating peace between the contending parties, and putting an end to civil discord: to the second, he expressed his dissappproval of their conduct in employing force to procure the submission of a sovereign: the last he advised to treat his oaths with grace and indulgence, and to grant them such of their demands as should appear just and reasonable.

The barons easily saw, from the tenor of these letters, that they must reckon on having the Pope, as well as the king, for their adversary; but they had already advanced too far to recede from their pretensions, and their passions were inflamed, when they observed, that even the power of superstition itself any longer to control them. They also foresaw, that the thunders of Rome, when not seconded by the efforts of the English ecclesiastics, would be of small consequence in the world; and they, the most considerable of the prelates, as well as all the inferior clergy, professed the highest approbation of their cause. Besides that these men were seized with the national passion for laws and liberty; blessings of which they themselves experienced, and that they had no reason to fear a cause to lessen their devoted attachment to the apostolic see. It appeared, from the late usurpations of the Roman pontiff, that he pretended to reap alone all the advantages accruing from that victory, which, under his banners, though at their own peril, they had every where obtained over the civil magistrate. The Pope assumed a despotic power over all the churches: their particular customs, privileges, and immunities, were treated with disdain: even the canons of general councils were set aside by his dispensing power: the whole administration of the church was centred in the court of Rome: all pretensions ran of course to the same channel: and the provincial clergy saw at least, that there was necessity for limiting these pretensions. The legate, Nicholas, in filling those numerous vacancies which had fallen in England during an interdict of six years, had proceeded in the most arbitrary manner; and had paid no regard to dignities, to personal merit, to rank, to the inclination of the electors, or to the customs of the country. The English church was universally disgusted; and Langton himself, though he owed his elevation to an encroachment of the Roman see, was no sooner established in his high office, than he became jealous of the privileges annexed to it, and formed attachments with the country subjected to his jurisdiction. These causes, though they opened slowly the eyes of men, failed not to produce their effect: they set bounds to the usurpations of the papacy: the tides first stopped, and then turned against the sovereign pontiff: and it is otherwise inconceivable how that age, so prone to superstition, and so sunk in ignorance, or rather so devoted to a spurious erudition, could have escaped falling into an absolute and total slavery under the court of Rome.

Arrived in England, the malcontent barons on the approach of the festival of Easter, when they were to expect the king's answer to their petition, met by agreement at Stamford; and they assembled a force, consisting of above 2000 knights, besides their retainers and inferior persons, armed with the best of their power, the earl's, advanced in a body to Bracley, within fifteen miles of Oxford, the place where the court then resided: and they there received a message from the Archbishop of Canterbury and Earl of Pembroke, desiring to know what those liberties were which they so zealously challenged from their sovereign. They delivered to these messengers a schedule containing the chief articles of their demands; which was no sooner shown to the king, than he be become into a furious passion, and asked, why the barons did not also demand of him his kingdom? swearing that he would never grant them such liberties as must reduce himself to slavery.

No sooner were the confederated nobles informed of John's reply, than they chose Robert Fitz-Walter their general, whom they called the Marshal of the army of God and of Holy Church; and they proceeded without further ceremony to levy war upon the king. They besieged the castle of Northampton during fifteen days, though without success: the gates of Bedford castle were willingly opened to them by William Beauchamp, its owner: they advanced to Ware in their way to London, where they held a correspondence with the principal citizens: they were received without opposition into that capital great city; and with the aid of their force, they issued proclamations, requiring the other barons to join them; and menacing them, in case of refusal or delay, with committing devastation on their houses and estates. In order to show what might be the consequences of a refusal, they forthwith carried incursions from London, and laid waste the king's parks and palaces; and all the barons, who had hitherto carried the semblance of supporting the royal party, were glad of the present occasion of averting from them the resentment which they had secretly favoured. The king was left at Odham in Hampshire, with a poor retinue of only seven knights, and after trying several expedients to elude the blow, after offering to refer all differences to the Pope alone, or to eight bishops, which were very powerful counsellors, and made confederates, he found himself at last obliged to submit at discretion.

A conference between the king and the Magna Charta barons was appointed at Runnymede, between Windsor and Staines; a place which has ever since been extremely celebrated, on account of this great event. The two parties encamped apart, like open enemies; and after a debate of a few days, the king, with a facility somewhat suspicious, signed and sealed the charter which was required of him. This famous deed, commonly called the Great Charter, either granted or secured very important liberties and privileges to every order of men in his kingdom; to the clergy, to the barons, and to the people.

The freedom of elections was secured to the clergy: the former charter of the king was confirmed, by which the necessary provisions were made, in consideration of their privileges which had been superseded; all check upon appeals to Rome was removed, by the allowance granted every man to depart the kingdom at pleasure: and the fees to be imposed on the clergy for any offence, were ordained to be proportioned to their lay estates, not to their ecclesiastical benefices.

The privileges granted to the barons were either abates in the reign of the feudal law, or determinations in points which had been left by that law, or had become, by practice, arbitrary and ambiguous. The privileges of peers succeeding to a military fee were ascertained; an earl's and baron's at a hundred marks, a knight's at a hundred shillings. It was ordained by the charter, that, if the heir be a minor, he shall, immediately upon his majority, enter upon his estate, without paying any relief: the king shall not sell his wardship: he shall levy only reasonable profits upon the estate, without committing waste, or hurting the property: he shall uphold the castles, houses, inns, parks, and ponds: and if he commit the guardianship of the estate to the sheriff or any other, he shall previously oblige them to find surety to the same purpose. During the minority of his heir, his lands not in wardship, and not in his own possession, whether by descent or purchase, the debt which he owes to the Jews shall bear any interest. Heirs shall be married without disbarment; and before the marriage be contract, the nearest relations of the person shall be informed of it. In this manner, the king afterwards, by the Earl of Pembroke, for some sums paid him, put a veto upon her blower, the third part of her husband's rents: she shall not be compelled to marry, so long as she chooses to continue single; she shall only give security never to marry without her lord's consent. The king shall not claim the wardship of any minor who holds lands by military tenure of a baron, on pretence that he also holds lands of the crown, by socage or any other tenure. Scutages shall be estimated at the same rate as in Henry I., and without any scutage or aid, except in the three general feudal cases, the king's captivity, the knight of his eldest son, and the marriage of his eldest daughter, shall be imposed but by the great council of the kingdom; the prelates, earls, and great barons, shall be called to this great council, each by a particular writ; the lesser barons by a general summons of the sheriff. The king shall not seize any baron's land for a debt to the crown, if the baron possessed as many as twenty knights and esquires as are sufficient to discharge the debt. No man shall be obliged to perform more service for his fee than he is bound to by his tenure. No governor or constable of a castle shall oblige any knight to pay any sum, unless he is willing to perform the service in person, or by another able-bodied man; and if the knight be in the field himself, by the king's command, lie shall be exempted from all other service of this nature. No vassal shall be allowed to sell so much of his land as to incapacitate himself from performing his service to his lord.

These were the principal articles, calculated for the interest of the barons; and had the charter contained nothing further, national happiness and liberty had been very little promoted by it, as it would only have tended to increase the power and independence of an order of men whose authority and wealth the king, if he might have become more heavy on the people than that of an absolute monarch. But the barons, who alone drew and imposed on the prince this memorable charter, were necessitated to add to it many other articles, of extensive and more beneficent nature: they could not expect the concurrence of the people, without comprehensing, together with their own, the interests of inferior ranks of men; and all provisions which the barons, for their own sake, were obliged to make, in order to insure the free and equitable administration of justice, tended directly to the benefit of the whole community. The following were the principal clauses of this nature.

It was ordained, that all the privileges and immunities above mentioned, granted to the barons against the king, should be extended by the barons to their inferior vassals.

The king, from the abolition of this system of owning a baron to levy aids from his vassals, except in the three feudal cases. One weight and one measure shall be established throughout the kingdom. Merchants shall be allowed to transport all business, without being exposed to any fine or penalty. The king and his ministers, the freemen shall be allowed to go out of the kingdom and return to it at pleasure: London, and all cities and burghs, shall preserve their ancient liberties, immunities, and free customs, as it is a part of their tenure. These articles shall be open to every one; and justice shall no longer be sold, refused, or delayed by them. Courts shall be regularly held every year: the inferior tribunals of justice, the courts, court, sheriff's court, and court-leet, shall meet at their appointed time and place: the sheriffs shall be incapacitated to hold pleas of the crown; and shall not put any person upon his trial, from rumour or suspicion alone, but upon the evidence of lawful witnesses. No freeman shall be compelled, for his free tenement and liberties, or outlawed, or banished, or anywise hurt or injured, unless by the legal judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land; and all who suffered otherwise, in this or in any other reign, shall be restored to their rights and possessions. Every Freeman shall be fined in proportion to his fault; and no fine shall be levied on him to his utter ruin: even a villain or rustic shall not, by any fine, be bereaved of his carts, thoughts, and implements of husbandry. This was the only article calculated for the interests of this body of men, probably at that time the most numerous in the kingdom.

It must be confessed, that the former articles of the Great Charter contain such mitigations and explanations of the feudal law as are reasonable and equitable; and that the latter involve all the chief outlines of a legal government, and provide for the equal distribution of justice and free enjoyment of property; the great objects for which political society was at first founded by men, which the people have a perpetual and unalienable right to receive, without which they are not capable of existence; and no positive institution, ought to derange them from keeping ever uppermost in their thoughts and attention. Though the provisions made by this charter might, conformably to the genius of the age, be esteemed too concise, and too bare of circumstances, to maintain the execution of its articles, in opposition to the chicanery of lawyers, supported by the violence of power; time gradually ascertained the sense of all the ambiguous expressions; and the generous barons, who first extorted this concession, still held their swords in their hands, and could turn them against those who dared, on any pretence, to depart from the original spirit and meaning of the grant. We may now, from the tenor of this charter, conjecture what those laws were which Edward, when king of England, supported, during so many generations, still desired, with such an obstinate perseverance, to have recalled and established. They were chiefly these latter articles of these men, were, by this concept, really involved within the sphere of the greatest dom : they were rendered co-ordinate with the king, or rather superior to him, in the exercise of the executive power; and as there was no circumstance of government which, either directly or indirectly, might not bear a relations could have given to in the Lords; a list of grievances, without so tion to the security or observance of the Great Charter, there could scarcely occur any incident, in which they might not lawfully interpose their authority.

John seemed to submit passively to all these regulations, however injurious to majesty: he sent writs to all the sheriffs, ordering them to constrain every one to swear obedience to the twenty-five barons; he dismissed all his foreign aenterprise, and, in his own person, undertook the defense of the realm thenceforth in a new tenor, and be more indulgent to the liberty and independence of his people. But he only assembled, till he should find a favourable opportunity of defending all his rights and dignities which he had formerly suffered from the Pope and the King of France, as they came from equals or superiors, seemed to make but small impression on him: but the sense of this perpetual and total subjection under his own rebellious vassals, sunk deep in his mind, and he was determined, at all hazards, to throw off so ignominious a slavery. He grew sullen, silent, and reserved: he shunned the society of his courtiers and nobles; he retired into the Isle of Wight, as if desirous of hiding his shame and confusion; but in this retreat he meditated the most fatal vengeance against all his enemies. He secretly sent abroad his emissaries to enlist foreign soldiers, and made overtures of alliance to Brabant, by the prospect of sharing the spoils of England, and resping the fortunes of so many opulent barons, who had incurred the guilt of rebellion by rising in arms against him. He discharged a messenger to Rome, in order to lay before the Pope the Great Charter, which he had been compelled to sign, and to complain, before that tribunal, of the violence which had been imposed upon him. Innocent, considering himself as feudal lord of the kingdom, and owner of the barons, who, though they pretended to appeal to his authority, had dared, without waiting for his consent, to impose such terms on a prince, who, by resigning to the Roman pontiff his crown and independence, had placed himself immediately under the papal protection. He issued, therefore, a bull, in which, from the plentitude of his apostolic power, and from the authority which God had committed to him, to build and destroy kingdoms, to plant and overthrow, he annulled and abrogated the whole charter, as unjust in itself, as obtained by compulsion, and as derogatory to the dignity of the apostolic see. He prohibited the barons from further submission of it: he even prohibited the king himself from paying any regard to it: he absolved him and his subjects from all oaths which they had been constrained to take to that purpose: and he pronounced a general sentence of excommunication against all who should adhere to its terms, or maintain such treasonable and inquisitorial pretensions. The king, as his foreign forces arrived on the spot, along with this bull, now ventured to take off the measure, and under sanction of the Pope's decree, recalled all the liberties which he had granted to his subjects, and which he had solemnly sworn to observe. But the spiritual weapon was found, upon trial, to carry less force with it than he had reason from his own experience to apprehend. The priorate refused to obey the Pope in publishing the sentence of excommunication against the barons; and though he was cited to Rome, that he might attend a general council there assembled, and pronounced, on account of his disobedience to the Pope, and his secret correspondence with the king's enemies; though a new and particular sentence of excommunication was pronounced by name against the principal barons; though John still found, that his nobility and people, and even his clergy, adhered to the defence of their liberties, and to their combination against him: the sword of his foreign aenterprise, which he had as yet to trust to for restoring his authority was, however, the first, mainstay of the field; and immediately laid siege to the castle of Rochester, which was obstinately defended by William de Albiney, at the head of a hundred and forty knights with their retainers, but was at last reduced by famine. John, irritated with the

Nov. 30. Captivity of William de Albiney, the best officer among the contrary barons, was an irreparable loss to their cause; and not least to embarrass the progress of the royal arms. The ravenous and barbarous mercenaries, meted by a cruel and enraged prince, were let loose against the estates, tenants, manors, houses, parks of the barons, and spread devastation over the face of the kingdom. Nothing was to be seen but the flames of villages and castles reduced to ashes, the consternation and misery of the inhabitants, tortures exercised by the soldiery to make them reveal their concealed treasures, and reprisals no less barbarous committed by the barons and their partisans on the royal domains, and on the estates of such as still adhered to the crown. The King, marching through the whole extent of England, from Dover to Winchester, laid the princes who were in the vicinity of him; and considered every state, which was not his immediate property, as entirely hostile, and the object of military execution. The nobility of the North, in particular, which had been incited by promises of their liberties, and who, acting in a separate body, had expressed their discontent even at the concessions made by the Great Charter, as they could expect no mercy, fled before him with their wives and families, and purchased the friendship of Alexander the young King of Scots, by doing homage to him.

The barons, reduced to this desperate extremity, and menaced with the total loss of their lives, employed a remedy no less desperate; and making applications to the court of France, they offered to acknowledge Lewis, the eldest son of Philip, for their sovereign, on condition that he would avenge them protection from the violence of their enraged prince. Though the sense of the common rights of mankind, the only rights that are entirely inde- feasible, might have justified them in the disposition of their king; they declined insisting, before Philip, on a pretension, which is commonly so disagreeable to sovereigns, and which sounds harshly in their royal ears. They affirmed, that John was incapable of succeeding to the crown, by reason of the attainder upon him of his brother, which had been reversed, and Richard had even, by his last will, declared him his successor. They pretended, that he was already legally deposed by sentence of the peers of the kingdom, and the Pope's sentence had declared all his acts of his reign to be null and void of all authority; though that sentence could not possibly regard any thing but his transmarine dominions, which alone he held in vassalage to that crown. On more plausible grounds they affirmed, that he had already deposed himself by doing homage to the Pope, changing the nature of his sovereignty, and resigning an independent crown for a fee under a foreign power. And as Blanche of Castile, the wife of Henry, was descended from the house of Stephen, from the house of Henry II. they maintained, though many other princes stood before her in the order of succession, that they had not shaken off the royal family, in choosing her husband for their sovereign.

Philip was strongly tempted to lay hold on the rich prize which was offered to him. Thelegate menaced him with interdicts and excommunications, if he invaded the patrimony of St. Peter, or attacked a prince, who was under the immediate protection of the holy father. But Philip was assured of the obedience of his own vassals, his principles were changed with the times, and he now undervalued as much all papal censures, as he formerly pretended to observe them. His character was now in this respect with regard to the fidelity which he might expect from the English barons in their new engagements, and the danger of estranging his son and heir into the hands of men, who might, on any caprice or necessity, make the prince a dupe, by sacrificing a pledge of so much value. He therefore exacted from the barons twenty-five hostages of the most noble birth in the kingdom; and having obtained this security, he sent over first a small army to the relief of the contending forces, which arrived with Lewis himself at their head.

The first effect of the young prince's appearance in England was the desertion of John's foreign troops, who, but for the presence of the flourishing provinces in France, refused to serve again at the heir of their monarchy. The Gascons and Poitevins alone, who were still John's subjects, adhered to his cause; but they were too weak to maintain that superiority in the field which they had hitherto supported against the confederated barons. Many considerable noblemen deserted John's party, the earls of Salisbury, Arundel, Warwick, Oxford, Albany, and William Marshal, the younger; his castles fell daily into the hands of the enemy; Dover was the only place which, from the valour and fidelity of Hubert de Burgh, the governor, made resistance to the progress of Lewis: and the barons had the melancholy prospect of finally succeeding in their designs, by occupying the tyranny of their own king, by imposing on themselves and the nation a foreign yoke. But this union was of short duration between the French and English nobles: and the imprudence of Lewis, in sacrificing a preference so valuable to the former, increased that jealousy which it was so natural for the latter to entertain in their present situation. The vassalage of Melun, too, is said, of one of his counsellors, fell back at London, and finding the approaches of death, he set for some of his friends among the English barons, and warning them of their danger, revealed Lewis's secret intentions of exterminating them and their families. To this conclusion, the families of several of the barons, and many of the foreign princes, were incensed by the prospect of losing their estates and dignities on their native subjects, in whose fidelity he could more reasonably place confidence than in the story, whether true or false, was universally reported and believed; and concurring with other circumstances which rendered it credible, did great prejudice to the cause of Lewis. The earl of Salisbury, and other noblemen, deserted again to John's party; and as men easily change sides in a civil war, especially where their power is founded on an hereditary and independent authority, and is not derived from the opinion and favour of the people, the French prince had reason to dread a sudden reverse of fortune. The king was assembling a considerable army, with the intention of fighting one last battle for his crown; but passing from Lynne to Lincolnshire, his road lay along the sea-shore, which was overflowed at high water; and not choosing the proper time for his journey, he lost in the inundation all his carriages, treasure, baggage, and baggage. The affliction for this disaster, and vexation from the distracted state of his affairs, increased the sickness under which he then laboured; and though he reached the castle of Newark, he was obliged to halt there, without effect, and hisDistemper soon after put an end to his life, in the forty-ninth year of his age, and eighteenth of his reign; and freed the nation from the dangers, to which it was equally exposed by his success or by his misfortunes.

The character of this prince is nothing but a compilation of vices, equally mean and odious: ruinous to himself, and destructive to his people. Corrupt, indeed, by folly, levity, licence, and licentiousness, did, obscure, treachery, tyranny, and cruelty; all these qualities appear too evidently in the several incidents of his life, to give us room to suspect that the disagreeable picture has been exaggerated in his nobility. His folly and treachery to the ancient historians. It is hard to say whether his conduct to his father, his brother, his nephew, or his subjects, was most culpable; or whether his crimes, in these respects, were not equal. His levy exceeded in his transactions with the King of France, the Pope, and the barons. His European dominions, when they devolved to him by the death of his brother, were more extensive than have ever, since his time, been ruled by an English monarch: but by his imprudence, he so totally expelled by a foreign power, and of either ending his life miserably in prison, or seeking shelter, as a fugitive, from the pursuit of his enemies.

The prejudices against this prince were so violent, that he had been believed to have sent an embassy to the Miramont, or Emperor of Morocco, and to have offered to change his religion and become Mahometan, in order to purchase the protection of that monarch. But, though this story is told us, on plausible authority, by Matthew Paris, it is in itself utterly improbable; except that there is nothing so incredible but may be believed to proceed from the folly and weakness of John.

The monks throw great reproaches on this prince for his impetity and even effeminacy; and as an instance of it, they tell us, that, having one day caught a very fat stag, he exclaimed, How plump and well fed is this animal! and set, I dare venture, he never heard musl.* This sally of wit upon the usual corpulency of the priests, more than all his enormous crimes and iniquities, made him pass with them for an atheist.

John left two legitimate sons behind him, Henry, born on the first of October, 1207, and now nine years of age; and Richard, born on the sixth of January, 1209; and three daughters, Jane, afterwards married to Alexander King of Scots; Agnes, which was still a virgin, married to the younger son, and Isabella, married to the emperor Frederic II. All these children were born to him by Isabella of Albini, his second wife. His illegitimate children were numerous; but none of them were anywise distinguished.

It was this king who, in the ninth year of his reign, first gave by charter, to the city of London, the right of electing, annually, a mayor out of its own body, an office which was till now held for life. He gave the city also power to elect and remove its sheriffs at pleasure, and its common-councilmen annually. London-bridge was finished in this reign. The former bridge was of wood. Maud, the empress, was the first that built a stone bridge in England.

Most sciences, in proportion as they increase and improve, invent methods by which they facilitate their inquiries: and, employing general theorems, are enabled to comprehend, in a few propositions, a great number of inferences and conclusions. History also, being a collection of facts which are multiplying without end, is obliged to adopt such arts of abridgment, to retain the more material events, and to drop all the minute circumstances, which are only interesting during the time, or to the persons engaged in the transactions. This truth is no where more evident than with regard to the reign upon which we are going to enter. What mortal could have the patience to write or read a long detail of such frivolous events as those with which it is filled, or attend to a tedious narrative which would follow, through a series of fifty-six years, the caprices and weaknesses of so mean a prince as Henry I. The chief reason why protestant writers have been so anxious to suppress out the incidents of this reign is, in order to expose the rapacity, ambition, and artifices of the court of Rome; and to prove that the great dignitaries of the catholic church, while they pretended to have nothing in view but the salvation of souls, had bent all their attention to the acquisition of riches, and were restrained by no sense of justice or of honour in the pursuit of that great object. But this conclusion would readily be allowed them, though ill-founded, if not entirely an exception to a detail of interesting incidents; and follows, indeed, by an evident necessity, from the very situation in which that church was placed with regard to the rest of Europe. For, besides the ecclesiastical power, as it can always cover its operations under a cloak of sanctity, and attack men on the side where they dare not employ their reason, lies less under control than civil government; besides this general cause, I say, the Pope and his courtiers were foreigners to most of the churches which they governed; they could not possibly have any other object than to pillage the provinces for present gain; and as they lived at a distance, they would be little awed by shame or remorse, in employing every execrable expedient which was suggested to them. England being one of the most remote provinces attached to the Romish hierarchy, as well as the most prone to superstition, felt severely, during this reign, what鉴 was not felt fully the influence of these causes; and we shall often have occasion to touch cursorily upon such incidents. But we shall not attempt to comprehend every transaction transmitted to us; and, till the end of the reign, when the events become more important, we shall not always observe an exact chronological order in our narration.

The Earl of Pembroke, who, at the time the government of John's death, was Mareschal of England, was, by his office, at the head of the armies, and consequently, during a state of civil wars and convulsions, at the head of the government; and it happened fortunately for the young monarch and for the nation, that the power could not bevey intrusted into more able and more faithful hands. This nobleman, who had maintained his loyalty unshaken to John, during the lowest fortune of that monarch, determined to support the authority of the infant Henry in the difficulties of this time, and the utmost violence of his enemies. Sensible that Henry, agreeable to the prejudices of the times, would not be deemed a sovereign, till crowned and anointed by a churchman, he immediately carried the young prince to the court of Canterbury, where the ceremony of coronation was performed, in the presence of Guado, the legate, and of a few noblemen, by the Bishops of Winchester and Bath. As the concurrence of the papal authority was requisite to support the tottering throne, Henry was obliged to swear fealty to the Pope, and renewed that homage to which his father had already subjected the kingdom; and in order to enlarge the authority of Pembroke, and to give him a more regular and legal title to it, a general council of the barons was soon after summoned at Bristol, where that nobleman was chosen protector of the realm.

Settlement of the government. The Earl of Pembroke, who at the time of John's death, was Mareschal of England, being, by his office, at the head of the armies, and consequently, during a state of civil wars and convulsions, at the head of the government; and it happened fortunately for the young monarch and for the nation, that the power could not be intrusted into more able and more faithful hands. This nobleman, who had maintained his loyalty unshaken to John, during the lowest fortune of that monarch, determined to support the authority of the infant Henry in the difficulties of this time, and the utmost violence of his enemies. Sensible that Henry, agreeable to the prejudices of the times, would not be deemed a sovereign, till crowned and anointed by a churchman, he immediately carried the young prince to the court of Canterbury, where the ceremony of coronation was performed, in the presence of Guado, the legate, and of a few noblemen, by the Bishops of Winchester and Bath. As the concurrence of the papal authority was requisite to support the tottering throne, Henry was obliged to swear fealty to the Pope, and renewed that homage to which his father had already subjected the kingdom; and in order to enlarge the authority of Pembroke, and to give him a more regular and legal title to it, a general council of the barons was soon after summoned at Bristol, where that nobleman was chosen protector of the realm.

Pembroke persuaded the young men to the government of his pupil, made him grant a new charter of liberties, which, though mostly copied from the former concessions extorted from John, contains some alterations, which may be deemed remarkable. The full privilege of elections in the city, granted by the late king, was not confirmed, nor the liberty of going out of the kingdom, without the royal consent: whence we may conclude, that Pembroke and the barons, jealous of the ecclesiastical power, were desirous of bringing the king to issue a congé d'éloire and the monks and chapters, and thought it requisite to put some check to the frequent appeals to Rome. But what may chiefly surprise us in this, is, that the obligation to which John had subjected himself, and opposite, might mutually support and sustain each other.6

These considerations, enforced by the character of honour and constancy, which Pembroke had ever maintained, had a mighty influence on the barons; and most of them began secretly to negotiate with him, and many of them openly returned to their duty. The diffidence which Lewis discovered of their fidelity, forwarded this general proposition towards the king; and when the French prince refused the government of the castle of Hertford to Robert Fitz-Walter, who had been so active against the late king, and who claimed that fortress as his property, the king at length gave Pembroke command of it, and placed the trust, and that foreigners had engrossed all the confidence and affection of their new sovereign. The communication, too, denounced by the legate against all the adherents of Lewis, failed not, in the turn which men's dispositions had taken, to produce a mighty effect upon them; and they were easily persuaded to consider a cause as impious, for which they had already entertained an unaccountable averting. Though Lewis made a journey to France, and brought over succours from that kingdom, as he had found, on his return, that his party was still more weakened by the desertion of his English confederates, and that the death of John had, contrary to his expectations, given an irremovable wound to his cause. The Earls of Salisbury, Arundel, and Warrene, together with William Mareschal, eldest son of the protector, had embraced Henry's party, and every English nobleman was plainly on his guard. Pembroke was so much strengthened by these accessions, that he ventured to invest Mount- sorel; though, upon the approach of the Count of Perce with the French army, he desisted from his enterprise, and made his terms.7 The court, elated with this success, marched to Lincoln; and, being admitted into the town, he began to attack the castle, which he soon reduced to extremity. The protector summoned all his forces from every quarter, in order to relieve a place of such importance; and he appeared so much superior to the French, that they shut themselves up within the city, and resolved to act upon the defensive.8 But the garrison of the castle, having received a strong reinforcement, made a vigorous sally upon the besiegers; while the English army, by concert, assaulted them in the same instant from without, mounted the walls by escalade, and bearing down all resistance, entered the city sword in hand. Lincoln was indeed over to be pillaged; the French army was totally routed; the Count de Perce, with only two persons more, was killed; but many of the chief commanders, and about 400 of the prisoners, were released by the English.9 So little blood was shed in this important action, that one hundred witnesses declared the fate of one of the most powerful kingdoms in Europe; and such few wretched soldiers were those ancient barons, who yet were unacquainted with every thing but arms 1

Prince Lewis was informed of this fatal event while employed on the siege of Dover, which was still valiantly defended against him by Hubert de Burg. He immediately retreated to London, the centre and life of his party; and he there received intelligence of a new disaster, which put an end to all his hopes. A French fleet, bringing over a strong reinforcement, had appeared on the coast of Kent, with which were attacked by the English under the command of Philip d‘Albinay, and were routed with considerable loss. D‘Alhinay employed a stratagem against them, which is said to have contributed to the victory: having gained the wind of the French, he came down upon them with violence; and throwing in their faces a great quantity of quick lime, which he purposely carried on board, he so blinded them, that they were disabled from defending themselves.2

And as the resources of the French, the English barons hastened every where to make peace with the protector, and, by an early submission, to prevent those adherents to which they were exposed on account of their rebellion. Lewis, whose cause was now totally desperate, began to be anxious for the safety of his person, and was glad, on any honourable conditions, to make his escape from a country, where he found every thing was now become hostile to him. He concluded a peace with Pembroke, promised to evacuate the kingdom, and only stipulated, in return, an indemnity to his adherents, and a restitution of their honours and fortunes, together with the free and equal enjoyment of those liberties which had been granted to the rest of the nation. Thus General peace was happily established by the admission of the king to be founded on the most incurable hatred and jealousy, and had threatened the kingdom with the most fatal consequences.

The precautions which the King of France used in the conduct of this whole affair are remarkable. He pretended that his son had accepted of the offer from the English barons, without his advice, and contrary to his inclination: the armies sent to England were levied in Lewis's name: when that prince came over to France for aid, his father publicly refused to grant him any assistance, and would not so much as admit him to his presence: even after Henry's party acquired the ascendant, and Lewis was in danger of falling into the hands of his enemies, he was Blanche of Castile, his wife, not the king, his father, who misled armies and equipped fleets for his succour. All these artifices were employed, not to satisfy the Pope; for he had too much penetration to be imposed on: nor yet to deceive the people; for they were too gross even for that purpose; they only served for a colouring to Philip's cause; and, in public affairs, men are often better pleased, that they unintellectually should be confused with a secret, than that they should be wrapped up under a decent cover, than if it were exposed, in open day-light, to the eyes of all the world.

After the expulsion of the French, the prudence and equity of the protector's subsequent conduct contributed to cure entirely those wounds, which had been made by intestine discord. He received the rebellious barons into favour; observed strictly the terms of peace which he had granted them; restored them to their possessions; and endeavoured, by an equal behaviour, to bury all past animosities in perpetual oblivion. The clergy alone, who had adhered to Lewis, were sufferers in this revolution. As they had rebelled against their spiritual sovereign, by disregarding the interdict and excommunication, it was not in Pembroke's power to make any stipulations in their favour; and Guino, the legate, prepared to take vengeance on them for their disobedience. Many of them were deposed; many suspended; some banished; and all who were punished for their connexion with the rebellion, by paying large sums to the legate, who amassed an immense treasure by this expedient.

The Earl of Pembroke did not long survive the precipice, which had been cleanly precipitated against him by his own wisdom and valour 3 and he was succeeded in the government by Peter des Roches, Bishop of Winchester, and Hubert de Burgh, the justiciary. The councils of the latter were chiefly followed; and had he possessed equal authority in the kingdom with Pembroke, he seemed to be every way worthy of filling the place of that virtuous nobleman. But the licentious Some commented of the reign of Henry III. as the period of the two great houses of Anjou, the reins of subjection to their prince, and had obtained, by violence, an enlargement of their liberties and independence, could ill be restrained by laws under a minority; and the people, no less than the king, reduced their outrages and disorders. They retained by force the royal castles, which they had seized during the past conquests, or which had been committed to their custody by the protector; they usurped the king's demesnes 4 they oppressed the barons, and obliged them to pay theAnthropology and the伦理论文图像。 their reissue, and to live upon their hands: and they gave them protection in all their robberies and extortions.

This infamous force was more violent and illegal practices than the Earl of Albemarle; who, though he had early returned to his duty, and had been serviceable in expelling the French, augmented to the utmost the general disorders, and committed outrages in all the counties of the North. In order to reduce him to obedience Hubert seized an opportunity of getting possession of Rockingham castle, which Albemarle had garnishted with his licentious reissue. But this nobleman, instead of submitting to this secret complicity, as he was accused and out of the castle; but he inserted a remarkable clause in the writ, that those, who paid not the fifteenth, should not for the future be entitled to the benefit of those liberties. The king was so convinced, in which the crown was fallen, made it requisite for the abbot to be a member of the royal prerogatives, as well as to the security of public liberty. Hubert applied to the Pope, who had always great authority in the kingdom, and was now considered as a trusted minister, to issue an bull, declaring the king to be of full age, and entitled to exercise in person all the acts of royalty. In consequence of this declaration, the justiciary resigned into Henry's hands the two important fortresses of the Tower and Dover castle, which had been intrusted to his custody; and he required the other barons to imitate his example. They refused compliance. The Earls of Chester and Albemarle, John Constable of Chester, John de Lacy, Hugh de l'Isle, and William de Cantel, with some others, even formed a conspiracy to surprise London, and met in arms at Waltham with that intention. But finding the king prepared for defence, they desisted from their enterprise. When summoned to the court, in order to appear for the cause which they scrawled not to appear, and to confess the design. But they told the king, that they had no bad intentions against his person, but only against Hubert de Burgh, whom they had found, by justiciary, to be an instigator. They appeared too formidable to be chasht; and they were so little discouraged by the failure of their first enterprise, that they again met in arms at Leicester, in order to seize the king, who then resided at Northampton. But Henry, informed of their purpose, took care to be so well armed and attended, that the barons found it dangerous to make the attempt; and they sat down and kept Christmas in his neighbourhood. The archbishop and the prelates, finding danger of civil war, resolved, in order to preserve their church, to procure the king's reconciliation with their authority, and threatened the barons with the sentence of excommunication, if they persisted in detaining the king's castles. This menace at last prevailed; and most of the castles were surrendered; though the barons complained, that Hubert's castles were soon after restored to him, while the king still kept theirs in his own custody. There are said to have been 1115 castles at that time in England.

It must be acknowledged, that the influence of the prelates and the clergy was often of great service to the public. Though the religion of that age can merit no better name than that of superstition, it served to unite together a body of men, who, by the sects, which were forced to appear, of the former attachment of the citizens to the French interest. The populace, in the tumult, made use of the cry of war commonly employed by the French troops. The Convention, Great and Small, was called the Levies. The justiciary made inquiry into the disorder; and finding one Constantine Fitz-Arnulf to have been the ringleader, an insolent man, who justified his crime in Hubert's presence, he proceeded against him by military law, and ordered him immediately to be hanged, without trial or form of process. He also cut off the feet of some of Constantine's accomplices. This act of power was composed of as an infringement of the Great Charter. Yet the justiciary, in a parliament summoned at Oxford, (for the great councils about this time began to receive that appellation,) made no scruple to give in the king's name a renewal and confirmation of that charter. When the assembly made application to the crown for this favour, as a law in those times seemed to lose its validity if not frequently renewed, William de Bereuwre, one of the council of regency, was so bold as to say openly, that those liberties were extorted by force, and ought not to be observed; but he was reprimanded by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and was not countenanced by the king or his chief ministers. A new confirmation was demanded and granted two years after; and an aid, amounting to a fifteenth of all movables, was given by the parliament, in return for this indulgence. The king issued a new charter, as a mark of the recognition of the charter; but he inserted a remarkable clause in the writ, that those, who paid not the fifteenth, should not for the future be entitled to the benefit of those liberties. The king was so convinced, in which the crown was fallen, made it requisite for the abbot to be a member of the royal prerogatives, as well as to the security of public liberty. A new confirmation was demanded and granted two years after; and action of any moment was performed on either side. The Earl of Cornwall, after two years' stay in Guenne, returned to England.

A.D. 1227. This prince was nowise turbulent or factious in his disposition: his ruling passion was to amass money, in which he succeeded so well as to become the richest subject in Christendom: yet his attention to gain threw him sometimes into acts of violence, and thus to do injury to some persons, on private disagreement. He also professed a great contempt for the manor, which had formerly belonged to the eirdom of Cornwall, but had been granted to Waleran de Ties, before Richard had been invested with that dignity, and while the king remained in the crown. But the claim was received, and expelled the proprietor by force: Waleran complained: the king ordered his brother to do justice to the man, and restore him to his rights: the earl said, that he would not submit to these orders, till the cause should be decided against him by the judgment of his peers: Henry replied, that it was first necessary to reinstate Waleran in possession, before the cause could be heard; and he reiterated his orders to the earl. We may judge of the state of the government, when this affair had nearly produced a civil war. The Earl of Cornwall finding Henry peremptory in his commands, associated himself with the young Earl of Pembroke, who had married the king's sister, and who concerned himself in the king's requiring him to deliver up some royal castles which were in his custody. These two malcontents took into the confederacy the Earls of Chester, Warwick, Gloucester, and Hereford. Henry, disdaining to make war, was wholly disgusted on a like account. They assembled an army, which the king had not the power or courage to resist; and he was obliged to give his brother satisfaction, by grants of much greater importance than the manor which had been the first ground of the quarrel.

The character of the king, as he grew to man's estate, became every day better known; and he was found in every respect qualified for maintaining a proper sway among the turbulent barons, whom the feudal constitution subjected to his authority. Gentle, humane, and merciful even to a fault, he seems to have been steady in no other circumstance of his character; but to have received every impression from those who surrounded him, and whom he loved, for the time, with the most imprudent and most unreserved affection. Without activity or vigour, he was unfit to conduct war: without policy or art, he was ill fitted to maintain peace: his remittances, though haughty and violent, were not dreadful, while he was found to drop them with such facility; his friendships were little valued, because they were neither derived from choice, nor maintained with constancy. A proper pageant of a family in a noble house, had he been one who could have conducted all his affairs in his name and by his authority; but too feeble in those disorderly times to sway a sceptre, whose weight depended entirely on the firmness and dexterity of the land which held it.

The ablest and most virtuous minister displaced, that Henry ever possessed, was Hubert de Burgh; a man who had been steady to the crown in the most difficult and dangerous times, and who yet showed no disposition, in the height of his power, to enslave or oppress the people. The only exceptionable part of his conduct is that which is mentioned by Matthew Paris, if the fact be really so, and proceeded from Hubert's advice, namely, the recall publicly and the annulling of the charter of forests, a concession so reasonable in itself, and so passionately claimed both by the nobility and people: but it must be confessed, that this measure is so unlikely, both from the circumstances of the times and character of the minister, that there is reason to doubt of its reality, especially as it is mentioned by no other historian. Hubert, while he enjoyed his authority, had an eye to promote the interests of his family, and was bestowd with the highest honours and favours beyond any other subject. Besides acquiring the property of many castles and manors, he married the eldest sister of the King of Scots, was created Earl of Kent, and, by an unusual concession, was made chief justice of England for life; yet A.D. 1231. Henry, in a sudden caprice, threw off this faithful minister, accused him to his own detriment, and persecutions of his enemies. Among other frivolous crimes objected to him, he was accused of gaining the king's affections by enchantment, and of profaning, from the royal treasury, a gem, which had the virtue to render the wearer invulnerable, and to give complete confidence to the King of Wales. The nobility, who hated Hubert on account of his zeal in resuming the rights and possessions of the crown, no sooner saw the opportunity favourable, than they inflamed the king's animosity against him, and pushed him to seek the total ruin of his minister. Hubert took sanctuary in a church: the king ordered him to be dragged from thence: he recolllected those orders: he afterwards demanded them: he was obliged by the clergy to restore him to the sanctuary: he constrained him soon after to surrender himself prisoner, and he confined him in the castle of Devizes. Hubert made his escape, was expelled the kingdom, was again received into favour, recovered a great share of the king's confidence, but never showed any inclination to reinstate himself in power and authority.

The man who succeeded him in the see of Winchester, and in the service of the crown, was Peter, Bishop of Winchester by birth, who had been raised by the late king, and who was no less distinguished by his arbitrary principles and violent conduct than by his advancement; but whose name had been left by King John justiciary and regent of the kingdom during an expedition which that prince made into France; and his illegal administration was one chief cause of the commotion among the barons, which finally exterior from the crown the quarter of the county of Kent, and laid the foundations of the English constitution. Henry, though incapable, from his character, of pursuing the same violent maxims which had governed his father, had imbibed those principles by his mother's instructions; and the execution of Peter's advice, he invited over a great number of Pocteves, and other foreigners, who, he believed, could more safely be trusted than the English, and who seemed useful to counterbalance the great and independent power of the nobility. Every office and command was bestowed on these strangers; they exhausted the revenues of the crown, already too much impoverished; they invaded the rights of the people, and their insolence, still more provoking than their power, drew on them the hatred and envy of all orders of men in the kingdom.

The barons formed a combination against A.D. 1235. the violeous ministry, and withdrew from parliament, on pretence of the danger to which they were exposed from the machinations of the Pocteves. When again summoned to attend, they gave for answer, that the king should dismiss his foreigners, otherwise they would drive both him and them out of the kingdom, and put the crown on another head more worthy to wear it: such was the style they used to their sovereign! They at last came to parliament, but so well attended, that they seemed in a condition to prescribe laws to the king and ministry. Peter des Roches, however, had in the interval found means of sowing dissension among them, and of bringing over to his party the Earl of Cornwall, as well as the Earls of Leicester and Chester. The confederates were disconcerted in their measures: Richard, Earl Mareschal, who had succeeded to that dignity on the death of his brother William, was chased into Wales; he thence withdrew into Ireland, where he was treacherously murdered by the conviction of the Bishop of Winchester.

The estates of the more obnoxious barons were confiscated, without legal sentence or trial by their peers, and were bestowed on those who had declared against the king and ministry; Peter even carried his insolence so far as to declare publicly, that the barons of England must not pretend to put themselves on the same footing with those of France, or assume the same liberties and privileges: the monarch in the former country had a more absolute power than in the latter. It had been more justifiable for him to make war upon his subjects, when the exercise of the authority of laws, could with worse grace claim any shelter or protection from them.

When the king at any time was checked in his illegal practices, and when the authority of the Great Charter was objected to him, he was wont to reply: "Why should I observe this charter, which is neglected by all my predecessors, both prelates and nobility?" It was very reasonably said to him; "You ought, Sir, to set them the example."

So violent a ministry as that of the Bishop of Winchester could not be of long duration; but its fall proceeded at last from the influence of the church, not from the efforts of the nobles. Edmond, the prior, came to court, attended by many of the other prelates, and represented to the king the pernicious measures embraced by Peter des Roches, the discontent of his people, the ruin of his affairs; and, after requiring the dismissal of the minister and his associates, threatened him with communication in case of his refusal. Henry, who knew that an excommunication so resolutive to the sense of the people, could not fail of producing the most dangerous effects, as he himself was troubled, had the natives restored to their place in council: the prior, who was a man of prudence, and who took care to execute the laws, and observe the charter of liberties, bore the chief of the mispraisers.

But the English in vain flattered themselves that they should be long free from the dominion of foreigners. The king, having married Eleanor, daughter of the count of Provence, was sur-

But the truth is, that they were, perhaps, from the number of strangers in their country, more subject to the tyrant. Young ladies were invited over from Provence, and married to the chief noblemen in England, who were the king's wards. And as the source of Henry's bounty began to fail in his Savoyard ministry, and applied to Rome, and obtained a bull, permitting him to resume all past grants; absolv-

When objections were made to this novelty, he replied, that the king himself, by an act of parliament, might not he imitate the example? But the abuse, which the Pope made of his dispensing power, in violating the canons of general councils, in invading the privileges and customs of all particular churches, and usurping on the rights of patrons, was more likely to excite the jealousy of the people, than to reconcile them to a similar practice in their civil government. Roger de Thorkesby, one of the king's justices, was so displeased with the precedent, that he exclaimed, Aid! what times are we fallen into! Behold, the civil court is corrupted in imitation of the ecclesiastical, and the river is pouzed from that fountain.

The king's partiality and profuse bounty to his foreign relations, and to their friends and favourites, would have appeared more intolerable to the English, had anything been done meanwhile for the honour of the nation; or had Henry's enterprises in foreign countries been attended with any success or glory to himself or to the public; at least, such military talents in the kingdom as might have been, to keep his barons in awe, and have given weight and authority to his government. But though he declared war against Lewis IX. in 1242, and made an expedition into Gascony, and had wasted the rich provinces of the Count de la Marche, who promised to join him with among them those favours, which the king ought in policy to have conferred on the English nobility, by whom his government could have been supported and defended. But though he declared war against Lewis IX. in 1242, and made an expedition into Gascony, and had wasted the rich provinces of the Count de la Marche, who promised to join him with all his forces; he was unsuccessful in his attempts against that great monarch, was worsted at Taillebourg, was deserted by his allies, lost what remained to him of Poictou, and was obliged to return, with loss of honour, into England.2 The Guiseon nobility were attached to the English government; because the distance of their sovereignty allowed them to remain in a state of almost total independence; and they claimed, some time after, Henry's protection against an invasion, which the King of France made upon that territory.
Henry returned into Guenne, and was more successful in this expedition; but he thereby involved himself and his nobility in an enormous debt, which both increased their disorders and exposed him to greater danger from their enemies.3
Want of economy, and an ill-judged liberality, were Henry's great defects; and his debts, even before this expedition, had become so troublesome, that he sold all his plate and jewels in order to discharge them. When this expedition was first proposed to him, he asked, where he should find purchasers? It was replied, the citizens of London. On my word, said he, if the treasury of Augustus were brought to sale, the citizens are able to be the pur-bchasers; these clowns, who assume to themselves the name of barons, abound in every thing, while we are reduced to necessary expences. On this he set out forward and greedy in his exactions upon the citizens.4

Ecclesiastical
But the grievances, which the English People suffered from, during this reign had reason to complain of it.
said the King of France made upon that territory the Pope, at his desire, annulled it 5; and immediately appointed Richard, Chancellor of Lincoln, for Archbishop without waiting for a new election. On the death of Henry, his son found to announce the consecration of Newal, Bishop of Chichester; and though Henry was much pleased with the election, the Pope, who thought that pre-tate too much attached to the crown, assumed the power of making this election. He rejected two clergyman more, whom the monks had successively chosen; and he at last told them, that, if they would elect Edmond, treasurer of the church of Salisbury, he would confirm their choice; and his nomination was complied with.

The Pope had the prudence to appoint both times very worthy primates; but men could not forbear observing the intention of thus drawing gradually to himself the right of choice of all important dignities.
The avance, however, more than the ambition, of the see of Rome, seems to have been in this age the ground of general complaint. The papal ministers finding a vast stock of power amassed by their predecessors, were disposed of turning it to immediate profit, which they enjoyed at home, rather than of enlarging their authority in distant countries, where they never intended to reside.
Every thing was become venal in the Romish tribunals;
aimony was openly practised; no favours, and even no justice, could be obtained without a bribe, the highest bidder was sure to have the preference, without regard either to the merits of the person or of the cause; and besides the unavailing pretensions of right in the decision of controversies, the Pope openly assumed an absolute and uncontrolled authority of setting aside, by the plentitude of his apostolic power, all particular rules, and all privileges of persons, who were not, and. could not, of the use of remedying these abuses, Pope Honorius, in 1226, complaining of the poverty of his see as the source of all grievances, demanded from every cathedral two of the best parishes, and from every canonry two of the ablest nuns; moreover, the abbots were attached to the English to be set apart as a perpetual and settled revenue of the papal crown: but all men being sensible that the revenue would continue for ever, the abuses immediately return, his demand was unanimously rejected. About three years after, the Pope demanded and obtained the tenth of all ecclesiastical revenues, which he levied in a very oppressive manner; requiring payment before the clergy had drawn their rents or tithes, and sending about usurers, who advanced them the money at exorbitant interest. In the year 1210, Otto, the legate, having in vain attempted the clergy in the duties of their functions, was received with hostilities and menaces, large sums from the episcopal territory, and on his departure is said to have carried more money out of the kingdom than he left in it. This experiment was renewed four years after with success by Martin the nuncio, who brought from Rome the powers of suspending and excommunicating all clergymen that refused to comply with his demands. The King, who relied on the Pope for the support of his tottering authority, never failed to countenance those exactions.

Meanwhile, all the chief benefices of the kingdom were conferred on Italians; great numbers of that nation were sent over at one time to be provided for; non-residence and pluralities were carried to an enormous height: among these, the most important, and however the Pope, the chaplains, is computed to have held at once seven hundred ecclesiastical livings; and the abuses became so evident as to be palpable to the blind and the nescient itself. The people, enticed by the hope of rose against the Italian clergy, pillaged their bars; insulted the persons of such of them as they found in the kingdom; and when the justices made inquiry into this intrigue, the church of Rome, whose guilt was found to involve so many, and those of so high rank, that it passed unpunished. At last, when Innocent IV. in 1245, called a general council at Lyons, in order to excommunicate the Emperor Frederic, the king and nobility sent over agents to prevent the election of the papacy of the Romish Church. They represented, among many other grievances, that the benefits of the Italian clergy in England had been estimated, and were found to amount to twenty thousand pounds a year, which exceeded the annual revenue of the crown itself.7 They obtained only an evasive answer from the Pope; but as mention had been made before the council, of the feudal subjection of England to the see of Rome, the English agents, whose head was Roger Bigod Earl of Norfolk, claimed against the pretensions, and insisted, that King John had no right, without the consent of his barons, to subject the kingdom to a foreigner's service. The Pope, indeed, afraid of carrying matters too far against England, seem theretofore to have little insisted on that pretension.

This check, received at the council of Lyons, was not able to stop the court of Rome in its rapacity; Innocent exacted the revenues of all vacant benefices, the twentieth of all ecclesiastical revenues without exception; the third of such as exceeded a hundred marks a year, and the half of such as were possessed by non-residents.8 He claimed the goods of all instate clergymen; he pretended a title to inherit all money gotten by usury; he levied benefactions upon the people; and when the king, contrary to his usual practice, prohibited these exactions, he threatened to pronounce against him the same censures, which he had emitted against the Emperor Frederic.9

But the most oppressive expedient employed by the Pope, was the embarking of Henry in a project for the conquest of Naples, or Sicily on this side the Fure, as it was called: an enterprise, which threw much dishonour on the king, and involved him, during several years, in expense and care. The Romish church, taking advantage of favourable incidents, had reduced the kingdom of Sicily to the same state of feudal vassalage which she pretended to extend over England, and the more important power of the high spirit of this latter kingdom, she was not able to maintain. After the death of the Emperor, Frederic II.

the succession of Sicily devoted to Conradine, grandson of that monarch; and Mainfroy, his natural son, under pretence of governing the kingdom during the minority of the prince, had formed a scheme of establishing his own authority. Pope Innocent, who had incurred on violent war against the Emperor Frederic, and had endeavoured to dispossess him of his Italian dominions, still continued hostilities against his grandson; but being disappointed in all his schemes by the abilities and arts of Innocent and of Maufroy, he found that his own force alone was not sufficient to bring to a happy issue so great an enterprise. He pre-

Great were the surprise and indignation of the assembly; the Bishop of Worcester exclaimed, that they should be enfeoffed by the Pope to a stranger, and that the Pope could not, in plain terms, that all ecclesiastical benefices were property of the Pope, and he might dispose of them, either in whole or in part, as he saw proper. But the money was insufficient for the Pope's purpose; the conquest of Sicily was as remote as ever: the demands which came from Rome were endless: Pope Alexander became so urgent a creditor, that the Pope and the king entered into an agreement, and of resigning into the Pope's hands that crown, which it was not intended by Alexander that he or his family should ever enjoy.

The King of Sicily, by his last year's revenue, of which he valued himself on his foresight, in refusing to advance the Henry. In the king's situation, either great abilities and vigour were requisite to outrace the barons, or great caution and reserve to give them. A prince less constant; and it must be confessed, that this prince was possessed of neither of these talents. He had not prudence to choose right measures; he wanted even that constancy, which sometimes gives weight to wrong ones; he was entirely despised by the barons; and at last, they ravished on them without discretion his diminished revenue, and finding that his barons indulged their disposition towards tyranny, and observed not to their own vantage, the same rules which they had imposed on the crown, he was apt, in his administration, to neglect all the salutary articles of the Great Charter; which he remarked to be so little regarded by his nobility. This conduct had extremely lessened his authority in the kingdom; he had multiplied complaints against him; and he had frequently exposed him to affronts, and even to dangerous attempts upon his prerogative. In the year 1244, when he desired a supply from parliament, the barons, complying of the frequent breaches of the Great Charter, of the many fruitless applications which they had formerly made for the redress of this and other grievances, demanded, in return, that he should give them the nomination of the next king of England, to have you elected: my subjects, and chiefly the administration of justice was committed; and, if we may credit the historian, they had formed the plan of other limitations, as well as of associations to maintain their own interests; and he proceeded to an absolute cypher, and have held the crown in perpetual populace and dependence. The king, to satisfy them, would agree to nothing but a renewal of the charter, and a general permission to communicate all the violators of it: and he received no supply, except a scatage of twenty shillings on each knight's fee for the marriage of his eldest daughter to the King of Scotland; a burden which was expressly annexed to their feudal tenures.

In Henry's own declaration, when Henry demanded a new supply, he was openly reproached with a breach of his word, and the frequent violations of the charter. He was asked, whether he did not blush to desire any aid from his people, whom he professedly hated and despised, to whom on all occasions he preferred aliens and foreigners, and who groaned under the oppressions which he either permitted or exercised over them. He was told that, besides exposing his nobility by forcing them to contract unequal and mean marriages with strangers, no rank of men was so low as to escape vexations from him or his ministers; that even the victuals consumed in his household, the clothes which himself and his servants wore, were marked by which they used to supply their exorbitant expenses, and that the commerce with all nations was thus cut off by these acts of violence; that loss was added to less, and injury to injury, while the merchants, who had been despoiled of their goods, were also obliged to carry them at their own charge to whatever place the king was pleased to appoint them; that even the poor fishermen on the coast could not escape his oppressions and those of his counsellors. And though they had not full liberty to dispose of their commodities in the English market, were frequently constrained to carry them to foreign ports, and to hazard all the perils of the ocean, rather than those which awaited them from his oppressive emissaries; and that his very religion was a ground of complaint to his subjects, while they observed, that the waxen tapers and splendid silk, employed in so many useless processions, were the spoils which he had forcibly ravished from the true worshippers. And finding, in these complaints, derived from an abuse of the ancient right of purveyance, may be supposed to be somewhat exaggerated, there appears a strange mixture of real tyranny in the practices which gave rise to it, and of aristocratical liberty, or rather licentiousness, in the expressions employed by the parliament. But a mixture of this kind is observable in all the ancient constitutions; and both of them proved equally hurtful to the people.

As the king, in answer to their remonstrance, gave the parliament only good words and fair promises, attended with some humble submissions, which they had often found decent, to the barons, it appears, that in the year 1253, when he found himself again under the necessity of applying to parliament, he had provided a new petition, which he deemed ineligible, and making the voice of the barons his appeasement in that pious enterprise. The parliament, however, for some time hesitated to comply; and the ecclesiastical order sent a deputation, consisting of four prelates, the prince, and the bishop of Winchester, Salisbury, and Carlisle, in order to remonstrate with him on his frequent violations of their privileges, the oppressions with which he had loaded them and all his subjects, and the unnatural and forced elections which were made to vacant dignities. "It is true," replied the king, "I have been somewhat faulty in this particular: I offended you, my lord of Canterbury, upon your see: I was obliged to employ both entreaties and menaces, my lord of Winchester, was elected: my proceedings, I confess, were irregular, my lords of Salisbury and Carlisle, when I raised you from the lowest stations to your present dignities: I am determined henceforth to correct these defects, and I also beseech you, as a great people, to make a thorough reformation, to resign your present benefits; and to try to enter again in a more regular and canonical manner." The bishops, surprised at these unexpected sorceries, replied, that the question was not at present how to correct past errors, but to avoid them for the future. The king promised redress both of ecclesiastical and civil grievances; and the parliament in return agreed to grant him a supply, a tenth of the ecclesiastical benefits, and a scatage of three pence on each knight's fee: but as they had experienced his frequent breach of promise, they required, that he should ratify the Great Charter in a manner still more authentic and more solemn than any which he had hitherto employed. All the prelates and abbots were assembled: they held burning tapers in their hands: the Great Charter was read before them: they denounced the sentence of excommunication against every one who should henceforth violate that fundamental law: they threw their tapers on the ground, and exclaimed, *May the soul of every one, who incurs this sentence, to stock and corrupt in hell!" The king bore a part in this ceremony; and even So be it, he said. He gave all these articles of his volant, as I am a man, as I am a Christian, as I am a Knight, and as I am a King crowned and anointed." Yet was the tremendous ceremony no sooner finished, than his favourites, abusing his weakness, made him return to the same habits, and entrusted the administration both of the twenty-eight opressions, and even of the Evangelical administration; and the reasonable expectations of his people were thus perpetually eluded and disappointed.

All these imprudent and illegal measures afforded a pretext to Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, to attempt an innovation of parliament, in the government, and to wrest the sceptre from the feehle and irresolute hand which held it. This nobleman was a younger son of that Simon de Montfort, who had conducted, with such valour and renown, the crusade against the Albigensians, and who, though he tarnished his famous exploits by cruelty and ambition, had left a name very precious to all the bigotry of that age, particularly to the ecclesiastics. A large inheritance in England fell by succession to this family; but as the elder brother enjoyed still more opulent possessions in France, and could not perform fealty to two masters, he transferred his right to Simon, his younger brother, who came over to England, did homage for his lands, and was raised to the dignity of Earl of Leicester. In the year 1238, he espoused Eleanor, dowager of William Earl of Pembroke, and sister to the king; but the marriage of this princess with a subject and a foreigner, though contracted with Henry's consent, was loudly complained of by the Earl of Cornwall and all the barons of England; and Leicester was supported against their violence, by the king's favour and authority alone. But he had no sooner established himself in his possessions and dignities, than he acquired, by interruption and address, a strong interest with the nation, and by his acts of mercy and the affability of all classes of men. Yet, however, the friendship of Henry from the usual levity and fickleness of that prince; he was banished from court; he was recalled; he was intrusted with the command of Guisnes; he did good service, and obtained honours; he was again disgraced by the king, and his banishment from court seemed now final and irrevocable. Henry called him traitor to his face; Leicester gave him the lie, and told him, that, if he were not his sovereign, he would soon make him repent of that insult. Yet was this quarrel accommodated, either from the good nature or timidity of the king; and Leicester was again admitted into some degree of favour and authority. But as this nobleman was become too great to preserve an entire complaisance to Henry's humours, and to act in subserviency to his other minions; he found more advantage in cultivating his interest with the public, and in inflaming the general discontent which prevailed against the administration. He filled every place with complaints against the infringement of the Great Charter, the acts of violence committed on the people, the combination between the Pope and the king to ruin his subjects, and his neglect to ender his native subjects and barons; and though himself a foreigner, he was more loud than many in representing the indignity of submitting to the dominion of foreigners. By his hypocritical pretensions to devotion, he gained the favour of the church and clergy; for public good, he acquired the affections of the public; and besides the private friendships which he had cultivated with the barons, his animosity against the favourites created a union of interests between him and that powerful order.

A recent quarrel, which broke out between Leicester and William de Valence, Henry's half-brother, and chief favourite, brought matters to extremity; and determined the former to give full scope to his bold and unbounded ambition, which the laws and the king's authority had hitherto with difficulty restrained. He secretly called a meeting of the most considerable barons, particularly Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, and the Earls of Warwick and Gloucester; men who by their family and possessions stood in the first rank of the English nobility. He represented to them the necessity of putting the execution of the laws into other hands than those which had hitherto appeared, from repeated experience, so unfit for the charge with which they were intrusted. He suggested the convention against the lower orders of the state, the violations of the barons' privileges, the continued deprivations made on the clergy; and in order to aggravate the enormity of this conduct, he appealed to the Great Charter, which Henry had so often ratified, and which was calculated to prevent for ever the return of those intolerable grievances. He magnified the generosity of their ancestors, who, at a great expense of blood, had extorted that famous concession from the crown; but lavished their own degeneracy, who allowed so important an advantage, once obtained, to be wrested from them by a weak prince and by insolent strangers. And he insisted, that the king's word, after so many admissions and fruitless promises on his part, could no longer be relied on; and that nothing but his absolute inability to violate national privileges could henceforth secure the regular observance of those.

These topics, which were founded in truth, and suited so well the sentiments of the company, had the desired effect; and the barons embraced a resolution of redressing these injuries, by taking into their own hands the administration of government. Henry having summoned a parliament, in expectation of receiving supplies for his Sicilian project, the barons appeared in the hall, clad in complete armour, and with their swords by their side: the king on his erected, struck the unusual appearance, and asked them what was their purpose, and whether they pretended to make him their prisoner; Roger Bigod replied in the name of the rest, that he was not their prisoner, but their king; and that they even intended to grant him large supplies, in order to fix his son on the throne of Sicily; that they only expected some return for this expense and service; and that, as he had frequently made the most absurd promises, his parliament had acknowledged his past errors, and had still allowed himself to be carried into the same path, which gave them such just reason of complaint, he must now yield to more strict regulations, and confer authority on those who were able and willing to redress the national grievances. Henry was thereby allured by the hopes of supply, partly intimidated by the union and mutual appearance of the barons, agreed to their demand, and promised to summon another parliament at Oxford, in order to digest the new plan of government, and to elect the persons who were to be intrusted with the chief authority.

This parliament, which the reigns, and was even the problem, from experience of the preceding session, at Oxford. The fusions that attended its measures, afterwards denominated the mad parliament, met on the day appointed; and as all the barons brought along with them their ministers, and their royal privateers, Henry would not, the king, who had taken no precautions against them, was in reality a prisoner in their hands, and was obliged to submit to all the terms they were pleased to impose upon him. Twelve barons were selected from among those who were sitting in the preceding parliament; to these twenty-four, unlimited authority was granted to reform the state; and the king himself took an oath, that he would maintain whatever ordinances they should make, and that the law was the proper source. Leicester was at the head of this supreme council, to which the legislative power was thus in reality transferred; and all their measures were taken by his secret influence and direction. Their first step bore a spectacular appearance and seemed well calculated for the end which they proffered to be the object of all these innovations; they ordered that four knights should be chosen by each county; that they should make inquiry into the grievances of which their neighbourhood had reason to complain, and should attend the ensuing parliament, in order to give information to that assembly of the state of their particular counties; a nearer approach to our present constitution than ever belonged to the nation of King John, when the knights were only appointed to meet in their several counties, and there to draw up a detail of their grievances. Meanwhile the twenty-four barons proceeded to carry some regulations, as a redress of such grievances as were supposed to be sufficiently notorious. They ordered, that three sessions of parliament should be regularly held every year, in the months of February, June, and October; that a new sheriff should be annually elected by the votes of the freeholders in each county; that the sheriffs should have no power of fining the barons who did not attend their courts, or the circuits of the justices; that no body should be convicted of the worship of foreigners, and no castles intrusted to their custody; and that no new warrens or forests should be created, nor the revenues of any counties or hundreds be let to farm. Such were the regulations which the twenty-four barons established at Oxford, for the redress of public grievances. But the Earl of Leicester and his associates, having advanced so far to satisfy the nation, instead of continuing in this popular course, or proceeding on the supply which they had promised him, immediately provided for the extension and continuance of their own authority. They roused anew the popular clamour, which had long prevailed against the king's half-brothers, with the ýsult to their own hands into the administration of government. Henry having summoned to be the authors of all national grievances, and whom Henry had no longer any power to protect. The four brothers, sensible of their danger, took to flight, with an intention of making their escape out of the kingdom; they were eagerly pursued by the barons; Aymer, one of the brothers, who had been elected to the see of Winchester, took shelter in his episcopal palace, and carried the war against his brother into that place, and threatened to be dragged out by force, and to be punished for their crimes and misdemeanours; and the king, pleading the sacredness of an ecclesiastical sanction, was anxious to extricate them from this danger by banishing them the kingdom. In this act of violence, as well as in the former usurpations of the barons, the queen and her uncles were thought to have secretly concurred; being jealous of the credit acquired by the brothers, which, they found, had eclipsed and annihilated their own.

But the subsequent proceedings of the barons.

twenty-four were sufficient to open the eyes of the nation, and to prove their intention of reducing, for ever, both the king and the people under the arbitrary power of a very narrow anarchy, which must at last have terminated either in anarchy, or in a violent usurpation and tyranny. They pretended that they had not acted without directions, and the king had expressly required the reformation of the state and for the redress of grievances; and they must still retain their power, till that great purpose were thoroughly effecte... and greater independence on the civil power, was therefore less acceptable to the court of Rome. About the same time that the barons at Oxford had instigated the new complaints of the monarchy, the clergy met in a synod at Merton, and passed several ordinances, which were not calculated to promote their own grandeur at the expense of the temporal power of the prince. They attempted to try ecclesiastics by secular judges; that the clergy were not to regard any prohibitions from civil courts; that lay patrons had no right to confer spiritual benefices; that the magistrature was obliged, without further inquiry, to imprison all excommunicated persons; that the king's father, or any other person, without any particular grant or charter, was a sufficient authority for any clerical possessions or privileges.

About a century before, these claims would have been supported by the court of Rome beyond the most fundamental articles of faith: they were the chief points maintained by the great martyr, Becket; and his resolution in defending them had exalted him to the high station which he held in the catalogue of Illustrious saints. But principles were changed with the times: the Pope became somewhat jealous of the great independence of the English clergy, which made them stand less in need of his protection, and even emboldened them to repel his authority, and to complain of the preference given to the Latin church, whose interests, it is natural to imagine, were the chief object of his concern. The Pope was, therefore, on the king's application, to annul these new constitutions of the church of England, and on the king's assurance that he had absolved the king, and all his subjects, from the oath which they had taken to observe the provisions of Oxford.

Prince Edward, whose liberal mind, though in such early youth, had taught him the great prejudice which his father had incurred, by his levity, insubordination, and frequent breach of promise, refused for a long time to take advantage of this absolution; and declared, that the provisions of Oxford, however unreasonable in themselves, and however the barons, ought still to be adhered to by those who had sworn to observe them: he himself had been constrained by violence to take that oath; yet was determined to keep it. By this scrupulous fidelity, the prince acquired the confidence of all parties, and was afterwards enabled to recover fully the royal authority, and to perform such great actions, both during his own reign and that of his father.

But the situation of Henry soon after wore A.D. 1297. a more favourable aspect. The twenty-four barons had now enjoyed the sovereign power near three years, and having completely established it, for the aggrandizement of themselves and of their families. The breach of trust was apparent to the whole world: every order of men felt it, and murmured against it: the dissensions among the barons themselves, which increased the evil, made also the remedy more obvious and easy; and the secret desertion, in particular, of the Earl of Gloucester to the crown, seemed to promise Henry certain success in any attempt to resume his authority. Yet doubt must be taken that step, so reconcilable both to justice and policy, without making a previous application to Rome, and desiring an absolution from his oaths and engagements.

The Pope's absolution from his oath, accompanied with menaces of excommunication against all opponents, trusting to the countenance of the church, to the support and the aid of the military retainers placed at his disposal, to the returning favour of the people, immediately took off the mask. After justifying his conduct by a proclamation, in which he set forth the private interest, and the breach of trust, conspicuous in Leicester and his associates, he declared that he had renounced the government, and was determined thenceforth to exert the royal authority for the protection of his subjects. He removed Hugh Le Despenser and Nicholas de Ely, the justiciary and chancellor appointed by the barons; and put Philip Basset and Walter de Merton in their place. He substituted new sheriffs in all the counties, men of character and honour: he placed new governors in the strongholds of the realm; and put Philip Basset and Walter de Merton in their place. He substituted new sheriffs in all the counties, men of character and honour: he placed new governors in the strongholds of the realm; and put Philip Basset and Walter de Merton in their place.

On the 23d April, he met in council, and then, professing the constable, the Chancellor, with the Great Seal in his hand, gave him a sealed letter, in which he bade him understand that the King was come to their assistance, and that he was to take care of himself; and he further commanded him that he should undertake nothing without the King's consent and authority.

The King, after the death of the justiciary, returned to the castle of Winchester, and there resided, as he always did, in that city, and caused the town to be fortified, to prevent all attempts of his subjects against his person and kingdom. He was now placed upon the throne of England, with all the power and authority of that kingdom, and was the master of all the officers of the household; he summoned a parliament, in which the resumption of his authority was ratified, with only five dissenting voices: and the barons, after making every possible effort to take the king by surprise at Winchester, were obliged to acquiesce in those new regulations.

The king, in order to cut off every objection to his conduct, offered to refer all the differences between him and the Earl of Leicester, to Margaret, Queen of Scots. The celebrated integrity of Lewis gave a mighty influence to any decision which issued from his court; and Henry, probably hoped, that the gallantry, on which all barons, as true knights, valued themselves, would make them ashamed to not submit to the award of that monarch. Lewis met the confidence reposed in him. By an admirable conduct, probably as political as just, he continually intercepted the projects and operations of both Mortimer and the barons of the English: he forwarded all healing measures, which might give security to both parties: and he still endeavoured, though in vain, to soothe, by persuasion, the fierce ambition of Henry, Earl of Leicester, and to convince him how much it was his duty to submit peaceably to the authority of his sovereign.

That bold and artful conspirator was now wisely discouraged by the bad success of his past enterprises. He endeavoured, however, secretly from his prison in the castle of Gloucester, who was his chief rival in power, and who, before his decease, had joined the royal party, seemed to open a new field to his violence, and to expose the throne to fresh attempts. He endeavoured, and formed designs designed to make forward all healing measures, which might give security to both parties: and he still endeavoured, though in vain, to soothe, by persuasion, the fierce ambition of Henry, Earl of Leicester, and to convince him how much it was his duty to submit peaceably to the authority of his sovereign.

The prince of Wales, notwithstanding the great power of the monarchs, both of the Saxen and Norman line, still preserved authority in their own country. Though they had often been constrained to pay tribute to the crown of England, they were with difficulty retained in subordination, or even in peace: and almost through every reign since the Conquest, they had infested the English frontiers with such incursions and sudden irreconcilable, as seldom merit to have place in a general history. The English, still content with repelling their invasions, and chasing them back into their mountains, had never pursued the advantages obtained over them, nor been able, even under their greatest and most active princes, to fix a total, or so much as a feudal, sujection on the country. This advantage was reserved to the present king, the weakest of his house, and the most incapable of giving the Prince of Wales, declining in years and broken with infirmities, but still more harassed with the rebellion and undutiful behaviour of his youngest son, Griffin, had refused to prevent the attempts, and had brought to a conclusion the war. He had taken the prince, and all his adherents, to his own house, and had ordered them to be kept subject his principality, which had so long maintained, or soon recovered, its independence, to vassalage under the crown of England, had purchased security and tranquility on these dishonourable terms. His eldest son and heir, David, renewed the homage to England; and having taken his brother prisoner, delivered him into Henry's hands, who committed him to custody in the Tower. That prince, endeavouring to make his escape, lost his life in the attempt; and the Prince of Wales, freed from the apprehensions of so dangerous a rival, gave more regard to the English monarch, and even renewed those incursions, by which the Welch, during so many ages, had been accustomed to infest the English borders. Lewelyn, however, the son of Griffin, who succeeded to his uncle, had been forced to renew the homage he had so long declared to the English crown, as an established right; but he was well pleased to inflame those civil discord, on which he rested his present security, and founded his hopes of future independence. He entered into a confederacy with the Earl of Leicester, and collecting all the force of his principality, invaded England with an army of 30,000 men. He ravaged the lands of Roger de Mortimer, and of all the barons who adhered to the crown? he marched into Cheshire, and committed like depredations on Prince Edward's territories; every place, where his disorderly troops appeared, was laid waste with fire and sword; and the barons, by mutual consent, made such resistance, it was found necessary that the prince himself should head the army against this invader. Edward repulsed Prince Lewelwyn, and obliged him to take shelter in the mountains of North Wales: but he was prevented from making further progress against the Welshmen by the disorders which soon after broke out in England. The Welch invasion was the appointed signal for the malcontent barons to rise in arms, and Leicester, coming with a considerable force, collected at the castle of Gloucester, and commenced an open rebellion. He seized the person of the Bishop of Hereford; a prelate obnoxious to all the inferior clergy, on account of his devoted attachment to the crown. He imprisoned Simon, Bishop of Ely, and John Mansel, because they had published the Pope's bull, absolving the king and kingdom from their oaths to observe the provisions of Oxford, were made prisoners, and exposed to the rage of the mob. The king's chief messengers were ravaged with unbounded fury; and as it was Leicester's interest to allure to his side, by the hopes of plunder, all the disorderly ruffians in England, he gave them a general licence to pillage the barons of the opposite party, and even all neutral persons. But one of the principal resources of his faction was the populace of the cities, particularly of London; and as he had, by his hypocritical pretensions to sanctity, and his zeal against the Romans, gained the banks and lower orders of the town as to his dominion over the inferior ranks of men became uncontrollable. Thomas Fitz-Richard, Mayor of London, a furious and licentious man, gave the countenance of the town to the proceedings of the violent party, which declared war against the substantial citizens, he loosen all the bands of government, by which that turbulent city was commonly but ill restrained. On the approach of Easter, the zeal of superstition, the appetite for plunder, or what is often as prevalent with the populace, as either of these motives, the pleasure of committing havoc and destruction, prompted them to attack the unhappy Jews, who were first pillaged without resistance, then massacred to the number of five hundred persons. The London bankers were next exposed to the rage of the people; and though, by taking sanctuary in the churches, they escaped with their lives, all their money and goods became a prey to the licentious multitude. Even the houses of the rich citizens, though English, were attacked by night; and was made by sword and fire to the pillage of their goods, and often to the destruction of their persons. The adherence, which so often dis-

The remonstrance and fury of Leicester's faction had risen to such a height in all parts of England, that the king, unable to resist their power, was obliged to set on foot a treaty of peace; and to make an accommodation with the barons and the city of London. The king secured Hugh le Despenser to the office of chief justiciary; they appointed their own creatures sheriffs in every county of England; they took possession of all the royal castles and fortresses; they even named in the place of the bishops and abbots; and they summoned a parliament to meet at Westminster, in order to settle more fully their plan of government. They here produced a new list of twenty-four barons, to whom they proposed that the administration of the kingdom should be committed to them, and that they should be assisted by a council chosen by themselves into which the king had not a voice; and they insisted that the authority of this junto should continue, not only during the reign of the king, but also during that of Prince Edward.

On this occasion, as at all others, the council of the royal party, had unhappily, before the king's accommodation with the barons, been taken prisoner by Leicester in a parley at Windsor; and that misfortune, more than any other incident, strengthened the barons and confirmed the unanimous resolutions imposed upon him. But Edward, having recovered his liberty by the treaty, employed his activity in defending the prerogatives of his family; and he gained a great degree of authority thereon, when he adhered to the cause of the barons. His cousin Henry d'Almaine, Roger Bigod, Earl Marshal, Earl Warrenne, Humphrey Bolun, Earl of Hereford, John Lord Basset, Ralph Basset, the Constable, Roger Percy, Robert de Brus, Roger de Leybourne, with almost all the Lords Marchers, as they were called, on the borders of Wales and of Scotland, the most warlike parts of the kingdom, declared in favour of the barons, and their acquiescence, which were scarcely well composed, were again renewed in every part of England. But the near neighbour of the parties, joined to the universal clamour of the people, obliged the king and barons to open anew the negotiations of peace; and it was agreed, by both sides, to submit their differences to the arbitration of the King of France.

Reference to the Treaty of Troyes. This virtuous prince, the only man who, in like circumstances, could safely have been intrusted with the business of authorizing the barons, had never ceased to interpose his good offices between the English factions; and had even, during the short interval of peace, invited over to Paris both the king and the Earl of Leicester, to accommodate the differences between them; but found, that the fears and animosities on both sides, as well as the ambition of Leicester, were so violent, as to render all his endeavours ineffectual. But when this solemn appeal, ratified by the oaths and subscriptions of the leaders in both factions, was made to his judgment, he was not discouraged from pursuing his honourable purpose; he summoned the states of France at Amiens; and there, in the presence of that assembly, as well as in that of the King of England, and Peter de Montfort, Leicester's son, he brought this great cause to a trial and examination. It appeared to him, that the privileges of Oxford, even had they not been extended by force, had they not been so exorbitant in their nature, and subservient of the ancient constitution, were expressly established as a temporary expedient, and could not without breach of trust, be rendered perpetual by the barons. He declared, that he was bound both by law and conscience to re-settle the king the possession of his castles, and the power of nomination to the great offices; allowed him to retain what foregoers he pleased in his kingdom, and even to confer on them places of trust and dignity; and in a word, re-established the royal power in the same con-
the principal citizens, who were all secretly inclined to the royal cause. Reinforced by a great body of Londoners, and having summoned his partisans from all quarters, he thought himself strong enough to hazard a general battle with the royalists, and to determine the fate of the nation in one great engagement; which, if it proved successful, must be decisive against the king, who had no retreat for his broken troops in those parts; while Leicester himself, in case of a reverse, and to save himself, might seek shelter in the city. To give the better colouring to his cause, he previously sent a message with conditions of peace to Henry, submissive in the language, but exorbitant in the demands; and when the messenger returned with the letter and defiance from the court of Rome, the king, favoured by the Romans, he sent a new message, renouncing, in the name of himself and of the associated barons, all fealty and allegiance to Henry. He then marched out of the city, with his army, divided into four bodies: the first commanded by two of his sons, Henry and Guy de Montfort, together with Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, who had deserted to the barons; the second led by the Earl of Gloucester, with William de Montacute and John deJoin; the third, composed of Londoners, under the command of Nicholas de Segrave; the fourth headed by himself in person. The Bishop of Chichester gave a general absolution to the army accompanying with assurances, that any of them fell in the ensuing action, they should infalli-ably be received into heaven, as the reward of their suffering in so meritorious a cause.

Battle of Lewes. Leicester, who possessed great talents for conduct, commuted this march with such skill and secrecy, that he had well nigh surprised the royalists in their quarters at Lewes in Sussex: but the vigilance and activity of Prince Edward soon repaired this negligence; and he led out the king's army to the field in three bodies. He himself conducted the van, attended by Earl Warrenne and William de Valence: the main body was commanded by the King of the Romans and his son Huntingdon, who was at the head of his principal nobility. Prince Edward rushed upon the Londoners, who had demanded the post of honour in leading the rebel army, but who, from their ignorance of discipline and want of experience, were ill fitted to resist the genius and military men, of whom the prince's body was composed. They were broken in an instant; were chased off the field; and Edward, trans- planted by his martial ardour, and eager to revenge the indignities and injuries offered to his father, and thrown to the sword for the length of four miles, without giving them any quarter, and without reflecting on the fate which in the mean time attended the rest of the army. The Earl of Warwick, with great dexterity, excited their eagerness in the pursuit, led on his remaining troops against the bodies commanded by the two royal brothers: he defeated, with great slaughter, the forces headed by the King of the Romans, and that prince was obliged to yield himself prisoner to the Earl of Gloucester: he penetrated to the body where the king himself was placed, threw it into disorder, pursued his advantage, chased it into the town of Lewes, and obliged Henry to surrender himself prisoner.1

Prince Edward, returning to the field of battle from his precipitate pursuit of the Londoners, was astonished to find it covered with the dead bodies of his friends, and still more to hear, that his father and uncle were defeated and taken against his mother.2 He took these prisoners, Hamond L'Catrane, Roger L'yeborne, and many considerable barons of his party, were in the hands of the victorious army. Earl Warrenne, Hugh Bigod, and W. de Join, his brother, were killed in the present disaster; and when the victory was acquired, they immediately took to flight, hurried to Pevseyne, and made their escape beyond sea:3 but the prince, intrepid amidst the greatest disasters, exhorted his troops to revenge the defeats of their friends, to take the Earl of Arundel, and snatch an easy conquest from an enemy disordered by their own victory.4 He found his followers intimidated by their situation; while Leicester, afraid of a sudden and

In answer to the complaints which arose on this occasion, Leicester replied, that the kingdom could well enough subsist within itself, and needed no intercourse with foreigners. And it was found that he even combined with the pretenses of the cinque ports, and received as his share the third of their rents.¹

No further mention was made of the reference in the King of France, so essential an article in the agreement of Lewes; and Leicester summoned a parliament, composed altogether of his own subjects, by which authority, that power which he had acquired by so much violence, and which he used with so much tyranny and injustice. An ordinance was there passed, to which the king's consent had been previously extorted, and which he did not resist. It was enacted, that every quarter of the royal power should be exercised by a council of nine persons, who were to be chosen and removed by the majority of three, Leicester himself, the Earl of Gloucester, and the Bishop of Chichester.² By this intricate plan of government, the sceptre was really put into Leicester's hands; as he had the entire direction of the Bishop of Chichester, and thereby commanded all the resolutions of the council of three, who could appoint or rescind at pleasure every member of the supreme council.

But it was impossible that things could long remain in this strange situation. It behoved Leicester either to desert the war into the hands of a sovereign, or to make a stand up to his energy, and his ambition, unrestrained either by fear or by principle, gave too much reason to suspect him of the latter intention. Moreover, his deletions exposed to many an injury, and he felt that the smallest incident was capable of overturning that immense and ill-cemented fabric which he had reared. The queen, whom her husband had left abroad, had collected in foreign parts an army of desperate adventurers, and had assembled a great number of ships, with a view of invading the kingdom, and of bringing relief to her unfortunate family. Lewis, detecting Leicester's usurpations and pretensions, and disgusted at the English barons, who had collected in foreign parts an army of desperate adventurers, and who were all her enterprises, and was generally believed to be making preparations for the same purpose. An English army, by the pretended authority of the captive king, was assembled on the same coast, to oppose this projected invasion; but Leicester owed his safety more to cross winds, which long detained and at last dispersed and ruined the queen's fleet, than to any resistance which, in their present situation, could have been expected from the English or dissent at pleasure every member of the supreme council.

Leicester found himself better able to resist the spiritual thunders which were levelled against him. The Pope, still adhering to the king's cause against the barons, despised his refusal to accept Guido as his legate, and ordered him to order orders to communicate by name, the three ears, Leicester, Gloucester, and Norfolk, and all others in general, who concurred in the oppression and captivity of their sovereign, and deposed the legate of England, who was at a foot within the kingdom; but Guido, meeting in France the Bishops of Winchester, London, and Worcester, who had been sent thither on a negociation, commanded them, under the penalty of ecclesiastical censures, to carry his bull into England, and to publish it against the barons. When the prelates arrived off the coast, they were boarded by the piratical mariners of the Cinque Ports, to whom probably they gave a hint of danger which they brought along with them: the bull was torn and thrown into the sea, which furnished the affable prelates with a plausible excuse for not obeying the orders of the legate. Leicester appealed from Guido to the Pope in person; but before the ambassador appointed to defend his cause could reach Rome, the Pope was dead; and they found the legate himself, from whom they had appealed, seated on the papal throne, by the name of Urban IV. That daring leader was not a little deterred from this incurred task, and as he found that a great part of his popularity in England was founded on his opposition to the court of Rome, which was now become odious, he persisted with the more obstinacy in the prosecution of his measures.

² From T. Wakley, p. 701, 708. There are two conflicts: 1) the reference to the French king in the treaty of Lewes, and 2) the formation of a parliament by Leicester.}

That he might both increase and turn to advantage his popularity, Leicester summoned a new parliament in London, where he knew his power was uncontrollable; and he fixed this assembly on a more democritical basis, than any which had ever been summoned since the foundation of the monarchy. Besides the barons of his own party, and several ecclesiastics, who were not immediate tenants of the crown, he ordered returns to be made of two knights from each county, and what is more remarkable, of deputies from the boroughs, an order of men, which, in former ages, had always been regarded as too mean to enjoy a place in the national councils. This period is commonly esteemed the epoch of the House of Commons in England; but it is certainly the first time that historians speak of any representatives sent to parliament by the boroughs. In all the general accounts given in preceding times of these assemblies, the prelates and barons only are mentioned as the constituent members; and even in the most particular narratives delivered of parliamentary transactions, as in the trial of Thomas a Becket, where the events of each day, and almost of each hour, are carefully described or discussed, there is not, throughout the whole, the least appearance of a House of Commons. But though that House derived its existence from so precarious, and even so small a foundation, it was soon proved, when summoned by the legal princes, one of the most useful, and, in process of time, one of the most powerful, members of the national constitution; and gradually increased in authority, till it gained the upper hand from royal tyranny. But Leicester's policy, if we must ascribe to him so great a blessing, only forwarded by some years an institution, for which the general state of things had already prepared the nation; and it is otherwise inconceivable, that a plant set by so auspicious a hand, could have attained to so vigorous a growth, and have flourished in the midst of such tempests and convulsions. The feudal system, with which the liberty, much more the monarchy, of England was connected, was gradually to decline; and both the king and the commonality, who felt its inconvenience, contributed to favour this new power, which was more subservient than the barons to the regular authority of the crown, and at the same time afforded protection to the inferior orders of the state. Leicester, having thus assembled a parliament of his own model, and trusting to the attachment of the populace of London, seized the opportunity of crushing his rivals amongst the powerful barons. Robert de Ferrars, Earl of Derby, was accused in the king's name, seized and committed to custody, without being brought to any legal trial. John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, was summoned to London, and took shelter in the borders of Wales. Even the Earl of Gloucester, whose power and influence had so much contributed to the success of the barons, but who of late had ceased to be attached to his father-in-law, was found, with suspicion of his ancient confederacy; and he retired from parliament. This known dissension gave courage to all Leicester's enemies, and to the king's friends, who were now sure of protection from so potent a leader. Though Roger Mortimer, Hamond L'Estrange, and other powerful marchers of Wales, had been obliged to leave the kingdom, their authority still remained over the territories subjected to their jurisdiction, and there were totally inconsiderable measures disposed to give disturbance to the new government. The amnesties, inseparable from the feudal aristocracy, broke out with fresh violence, and threatened the kingdom with a new commotion, a disorder which Leicester, by his conduct, found himself in danger from the prevailing authority of his ancient confederacy; and he retired from parliament.
difficultly oppose the contumacious wishes of the nation, associated with the prince, that, in return, he should order his adherents to deliver up to the barons all their castles, particularly those on the borders of Wales; and should swear neither to depait the kingdom during three years, nor to proceed without a charter, on pain of an oath to the same effect, and he also passed a charter, in which he confirmed the a greement or Mise of Lewes, and even permitted his subjects to rise in arms against him, if he should refuse to make it. As Gloucester, on his rupture with the barons, had retired for safety to his estates on the borders of Wales, Leicester followed him with an army to Hereford, continued still to menace and negociate, and finally raised the siege, on the condition of his coming both the king and prince along with him. The Earl of Gloucester here concertcd with young Edward the manner of that prince's escape. He found means to convey to him a horse of extraordinary swiftness; and appointed Roger Mortimer, who had returned into the kingdom, to be ready at hand with a small party to receive the prince, and to guard him to a place of safety. Edward pretended to take the air with some of Lancaster's retinue, who were his guards; and making matches between their horses, after he thought he had tired and blown them sufficiently, he suddenly mounted Gloucester's horse, and called to his attendants, that he had long enough enjoyed the pleasure of their company, and now bid them adieu. They followed him for some time, without being able to overtake him; and the appearance of Mortimer with his company put an end to their pursuit.

The barons, secretly prepared for this event, immediately flew to arms; and the joy of this gallant prince's deliverance, the oppressions under which the nation laboured, the expectation of a new scene of affairs, and the contempt raised against the prelates, had raised an army which Leicester was utterly unable to withstand. This nobleman found himself in a remote quarter of the kingdom; surrounded by his enemies; barred from all communication with his friends by the Severn, whose bridges Edward had broken down; and obliged to fight the cause of his party under these multiplied disadvantages. In this extremity he wrote to his son, Simon de Montfort, to hasten from London with an army for his relief; and Simon had advanced to Kenilworth with that view, where, fancying that all Edward's force and attention were directed against his father, he lay secure and unguarded. But the prince, making a sudden and forced march, surprised him in his camp, dispersed his army, and took the Earl of Oxford and many other noblemen prisoners, almost without resistance. Leicester, ignorant of his son's fate, passed the Severn in boats during Edward's absence, and lay at Evesham, in expectation of being every hour joined by his friends from London; when the prince, who availed himself of every favourable moment, appeared in the field before him. Edward made a body of his troops advance from the road which led to Kenilworth, and ordered them to carry the banners taken from Simon's army; while he himself, making a circuit with the rest of his forces, purposed to attack the enemy on the other quarter. Leicester very long deceived by this stratagem, and took one division of Edward's army for his friends; but at last, perceiving his mistake, and oblast in the prince’s favour, who wounded his antagonist, threw him from his horse, and took him prisoner. He not only gave him his life, but introduced him that very night to the queen at Guildford, procured him his pardon, restored his estates, received him into favour, and was ever after faithfully served by him.1

A total victory of the sovereign over so extensive a rebellion commonly produces a revolution of government, and strengthens, as well as enlarges, for some time, the pretensions of the victor; yet no sacrifices of treason or liberty were made on this occasion; the Great Charter remained still inviolate; and the king, sensible that his own barons, by whose assistance alone he had prevailed, were as likely to desert his government as the other party, seems then forthwith to have more carefully abstained from all those exertions of power which had afforded so plausible a pretence to the rebels. The elementy of this victory is also remarkable; no blood was shed on the scaffold; no attainders, except of the Montfort family, were carried into execution; and though a parliament, assembled at Winchester, attainted all those who had borne arms against the king, easy compositions were made with them for their lands;2 and the highest sums levied on the most obnoxious offenders exceeded not five years’ rent of their estate. Even the Earl of Derby, who again rebelled, after having been pardoned and restored to his forfeited estates, to pay only two years’ rent of them, was a second time restored. The mild disposition of the king, and the prudence of the prince, tempered the insolence of victory, and gradually restored order to the several members of the state, disjoined by so long a continuance of civil wars and commotions.

The city of London, which had carried farthest the rage and animosity against the king, and which seemed determined to stand upon its defence after almost all the kingdom had submitted, was, after some interval, restored to most of its liberties and privileges; and Fitz-Richard, the mayor, who had been guilty of so much illegal violence, was only punished by fine and imprisonment. The Cowes of Leicester, the king’s sister, who had been extremely forward in all attacks on the royal family, was dismissed the kingdom, with her two sons, Simon and Guy, who proved very ungrateful for this lenity. Five years afterwards, they assassinated, at Viterbo in Italy, their cousin Henry d’Allmaine, who, at that time, was endeavouring to make their peace with the king; and by taking sanctuary in the church of the Franciscans, they escaped the punishment due to so great an enormity.3

A.D. 1267. The death of the Earl of Gloucester, after he was returned to his allegiance, had been so great in restoring the prince to his liberty, and assisting him in his victories against the rebellious barons, that it was not only due to content the king with his demeans and his youth and temperance, as well as his great power, tempted him, on some new disgust, to raise again the flames of rebellion in the kingdom. The mutinous populace of London, at his instigation, took arms; and the prince was obliged to levy an army of 30,000 men, in order to suppress them. Even this second rebellion did not provoke the king to any act of cruelty; and the Earl of Gloucester himself escaped with total impunity. He was only obliged to enter into a bond of 20,000 marks that he should never again be guilty of rebellion: a strange method of enforcing the laws, and a proof of the dangerous independence of the barons in those ages! These potent nobles were, from the danger of the precedent, averse to the execution of the laws of forfeiture and felony against any of their fellows; though they could not, with a good grace, refuse to concur in obliging them to fulfil any voluntary contract and engagement into which they had entered.

A.D. 1270. The prince finding the state of the kingdom tolerably composed, was seduced, by his avidity for glory, and by the prejudices of the age, as well as by the earnest solicitude of the French king, to undertake an expedition against the infidels in the Holy Land; and he endeavoured previously to settle the state in such a manner as to dread no bad effects from his absence. As the formidable power and turbulent disposition of the Earl of Gloucester gave him apprehensions, he insisted on carrying him along with him, in consequence of the ducal rank of a very ancient and celebrated nobleman. On the same voyage: in the mean time, he obliged him to resign some of his castles, and to enter into a new bond not to disturb the peace of the kingdom.4 He sailed from England with the Earl of Gloucester and Philip of France, who had hitherto resided in Tunis in Africa, where he found that monarch already dead, from the intemperance of the climate and the fatigues of his enterprise. The great, if not only, weakness of his government, was the imprudent passion for Crusades; but it was this zeal chiefly that procured him from the clergy the title of St. Lewis, by which he is known in the French history; and if that appellation had not been so extremely prostituted, as to become rather a term of reproach, he seems by his uniform probity and goodness, as well as his piety, to have fully merited the title.

He was succeeded by his son, Philip, denominated the Hardy; a prince of some merit, though much inferior to that of his father. Prince Edward, not discouraged by this event, continued his voyage to the Holy Land, where he signalized himself by acts of valour: re- moved the king of Jerusalem from his throne, and struck such terror into the Saracens, that they employed an assassin to murder him, who wounded him in the arm, but perished in the attempt.5 Meanwhile, his absence from England was attended with many of those pernicious consequences which had been dreaded from it. The laws were not executed; the barons oppressed the common people with impunity; they gave shelter on their estates to bands of robbers, whom they employed in committing ravages on the estates of their enemies; the populace of London returned to their usual licentiousness; and the old king, unequal to the burden of public affairs, called aloud for his gallant son to return,6 and to assist him in overpowering his enemies, which was ready to drop from his feeble and irresolute hands. At last, overcome by the cares of government and the infirmities of age, was visibly declining, and he expired at St. Edmundsbury, in the 64th year of his age, and 56th of his reign; the longest reign that is to be met with in the English annals. His brother, the King of the Romans, (for he never attained the title of emperor,) died about seven months before him.

The name by which the son of Henry’s character is his incapacity for government, the king, which rendered him as much a prisoner in the hands of his own ministers and favourites, and as little at his own disposal, as he was in the hands of his enemies. From this source, rather than from insincerity or treachery, arose his negligence in observing his promises; and he was too easily induced, for the sake of present convenience, to sacrifice the lasting advantages arising from the trust and confidence of his people. Hence too were derived his profession to favourites, his attachment to strangers, the variablems of his conduct, his hasty ressentiments, and his sudden forgiveness and return of affections. Instead of reducing the dangerous power of his nobles, by obliging them to observe the laws towards their inferiors, and setting them the salutary example in his own government; he was seduced to imitate their conduct, and to make his arbitrary will, or rather that of his ministers, the rule of his actions. Instead of accommodating himself, by a strict frugality, to the embarrassed situation in which his revenue had been left, by the military expeditions of his uncle, the dissipations of his father, and the usurpations of the barons, he was tempted to levy money by irregular exactions; which, without enriching himself, impoverished, at least disgraced, his people. Of all men, nature seemed least to have fitted him for being a tyrant; yet there are instances of excess in his reign, which, though derived from the presents left him by his predecessors, had been carefully guarded against by the Great Charter, and are inconsistent with all rules of good government. And on the whole we may say, that greater abilities, with his good dispositions, would have prevented him from falling into his faults; or, with worse dispositions, would have enabled him to maintain and defend them.

This prince was noted for his piety and devotion, and his regular attendance at public worship, more than any other of his on that behalf, much celebrated by ancient writers. He was engaged in a dispute with Lewis IX. of France, concerning the preference between sermons and masses: he maintained the superiority of the latter, and affirmed therein would have been written in the same manner as this, to a friend, than twenty the most elaborate discourses pronounced in his praise.

Henry left two sons, Edward his successor, and Edward, Earl of Lancaster; and two daughters, Margaret, Queen of Scotland, and Beatrice, Duchess of Brittany. He had five other children, who died in their infancy.

The following are the most remarkable transactions of laws enacted during this reign. There had been great disputes between the civil and ecclesiastical courts concerning bastardy. The common law had deemed all those to be bastards who were born before the marriage of King John; contrary to statute, and when any dispute of inheritance arose, it had formerly been usual for the civil courts to issue writs to the spiritual, directing them to inquire into the legitimacy of the person. The bishop always returned an answer agreeable to the civil law, though contrary to the municipal law of the kingdom. For this reason the civil courts had changed the terms of their writ; and instead of requiring the spiritual courts to make inquisition concerning the legitimacy of the person, it was decreed that they should be put to an examination of fact, whether he were born before or after wedlock.

The prelates complained of this practice to the parliament assembled at Merton in the twentieth of this king, and desired that the statute which had been passed should be reparable to the canon; but received from all the nobility the memorable reply, Notus ans leges Angliae naturæ, We will not change the laws of England.

After the civil wars, the parliament, summoned at Marlbridge, gave their approbation to most of the ordinances which had been established by the reforming barons, and which, though advantageous to the security of the people, had not received the sanction of a legal statute. Among these, it was the ancient, but all appeals from the courts of inferior lords should be carried directly to the king's courts, without passing through the courts of the lords immediately superior. This was one among other statutes that bear witness, more distinguished perhaps than any other, to the incapacity of the minority of the debtor. This law was reasonable, as the estates of minors were always in the hands of their lords, and the debtors could not pay interest where they had no revenue. The charter of King John had granted this indulgence: it was omitted in that of Henry III. for what reason is not known; but it was renewed by the statute of Marlbridge. Most of the other articles of this statute are calculated to restrain the oppressions of sheriffs, and the violence and iniquities committed in distraining cattle and other goods. Cattle and the instruments of husbandry formed at that time the chief riches of the people.

In the thirty-fifth year of this king an assize was made of bread, which was fixed for the different prices of corn, from one shilling a quarter to seven shillings and sixpence, money of that age. These great variations are alone a proof of bad tillage: yet did the prices often rise much higher than any tender notice of by the statute. The Chronicle of Dunstable tells us, that in this reign, wheat was once sold for a mark, nay, for a pound, a quarter; that is, three pounds of our present money. But the statute was altered in 1216, when they were the little communication between the parts of the kingdom, from the very different prices which the same commodity bore at the same time. A brewer, says the statute, may sell two gallons of ale for a penny in cities, and three or four gallons for the same price in the country. At present, such commodities, by the great consumption of the people, and the great stocks of the brewers, are rather cheapest in cities. The Chronicle above mentioned observes, that wheat one year was sold in many places for eight shillings a quarter, but never rose in Dunstable above a crown.

Though commerce was still very low, it seems rather to have increased since the Conquest; at least if we may judge of the increase of money by the price of corn. The medium between the highest and lowest prices of wheat, assigned by the statute, is four shillings and three-pence a quarter, that is, twelve shillings and nine-pence of our present money. This is near half of the middling price in our time. Yet the middling price of cattle, so late as the reign of King Richard, we find to be above eight, near ten times lower than the present. Is not this the true inference, from comparing these facts, that, in all uncivilized nations, cattle, which propagate of themselves, bear always a lower price than corn, which requires more art and stock to render it plentiful than those nations are possessed of? It is to be remarked that Henry's assize of corn was copied from a preceding assize established by the great charter of these princes. Now compared with corn and cattle may be looked on as contemporaries; and they were, not from one particular year, but from an estimation of the middling prices for a series of years. It is true, the prices assigned by the statute of Richard were more agreed upon standard than those of sheriffs and escheators; and as considerable profits were allowed to these ministers, we may naturally suppose, that the common value of cattle was somewhat higher with them. Yet still the great difference between the price of corn and cattle as that of four to one, compared to the present rates, affords important reflections concerning the very different state of industry and tillage in the two periods.

Interest lads, the money that was lent at one rate of money, should rise as interest; and when the whole increased by the addition of that which was lent at another rate, would be multiplied the whole proportion of the interest by the number of years. This was the reasoning of Richard di Santeri, who, in his book of commerce, has shown with what little advantage of the interest the king could have maintained his crown. The king was not possessed of any money, that could have enabled him to pay a great debt; and the money was again extorted; and one Jew alone, Aaron of York, was obliged to pay above 4000 marks. In 1250, Henry renewed his oppressions; and the same Aaron was condemned to pay him 30,000 marks upon an accusation of forgery: the high penalty imposed upon him, and which, it seems, he was thought able to pay, is rather a presumption of his innocence than of his guilt. In 1255, the king demanded 8000 marks from the Jews, and threatened to condemn them if they did not pay. They now lost all patience, and desired leave to retire with their effects out of the kingdom. But the king replied: How can I remedy the oppressions you complain of? I am myself a debtor, and I am strapped of all my revenues; I owe above 200,000 marks; and if I had said 300,000, I should not exceed the truth: I am obliged to pay my son, Prince Edward, 15,000 marks a year. They have not the farthing; and I must have money, from any hand, from any quarter, or by any means." He then delivered over the Jews to the Earl of Cornwall, that those whom the one brother had flayed, the other might embowel, to make use of the words of the historian. King John, his father, once demanded 10,000 marks from a Jew of Bristol; and on his refusal, ordered one of his teeth to be drawn every day till he should comply. The Jew lost seven teeth; and then paid the sum required of him. One villain laid upon the Jews of Bristol, and burnt a mark in the high street, a sum equal to the whole yearly revenue of the crown.

To give a better pretext for extortion, the improbable and absurd accusation, which has been at different times advanced against that nation, was revived in England, that they had crucified a child in derision of the sufferings of Christ. Eighteen of them were hanged at once for this crime; though it is nowise credible, that even the antipathy borne them by the Christians, and the oppressions under which they laboured, would ever have pushed them to be guilty of that dangerous enormity.

But it is natural to imagine, that a race, exposed to such insults and indignities, both from king and people, and who had no uncertain an enjoyment of their riches, would carry usury to the utmost extremity, and by their great profits make themselves some compensation for their continual perils.

Commerce must be in a wretched condition, where interest was so high, and where the sole proprietors of money employed it in usury only, and were exposed to such extortion and injustice. But the bad policy of the country was another obstacle to improvements: and rendered all communication dangerous, and all property precarious. The Chronicle of Dunstable says, that men were never secure in their houses, and that whole villages were burnt down, and all its goods consumed, without exception, to the king, or his superior lord. These plunderers were careful, lest the profits, accruing from their dominion over that unhappy race, should be discovered by the monks.

These plunderers were careful, lest the profits, accruing from their dominion over that unhappy race, should be discovered by the monks.

Another expedition, devised by the church of Rome, in this period, for securing her power, was the institution of new religious orders, chiefly the Dominicans and Franciscans, who proceeded with all the zeal and success that attend novelties; were better qualified to gain the populace than the old orders, now become rich and indolent; maintained a perpetual rivalry with each other in promoting their gainful superstitions; and acquired a great dominion over the minds, and consequently over the purses, of men, by pretending a desire of poverty and a contempt for riches. The quarrels which arose between these orders, lying still under the control of the sovereign pontiff, never disturbed the peace of the church, and served only as a spur to their industry in promoting the common cause; and though the Dominicans lost some popularity by their denial of the immaculate conception, a point in which they unwarily engaged too far to be able to recede with honour, they counterbalanced this disadvantage, and this error, by acquiring the confidence of kings and princes, and by exercising the jurisdiction assigned them, of ultimate judges and punishers of heresy. Thus, the several orders of monks became a kind of regular troops or garrisons of the Roman church; and though the temporal interests of society, still more the cause of true piety, were hurt, by their various devices to captivate the populace, they proved the chief supports of that mighty fabric of superstition, and, till the revival of true learning, secured it from any dangerous invasion.

The trial by ordeal was abolished in this reign by order of council: a faint mark of improvement in the age.7

Henry granted a charter to the town of Newcastle, in which he gave the inhabitants a licence to dig coal. This is the first mention of coal in England.

We learn from Madox, that this king gave, at one time, 10,000 marks gold to rob for the maintenance.9 Knights and Esquires, says the Dictum of Kenilworth, who were robbers, if they have no landlord, shall pay the half of their goods, and find sufficient security to keep the peace of the kingdom. Such were the manners of the times.

One can see the rise, during the prevalence of such manners, at the frauds and forgeries of the clergy; as it gives less disturbance to society, to take men's money from them with their own consent, though by deceit said lies, than to ravish it by open force and violence. During this reign the papal power was at its summit, and was even beginning insensibly to decline, by reason of the immeasurable avarice and extortion of the court of Rome, which disgraced the clergy as well as laity, in every kingdom of Christendom. The French, who lived in the deepest abyss of ignorance and superstition, had seriously entertained thoughts of shaking off the papal yoke; 10 and the Roman pontiff was obliged to think of new expedients for rivetting it upon the Christian world. For this purpose, Gregory IX. published his decretals, which are a collection of forgeries, favourable to the court of Rome, and consist of the supposed decrees of popes in the first centuries. But these forgeries are so gross, and confounded so palpably all language, history, chronology, and antiquities; matters more stubborn than any speculative truths whatsoever; that even that church, which is not startled at the most monstrous contradictions and absurdities, has been obliged to abandon them to the critics.

In the dark period of the thirteenth century they passed for undisputed and authentic; and men, entangled in the meshes of this false literature, joined to the philosophy, the sects, and superstitions of the time, it was not within their power to defend themselves, but some small remains of common sense, which passed for profanity and impiety, and the indelible regard to self-interest, which, as it was the sole motive of the sole monarch, was of consequence to the people, who served also, in some degree, to protect the laity against them.

Making it a rule in his own conduct to observe, except on extraordinary occasions, the privileges secured to them by the Great Charter, he acquired a right to insist upon their observance of the same charter towards their vassals and inferiors; and he made the crown be regarded by all the gentry and commonalty of the kingdom, as the fountain of justice, and the general assu-

Edward went from Chalons to Paris, and did homage to Philip for the dominions which he held in France. A. D. 1274. He then proceeded to that province, where, at some confusion. He made his journey to London through France; in his unhappy people. Two hundred and eighty of them were hanged at once for this crime in London alone, besides those who suffered in other parts of the kingdom. The houses and lands, (for the Jews had of late ventured to enter into the trade of banking,) as theproduce of great multitudes, were sold and confiscated; and the king, lest it should be suspected that the riches of the sufferers were the chief part of their guilt, ordered a majority of the money raised by these confiscations to be set apart and bestowed upon such as were willing to be converted to Christianity. But resentment was more prevalent with them than any temptation from their poverty; and they refused to be induced, by interest, to embrace the religion of their persecutors. The miseries of this people did not here terminate. Though the arbitrary tajillages and exactions, levied upon them, had yielded a constant and considerable revenue to the crown, Edward, prompted by his zeal and his capacity, resolved some time after to purge the kingdom entirely of that hated race, and to scene to himself at once their whole property as the reward of his labour. He left them only money sufficient to bear their charges into foreign countries, where new persecutions and extortions awaited them; but the inhabitants of the cinque-ports, imitating the bigotry and aversity of their sovereign, despised most of their money, and every one of them, and every one into the sea: a crime, for which the king, who was determined to be the sole plunderer in his dominions, inflicted a capital punishment upon them. No less than fifteen thousand were at this time whipped of their effects, and banished the kingdom. Very few of the kingdoms have since lived in England. And as it is impossible for a nation to subsist without lenders of money, and none will lend without a compensation, the practice of usury, as it was then called, was thereby enforced by the English themselves upon their fellow-citizens, or by Lombards and other foreigners. It is very much to be questioned, whether the dealings of these new usurers were more injurious to those who were engaged in the old. By a law of Richard it was enacted, that three copies should be made of every bond given to a Jew; one to be put into the hands of a public magistrate, another into the hands of another creditor, and a third to remain with the Jew himself. But as the canon law, seconded by the municipal, permitted no Christian to take interest, all transactions of this kind must, after the banishment of the Jews, have become more secret and clandestine; and the order of consequence, be, in the judgment of the king, impossible as a source of revenue. The king's revenues were at this time inconsiderable, and his personal income, and for the infamy and danger which he incurred by lending it. The great poverty of the crown, though no excuse, was probably the cause of this egregious tyranny exercised against the Jews; but Edward also practised other more honourable means of remedying that evil. He employed a strict frugality in the management and distribution of his revenue; he engaged the parliament to vote him a fifteenth of all movables; the Pope to grant him the tenth of all ecclesiastical revenues for three years; and the merchants to consent to a perpetual imposition of half a mark on every sack of wool exported, and a mark on three hundred skins. He also issued commissions to inquire into all encroachments on the royal demesne; into the value of escheats, forfeitures, and wardships; and into the means of reparing or improving every branch of the revenue; he engaged the parliament to vote him a fifth part of all movable property, and he ordered every person of his place to think of a perpetual and money-making establishment: a method of life which had hitherto been not against the nobility, and to question titles to estates which had been transmitted from father to son for several generations. Earl Warren, who had been such eminent service in the late reign, being required to show his titles, drew his sword; and, supposing, that William, the Bastard, had not conquered the kingdom for himself alone: his ancestor was a joint adventurer in the enterprise; and he himself was determined to maintain what had from that period remained unquestioned in his family. The king, sensible of the danger, desisted from making further inquiries of this nature. But the active spirit of Edward could not long remain without employment. He soon undertook an enterprise more prudent for himself, and more advantageous to his people. Lewellyn, Prince of Wales, had frequently infringed the franchises of the Cinque ports; had entered into all their conspiracies against the crown; had frequently fought on their side; and till the battle of Evesham, so fatal to that party, had employed every expedient to relieve the royal cause, and to promote the success of the barons. In the general accommodation made with the vanquished, Lewellyn had also obtained his pardon; but as he was the most powerful and discipulous individual of the crown, he had reason to entertain anxiety about his situation, and to dread the future effects of resentment and jealousy in the English monarch. For this reason, he determined to provide for his security, by maintaining a secret correspondence with his former associates; and he even made his addresses to a daughter of the Earl of Leicester, who was sent to him from beyond seas, but being intercepted in her passage near the isles of Scilly, was detained in the court of England. This incident increasing the mutual jealousy between Edward and Lewellyn, the latter, when required to come to England, and do homage to the new king, scrupled to put himself in the hands of an enemy, desired an audience of the king; and after many of these interviews, the king's son and other noblemen delivered to him as hostages, and demanded that his consort should previously be set at liberty. The king, having now brought the state to a full settlement, was not displeased with this occasion of executing his father's law, and act of the principality of Wales. He refused all Lewellyn's demands, except that of a safe conduct; sent him repeated summons to perform the duty of a vassal; levied an army to reduce him to obedience; obtained a new kind of a fifteenth from parliament; and marched out with certain assurance of success against the enemy. The great disproportion of force between the two princes, and the circumstances of the two states were entirely reversed; and the same intestine dissensions which had formerly weakened England, now prevailed in Wales, and had even taken place in the reigning family. David and Roderic, brothers to Lewellyn, dispossessed of their inheritance by that prince, had been obliged to have recourse to the protection of Edward, and they secured with all their interest, which was extensive, his attempts to enslave their native country. The king, anxious for the union of the two kingdoms, a situation which, through many ages, defended their forefathers against all attempts of the Saxons and Norman conquerors; he retired with his army, overpowered Lewellyn, and secured for himself to the last extremity. But Edward, equally vigorous and cautious, entering by the north with a formidable army, pierced into the heart of the country; and having carefully explored every road before him, and secured every pass behind him, approached the Welsh army in its last retreat. He here avoided the putting to trial the valour of a nation, proud of its ancient independence, and inflamed with animosity against its hereditary enemies; and he trusted to the slow but sure effects of famine, for reducing that people to submission. The rude and simple manners of the natives, as well as the mountainous situation of their country, had made them entirely neglect tillage, and trust to pastureage alone for their subsistence: a method of life which had hitherto secured them against the irregular attempts of the English, but exposed them to certain ruin, when the conquest of the country was speedily pursued, and prudently planned by Edward. Institute of magazines, concourses, and roads, which, as the nation, pursued, reduced all the resources of famine; and Lewellyn, without being able to strike a stroke for his independence, was at last obliged to submit at discretion, and the terms imposed upon him by the victor. He bound himself to pay to Edward 50,000 pounds, as a reparation of damages; to do homage to the crown of England; to The settlement of Wales appeared complete to Edward, that in less than two years, A.D. 1286, after he went abroad, in order to make peace between Alphonso, King of Aragon, and Philip the Fair, who had lately succeeded his father Philip the Hardy on the throne of France. The difference between these two princes had arisen about the kingdom of Sicily, which the Pope, after his hopes from England failed him, had bestowed on Charles, brother to St. Lewis, and which was claimed, upon other titles, by Peter King of Aragon, father to Alphonso. Edward had powers from both princes to settle the terms of peace, and he succeeded in his endeavours; but as the controversy nowise regards England, we shall not enter into a detail of it. He stood abroad above three years; and on his return found many disorders to be prevailed, both from open violence, and from the corruption of justice.

Thomas Chamberlain, a gentleman of some note, had assembled several of his associates at Boston, in Lincolnshire, under pretence of holding a tournament, an exercise practised by the gentry only; but in reality with a view of plundering the rich fair of Boston, and robbing the merchants. To facilitate his purpose, he privately set fire to the town; and while the inhabitants were employed in quenching the flames, the conspirators broke into the booths, and carried off the goods. Chamberlain himself was accidentally wounded in the rush; but maintained the point of honour to his accomplishments, that he could not be prevailed on, by offers or promises, to discover any of them. Many other instances of robbery and violence broke out in all parts of England; though the singular circumstances attending this conspiracy have made it alone he particularly recorded by historians. But the corruption of the judges, by which the foundations of justice were undermined, A.D. 1289, seemed of still more dangerous consequence. Edward, in order to remedy this prevailing abuse, summoned a parliament, and brought the judges to a trial; where all of them, except two, who were clergymen, were convicted of this flagrant iniquity, and cashiered. The amount of the fines levied upon them is alone a sufficient proof of their guilt; being above one hundred thousand marks, an immense sum in those days, and sufficient to defray the charges of an expensive war between two great kingdoms. The king afterwards made all the new judges swear that they would take no bribes; but his expedient, of deposing and fining the old ones, was the more effectual remedy.

We now come to give an account of the state of affairs in Scotland, which gave rise to the most interesting transactions of this reign, and of some of the subsequent; though the intercourse of the two countries, whether in peace or war, had hitherto produced so few events of moment, that, to avoid tediousness, we have omitted many of them, and have been very concise in relating the rest. We now come to give an account of the state of affairs in Scotland, which gave rise to the most interesting transactions of this reign, and of some of the subsequent; though the intercourse of the two countries, whether in peace or war, had hitherto produced so few events of moment, that, to avoid tediousness, we have omitted many of them, and have been very concise in relating the rest. Scottish monarch. This princess, commonly called the Maid of Norway, though a female, and an infant, and a foreigner, yet being the lawful heir of the kingdom, had, through the same host's care, been successively treated by the states of Scotland; and on Alexander's death, the dispositions which had been previously made against that event, appeared so just and prudent, that no disorders, as might naturally be expected, ensued in the kingdom. Margaret was acknowledged Queen of Scotland; five guardians, the bishops of St Andrews and Glasgow, the earls of Fife and Buchan, and James, Steward of Scotland, entered peacefully into the administration, and the infant princess, under the protection of Edward, her great uncle, and Eric, her father, who exerted themselves on this occasion, seemed happily seated on the throne of Scotland. The English monarch was naturally led to build mighty projects on this incident; and having lately, by force of arms, brought Wales under subjection, he attempted, by the marriage of Margaret with his eldest son Edward, to unite the whole island into one monarchy, and thereby to give security both against domestic convulsions and foreign invasions.

A. D. 1296.

The anxiety which had of late prevailed between the two nations, and which, even in former times, was usually occasioned by any violent wars or injuries, facilitated extremely the execution of this project, so favourable to the happiness and grandeur of both kingdoms; and the states of Scotland readily granted their consent. The English, however, agreed that their young sovereign should be educated in the court of Edward. Anxious, however, for the liberty and independence of their country, they took care to stipulate that in case of unexpected conditions, or that they intrusted themselves into the hands of so great and so ambitious a monarch. It was agreed that they should enjoy all their ancient laws, liberties, and customs; that in case of a daughter of Edward, the crown of Scotland should revert to the next heir, and should be inherited by him free and independent; that the military incursions of the crown should never be obliged to go out of Scotland, in order to do homage to the sovereign of the united kingdoms, nor the chapters of cathedral, collegiate, or conventual churches, in order to make elections; that the parliaments summoned for Scottish affairs should always be held within the bounds of that kingdom; and that Edward should bind himself under the penalty of 100,000 marks, payable to the Pope for the use of the Holy Wars, to observe all these articles.

It is not easy to conceive that two nations could have treated more on a footing of equality than Scotland and England maintained during the whole course of this transaction: and though Edward gave his assent to the article concerning the future independency of the Scotch liberties, yet by the preceding, as a mere right, he reserved no alarm to the nobility of Scotland, both because these rights, having hitherto been little heard of, had occasioned no disturbance, and because the Scots had so near a prospect of seeing them entirely absorbed in the rights of their sovereignty.

But this project, so happily formed and so amicably conducted, failed of success, by the sudden death of the Norwegian princess, who expired on her passage to Scotland, and left a very dismal prospect to the kingdom. Though disorders were for the present obviated by the next reign, yet so entirely was the succession of the crown vested, that the succession itself of the crown was now become an object of dispute; and the regents could not expect that a controversy, which is not usually decided by reason and argument alone, would be peaceably settled by them, or even by the states of the kingdom, amidst so many powerful pretenders. The posterity of William, King of Scotland, the prince taken prisoner by Henry II. of England, was extinct; the succession of Norway was disputed, by the right of the crown devolved on the issue of David, Earl of Huntington, brother to William, whose male line being also extinct, left the succession open to the present pretenders of that kingdom. The Earl of Huntington had three daughters; Margaret, married to Alan Lord of Galloway, Isabella, wife of Robert Brus or Bruce, Lord of Annandale, and Adam, who espoused Henry Lord Hastings, daughter, Deverghlda, married to John Baliol, by whom she had a son of the same name, one of the present competitors for the crown: Isabella, the second, bore a son, Robert Bruce, and another daughter, in proof of his claim, on his claim: Adam, the third, left a son, John Hastings, who pretended that the kingdom of Scotland, like many other inheritances, was divisible among the three daughters. In the first place, Edward, as a natural right of his mother, had a title to a third of it. Baliol and Bruce united against Hastings, in maintaining that the kingdom was indivisible; but each of them, supported by plausible arguments, espoused the particular title. Baliol was sprung from the elder branch: Bruce was one degree nearer the common stock; if the principle of representation was regarded, the former had the better claim: if propriety was considered, the latter was entitled to the preference; the sentiments of men were divided: all the nobility had taken part on one side or the other: the people followed implicitly their leaders: the two claimants themselves had great power and numerous subjects. The former, being a native among a rude people, more accustomed to arms than inured to laws, a controversy of this nature, which could not be decided by any former precedent among them, and which would be suggested to the minds of any legal and best established governments, should threaten the state with the most fatal convulsions.

Each century has its peculiar mode in conducting business; and men, guided more by custom than by reason, follow, without inquiry, the manners which are prevalent in their own time. The practice of that age, in controversies between states and princes, seems to have been to avoid a great number of excitements, as much as possible, by whom the question was decided, and whose sentence prevented those dismal confusions and disorders, insuperable at all times from war, but which were multiplied a hundredfold, and dispersed into every corner, by the nature of the feudal governments. It was thus that the English king and barons, in the preceding reign, had endeavoured to compose their dissensions by a reference to the King of France; and the celebrated integrity of that monarch had prevented all the bad effects which might naturally have been derived from so pernicious an expedient. It was thus that the kings of France and Aragon, and afterwards other princes, had submitted their controversies to Edward's judgment; and the remoteness of their states, the great power of the princes, and the little interest which he had on either side, had induced Edward to make less use of his influence in the decision of controversies. The parliament of Scotland, therefore, threatened with a furious civil war, and statured by the great reputation of the English monarch, as well as by the present amicable correspondence between the kingdoms, agreed in making a reference to Edward, as custumary. which he enjoyed south of the Tweed; in the same manner as the King of England himself swore fealty to the French monarch, for the tiffs which he inherited in France. And to such scandalous shifts was Edward reduced, that it must be allowed that a Scottish king had done homage to England; but he purposely omits the latter part of the sentence, which expresses that this prince did homage for the lands which he held in England.

When William, King of Scotland, was taken prisoner in the battle of Alnwick, he was obliged, for the recovery of his liberty, to swear fealty to his crown to the King of England, which was done by him. In pursuance of this great object, very advantageous to England, perhaps in the end no less beneficial to Scotland, but extremely unjust and iniquitous in itself, Edward basied himself in seeking for prospects of his pretended superiority; and instead of looking into his own archives, which, if his claim had been real, must have afforded him numerous records of the homages done by the Scottish princes, and could alone yield him any authentic testimony, he made all the monasteries a prey, and all the chronicles and histories written by Englishmen, and he collected all the passages which seemed anywise to favour his pretensions. Yet even in this method of proceeding, which was gratifying to the Scottish princes for the diminution of the claim, he was far from being fortunate. He began his proofs from the time of Edward the Elder, and continued them through all the subsequent Saxons and Norman times; but the documents are so distant in date in the judgment of his authorities during the Saxon period, when stripped of the boastful and inaccurate style of the monkish historians, is, that the Scots had sometimes been defeated by the English, and had received penalties disadvantageous to them, had made submissions to the English kings, and that had even perhaps fallen into some dependence on a power which was so much superior, and which they had not at that time sufficient force to resist. His authorities from the Norman times are lighted by quotations from the archives. The historians indeed make frequent mention of homage done by the northern potentates; but no one of them says that it was done for his kingdom, and several of them declare, in express terms, that it was that only to the skies duced) were but a feeble rampart against the power of the sword, Edward, carrying with him a great army, which was to enforce his proofs, advanced to the frontiers, and invited the Scottish parliament, and all the competitors, to attend him in the castle of Norham, a place situated on the southern banks of the Tweed, in order to determine that cause which had been referred to his arbitration.

But the King, far from pretending to grant a moment arch, and was no more than what his father and the English barons had, in similar circumstances, paid to Lewis IX., the king, careful not to give umbrage, and determined not to produce his claim of right. He did not fear it, or did not think too much of it; a demand that was super-orous if the fact was already known and avowed, and which plainly betrays Edward's consciousness of his lame and defective title. The Scottish parliament was astonished at the suddenness of its fate, and answered them by their silence.
But the king, in order to maintain the appearance of free and regular proceedings, desired them to remove into their own country, to deliberate upon his claim, to examine his proofs, and to advocate the cause of a nation which be informed of their resolution: and he appointed a plain at Upset-ton, on the northern banks of the Tweed, for that purpose.
When the Scottish barons assembled in this place, though they had no intention of making any protestation against his challenging him to a contest, or of submitting to his expected claim, and at the fraud with which it had been done, they found themselves betrayed into a situation, in which it was impossible for them to make any defence for the ancient liberties and independence of their country.
The King of England, a martial and politic prince, at the head of a powerful army, lay at a very small distance, and was only separated from them by a river fordable in many places. Though by a sudden flight some of them might make their escape, it was impossible for them to make their entry into the country and thence to try their strength.
After a head, without union among themselves, attached all of them to different competitors, whose titles were all too slender to be the mere assumption of the foreign usurper, and who were thereby reduced to an absolute dependence upon him; they could only expect, by resistance, to entail on themselves and their posterity a more grievous and more destructive servitude. Yet, even in this desperate state of their affairs, the Scottish barons, as we learn from Walsingham, one of the best historians of that period, had the courage to reply, that, till they had a king, they could take no resolution on so momentous a point: the journal of king Edward says, that they made no answer at all; that is, perhaps, no particular answer or objection to Edward's claim: and by this solution it is possible to judge of the position of the Scottish barons.
When the king, therefore, interpreting their silence as consent, addressed himself to the several competitors, and previously to his pronouncing sentence, required their acknowledgment of his superiority.
It is evident, like the genealogy of the royal family of Scotland, that there could only be two questions about the succession, that between Baliol and Bruce on the one hand, and Lord Hastings on the other, concerning the partition of the crown; and that both sides were attached to themselves, concerning the preference of their respective titles, supposing the kingdom indivisible: yet there appeared on this occasion no less than nine claimants besides: John Conyn or Cummin Lord of Bathurst, Florence de Roche, Earl of Huntingdon, on the part of the English barons; Robert de Vescy, Robert de Peykeyn, Nicholas de Soules, Patrick Galtyher, Roger de Manderville, Robert de Ross; not to mention the King of Norway, who claimed as heir to his to the earl of March.
Seated therefore on these claims, Edward scended from more remote branches of the royal family; others were even sprung from illegitimate children; and as none of them had the least pretense of right, it is natural to conjecture, that Edward had secretly encouraged them to appear in the list of claimants, that he might sow the more division among the Scottish nobility, make the cause appear the more intricate, and be able to choose among a great number the most obnoxious candidate.
But he found them all equally obnoxious on this occasion. Robert Bruce was the first that acknowledged Edward's right of superiority over Scotland, and he had so far foregone the pretensions, even that in his petition, where he set forth his claim to the crown, he laid previously applied to him as liege lord of the kingdom; and a step which was not taken by any of the other competitors.
They all, however, with seeming willingness, made a like acknowledgment when required; though Baliol insisted he should give offence to the Scottish nation, had taken care to be absent during the first days; and he was the last that recognized the king's title. Edward next deliberated carefully about the question of the succession in the discussion of this great controversy. He gave orders, that Baliol, and such of the competitors as adhered to him, should choose forty commissioners: Bruce and his adherents forty more:
and he commanded them to assemble; to sit at Wark, to examine the cause deliberately among themselves, and make their report to him, and he promised in the ensuing year to give his determination. Meanwhile he pretended that it was requisite to have all the fortresses of Scotland delivered into his hands, in order to enable him, without opposition, to put the true heir in possession of the crown; and this exorbitant demand was complied with, both by the states of Scotland, and by certain Barons, who died in the castle immediately resigned their command; except Umfreville Earl of Angus, who refused, without a formal and particular acquittal from the parliament and the other states, to depart, and to leave to the Scottish dominating arbiter, who had given to Scotland so many just reasons of suspicion. Before this assembly broke up, which had fixed such a mark of dishonour on the nation, all the prelates and barons there present swore fidelity to Edward; and that prince appointed commissioners to receive a like oath from all the other barons and persons of distinction in Scotland.
The king, having finally made, as he imagined, this important acquisition, left the commissioners to sit at Wark, and examine the titles of the several competitors who claimed the precarious crown, which Edward was willing to give some share to the lawful heir to enjoy. He went southwards, both in order to assist at the funeral of his mother, Queen Eleanor, who died about this time, and to

It is difficult to account for the settlement of so many French families in Scotland, the Bruce, Balats, St. Clair, Murray, Gordon, W. IV. vol. ii, p. 536.

The violence, robberies, and disorders, to which that age was so subject, were not confined to the licentious barons and their retainers at land: the sea was equally infested with piracy; the feeble execution of the laws had given licence to all orders of men; and a general appetite for rapine and revenge, supported by a false sense of honour, had also infected the merchants and mariners; and it was under these circumstances that the English people, by a violent and immediate retaliation upon the aggressors. A Norman and an English vessel met off the coast near Bayonne; and both of them having occasion for water, they War with sent their boats to land, and the seamen coming to the same morning, there ensued a quarrel for the preference; a Norman, drawing his dagger, attempted to stab an Englishman; who, grappling with him, threw his adversary on the ground; and the Norman, as was pretended, falling on his sword, was slain.\(^1\) This scuffle between two seamen about water, soon kindled a bloody war between the two nations, and involved a great part of Europe in the quarrel. The mari- ners of the Norman ship carried their complaints to the French king: Philip, without inquiring into the fact, with- out demanding redress, bade them take revenge, and trouble him no more about the matter.\(^2\) The Normans, who had never been more regular in their proceedings, were not needed but this hint to proceed to immediate violence. They seized an English ship in the channel; and hanging, along with some dogs, several of the crew on the yard arm, in presence of their companions, dismissed the ves- seled, and lade their death on the ship's side. This was real vengeance was now taken for the blood of the Norman killed at Bayonne. This injury, accompanied with so general and deliberate an insult, was resented by the mar- iners of the Cinque Ports, who, without carrying any com- plaint to the king, or waiting for redresses, retaliated, by committing like barbarities on all French vessels without distinction. The French, provoked by their losses, preyed on the ships of all England's subjects; another English merchant, Gascon: the sea became a scene of piracy between the nations: the sovereigns, without either subsequent or re- pression of the violence of their subjects, seemed to remain indifferent spectators: the English made no associa- tions with the Irish and Dutch seamen; the French with the Flemish and Genoese.\(^3\) And the animosities of the people on both sides became every day more violent and barbarous. A fleet of two hundred Norman vessels set sail to the south for wine and other commodities; and, in their passage, seized all the English ships which they met with, hanged the seamen, and seized the goods. The in- habitants of the English sea-ports, informed of this inci- dent, fitted out another armament, well equipped and man- nered than the others, and awaited the enemy on their return. After an obstinate battle, they put them to rout, and sunk, destroyed, or took the greater part of them.\(^4\) No quarter was given; and it is apprehended that the loss of the French amounted to fifteen thousand men: which is accounted for by this circumstance, that the Norman fleet was employed in transporting a considerable body of sol- diers from the south.

The affair was now become too important to be any longer overlooked by the sovereigns. On Philip's sending an envoy to demand reparation and restitution, the king despatched the Bishop of London to the French court, in order to accommodate the quarrel. He first said, that the English courts of justice were open to all men; and if any Frenchman were injured, he might seek redress by course of law.\(^5\) He next offered to adjust the matter by private arbiters, or by a personal interview with the King of France, or by a reference either to the Pope or the col- lege of cardinals, or any particular cardinals agreed on by both parties.\(^6\) The French, probably the more disgusted, as they were beaten in the field, gave him the opportunity of these expedients: the vessels and the goods of merchants were confiscated on both sides: depredations were continued by the Gascouins on the western coast of France, as well as by the English in the channel; Philip cited the queen to Paris, and answer for these offences: and Edward, apprehensive of danger to that province, sent John St. John, an experienced soldier, to Bordeaux, and gave him direction to the queen in a posture of force. Gascouins proved themselves unable to oppose.

That he might, however, prevent a final rupture between the nations, the king despatched his brother, Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, to Paris, with a large sum of money, which he had espoused for the Queen of Navarre, mother to Jane, Queen of France, he seemed, on account of that alliance, the most proper person for finding expedients to accommodate the difference. Jane pretended herself as did many others, to have been entirely taken in by her hopes of advancing her son to the throne of France. The king dowager, signed the same amicable disposition: and these two princesses told Edmund, that the circumstance the most difficult to adjust, was the point of honor with Philip, who thought himself affronted by the injuries committed against him by his sub-vassals in Guienne: but if Edward would once consent to give him seizin and possession of that province, he would think his honor fully repaired, would engage to restore Guienne immediately, and would accept of a very easy satisfaction for all the other injuries. The king was consulted on the occasion; and as he then found himself in immediate danger of war with the Scots, which he regarded as the most pressing affair at that moment, he yielded to this proposal, blinded by his favourite passion for subduing that nation, allowed himself to be deceived by so gross an artifice. He sent his brother orders to sign and execute the treaty with the two princesses: Philip solemnly promised to execute part of it; and the king's citation to appear in the court of France was accordingly recalled: but the French monarch was so soon put in possession of Guienne, that the cittadels which were taken in the recovery of Gascony, where he had not retained a single place in his hands, he endeavoured to compensate that loss, by forming alliances with several princes, who, he projected, should attack France on all quarters, and make a diversion of her forces. Adolphus, Duke of Saxony, was one of the persons who proposed of the King of England for that purpose; as did also Amadus, Count of Savoy, the Archbishop of Cologne, the Counts of Gueldre and Luxembourg, the Duke of Brabant, Count of Namur, and Count of Flanders, who married his two daughters, Margaret and Eleanor; but these alliances were extremely burdensome to his narrow revenues, and proved in the issue entirely ineffectual. More impression was made on Guienne by an English army, which he completed by emptying the jails of thousands of thieves and robbers, who had been confined there for their crimes. So low had the profession of arms fallen, and so much had it degenerated from the estimation in which it stood during the vigour of the feudal system!

A. D. 1293. The king himself was detained in England, first by contrary winds, then by his apprehensions of a projected invasion, and by a rebellion of the Welsh, whom he repressed and brought again under subjection. The army which he sent to Guienne, was commanded by his nephew, John de Britagne, Earl of Richmond, and under him by St. John, Tweto, de Vere, and other officers of reputation; who made themselves masters of the town of Bayonv, as well as of Bourg, Biere, Reole, St. Severe, and other places, which structured Bordeaux, and cut off its communication both by sea and land. The favour which the Gascouins bore to the English government facilitated these conquests, and seemed to promise still greater successes; but this advantage was soon lost by the sudden death of some of the officers: Philip's brother, Charles de Valois, who commanded the French armies, having had siege to Podensac, a small fortress near Reole, obliged Giffard, the governor, to capitulate; and the articles, though favourable to the English, were such that the English nation, of which all whom above fifty were hanged by Charles as rebels: a policy, by which he both intimidated that people, and produced an inexplicable breach between them and the French share in the alliance; it was the Earl of Richmond himself commanded; and as the place seemed not tenable, the English general drew his troops to the water-side, with an intention of embarking with the greater part of his army. The enraged Gascouins fell upon his rear, and at the same time opened their gates to the French, who, besides making themselves masters of the place, took many prisoners of distinction. St. Severe was more vigorously defended by Hugh de Vere, son of the Earl of Oxford; but was at last obliged to capitulate.

The French king, not content with these successes in Gascony, threatened England with an invasion; and, by a sudden attempt, his troops took and burnt Dover; but were obliged soon after to retire. And in order to make a greater diversion of the English force, and engage Edward in dangerous and important wars, he formed a secret alliance with the Dauphin, King of Scotland; the commencement of that treaty, two months before the close of the fourteenth century, was maintained, by mutual interests and necessities, between the French and Scottish nations. John confirmed this alliance, by stipulating a marriage between his eldest son and the daughter of Charles de Valois, par-" law in execution, he could assemble a small part only of the ancient force of the kingdom. It was a usual expedient for men who held of the king or great barons by military tenure, to transfer their land to the church, and receive it back by another tenure, called frankalamogny, by which the king or baron offered no servitude. A law was made against this practice; but the abuse had probably gone far before it was attended to, and probably was not entirely corrected by the new statute, which, like many others, was likely to have been interpreted and felt but feebly executed by the magistrate against the perpetual interest of so many individuals. The constable and maréchal, when they mustered the armies, often in a hurry, and for want of better information, received the service of a baron for fewer knights' fees than were due by him; and one precedent of this kind was held good against the king, and became ever after a reason for diminishing the service.6 The rolls of knights' fees were inaccurately kept; no care was taken to correct them before the armies were summoned into the field; 4 it was then too late to think of examining records and charters; and the service was accepted on the footing which the vassal himself was pleased to acknowledge, after all the various subdivisions and conjunctions of property had thrown an obscurity on the nature and extent of his tenure. It is easy to judge of the intricacies which would attend disputes of the kind. In the thirteenth century, the number of military fees belonging to the church, whose property was fixed and unalterable, became the subject of controversy; and we find in particular, that, when the Exchequer was once a civil and a military government, the claims for the ad levied on occasion of the marriage of Henry 11.'s daughter to the Duke of Saxony, the prelate acknowledged ten, and disowned the other sixty.7 It is not known in what manner this difference was terminated; but had the question been concerning an armament to defend the kingdom, the bishop's service would probably have been received without opposition for ten fees; and the service he owed to the king not at all. But before the Pecuniary scutages, therefore, diminished as much as military services: other methods of filling the exchequer, as well as the armies, must be devised; new situations produced new laws and institutions; and the great alterations in the finances and military power of the crown, as well as in private property, were the source of equal innovations in every part of the legislature or civil government.

The existing estates conferred on the Norman by his barons and chieftains, remained not long entire and unimpaired. The landed property was gradually shared out into fewer hands; and those immense baronies were divided into a number of smaller estates, the assignations among co-heirs, by sale, or by beseeching to the king, who gratified a great number of his courtiers, by dealing them out among them in smaller portions. Such moderate estates were easily sold by the proprietors to live at home, were better calculated for duration; and the order of knights and small baronies grew daily more numerous, and began to form a very respectable rank of order in the state. As they were all immediate vassals of the crown by military tenure, they were, by the principles of the feudal law, equally entitled with the greatest barons to a seat in the national or general councils; and this right, though regarded as a privilege, which the advantages of their situation predisposed them to have solicited, was also considered as a burden, which they desired to be subjected to on extraordinary occasions only. Hence it was provided in the charter of King John, that while the great barons were summoned to the national council by a particular writ, the small barons, under which appellation the knights were also comprehended, should only be called by a general summons of the sheriff. The distinction between great and small barons, like that between rich and poor, was not exactly defined; but agreeably to the inaccurate genius of that age, and to the simplicity of ancient government, was left very much to be determined by the discretion of the king and his ministers. It was usual for the prince to require, by a particular summons, the attendance of a baron in order to the service of his vassal; or, in other words, to make a new appointment, in whatever form, of a constable and marshal, but he did not mix up all the barons into one order with the greatest barons, it gave them no surprise to see him take his seat in the great council, whether he appeared of his own accord, or by a particular summons from the king. The barons by writ, therefore, began gradually to intermix themselves with the barons by tenure; and as Camden tells us,1 from an ancient manuscript, now lost, that, after the battle of Evesham, a positive law was enacted, prohibiting every baron from attending in parliament who was not invited thither by a particular summons, the whole baronage of England held thenceforward their seat by writ, and this important privilege of their tenures was in effect abjured. Only, it is said, that the writs had been regularly continued for some time in one great family, the omission of them would have been regarded as an affront and even as an injury. A like alteration gradually took place in the order of peers, who were regularly summoned in the same manner. The dignity of an earl, like that of a baron, was anciently territorial and official: 4 he exercised jurisdiction within his county: he levied the third of the fines to his own profit: he was at first once a civil and a military governor. The law of feudal tenure, the right from the ad levied on occasion of the marriage of Henry 11.'s daughter to the Duke of Saxony, the prelate acknowledged ten, and disowned the other sixty.7 It is not known in what manner this difference was terminated; but had the question been concerning an armament to defend the kingdom, the bishop's service would probably have been received without opposition for ten fees; and the service he owed to the king not at all. But before the Pecuniary scutages, therefore, diminished as much as military services: other methods of filling the exchequer, as well as the armies, must be devised; new situations produced new laws and institutions; and the great alterations in the finances and military power of the crown, as well as in private property, were the source of equal innovations in every part of the legislature or civil government.

royal power, and had rendered it more difficult and dangerous for the prince to exert any extraordinary act of arbitrary authority. In this situation, it was natural for the king's permanent faithful circle of officers and attendants — the barons of the royal household, whose influence was no ways dangerous to him, and who, being exposed to oppression from their powerful neighbours, sought a legal protection under the shadow of the law: — the peers, therefore, if not from the presence of the thing in parliament, where they served to control the turbulent resolutions of the great. all the boroughs, without distinction, the tax agreed to by the majority of deputys.

The union, however, of the representatives from the boroughs gave gradually more weight to the whole order; and it became customary for them, in return for the supply of money, to have the major part of the country under the power of the crown. The House of Commons, however, being a body of men in whom the majesty itself was vested, could never agree to intrust the business of the nation to the guidance of the House of Commons, unless they were absolutely more to be trusted than the House of Commons.
an affair of chance, but arose from the necessities of the present situation, is, that Edward, at the very same time, summoned deputies from the inferior clergy, the first that ever met, and did require them to impost so many taxes on their constituents for the public service. Formerly the ecclesiastical benefices bore no part of the burdens of the state: the Pope indeed, of late, had often levied impositions, but he had sometimes granted the power to the sovereign: the king himself had in the preceding year exacted, by menaces and violence, a very grievous tax of half the revenues of the clergy: but as this tax was very dangerous, and could not easily be repeated in a government which required the consent of the subject to any extraordinary resolution, Edward found it more prudent to assemble a Lower House of convocation, given to the clergy, to receive the dispensations of that power, and expecting the most violent effects of their remonstrance, which he knew he had so well merited; employed the supplies granted him by his people in making preparations against the hostilities of his northern neighbour. When in this situation, he received intelligence of the treaty secretly concluded between John and Philip; and though uneasy at this concurrence of a French and Scottish war, he resolved not to encourage his enemies by a pusillanimous behaviour, or by yielding to their untold efforts. He sum-mom John to perform the duty of a vassal, and to send him the supply of forces and materials against an invasion from France, with which he was then threatened: he next required that the fortresses of Berwick, Jedburgh, and Roxborough, should be put into his hands as a secu-ritv-guard; and he exorted him to appear in an English parliament, to be held at Newcastle: and when none of these successive demands were complied with, he marched northward with numerous forces, 30,000 foot, and 4000 horse, to chastise his rebellious vassal. The Scottish nation, who had little relish on the vogue and abilities of their prince, assigned himso council of twelve noblemen, in whose hands the sovereignty was really lodged; and who put the country in the best posture of which his present distinguished features would admit. A great army, composed of 40,000 infantry, though supported only by 500 cavalry, advanced to the frontiers; and after a fruitless attempt upon Carlisle, marched eastwards to defend those provinces which Edward was preparing to attack. But some of the most considerable of the Scottish nobles, Robert Bruce the father and son, the Earls of March and Angus, prognosticating the ruin of their country from foreign invasion, endeavoured here to ingratiate themselves with Edward, by an early submission; and the king, encouraged by this favourable incident, led his army into the enemy's country, and crossed the Tweed without a struggle. On the 25th of March, he received a message from John, by which he was informed that Prince, having now procured for himself and his nation Pope Celestine's dispensation from former oaths, he had avowed his former treaty, and received the garrison were put to the sword; and Edward, elated by this great advantage, despatched Earl Warren with 12,000 men to lay siege to Dunbar, which was defended by the inhabitants on a strong reinforcement of Welch and Irish, who, being accustomed to a desultory kind of war, were the best fitted to pursue the fugitive Scots into the recesses of their lakes and mountains. But Scotland submitted by their misfortunes; and the feeble and timid Baliol, discontented with his own subjects, and overawed by the English, abandoned all those resources which his people might yet have possessed in this extremity. He hastened to make his submissions to Edward; he expressed the deepest penitence for his disloyalty to his liege lord; and he made a solemn and irrevocable resignation of his crown. This momentous act was confirmed by the king ed northwards to Aberdeen and Elgin, without meeting an enemy: no Scotchman approached him but to pay him submission and do him homage: even the turbulent Highlanders, ever refractory to their own princes, and averse to the restraint of laws, endeavoured to prevent the devastation of their country, by giving him early proofs of obedience: and Edward, having brought the whole kingdom to a seeming state of tranquillity, returned to the south with his army. There was a stone to which the popular superstition of the Scots paid the highest veneration; all their kings were seated on it when they received the right of inaugurating an ancient tradition, and assured them, that, wheresoever this stone was placed, their nation should always govern: and it was carefully preserved at Scone, as the true palladium of their monarchy, and their ultimate resource amidst all their misfortunes. Edward got possession of it; and carried it with him to England. He gave orders to destroy the records, and all those monuments of antiquity, which might preserve the memory of the independence of the kingdom, and refuse the origin of the possessions and independence of the people. He hastened, that he also destroyed all the annals preserved in

But not rude and unpolished, he was possessed of any history which deserves much to be regretted. The great seal of Baliol had been broken, and he himself was carried prisoner to London, and committed to custody in the Tower. Two years after, he was restored to liberty, and submitted to a voluntary banishment in France; whereas, without his consent, it was said to have been forced for the recovery of his royalty, he died in a private station. Earl Warenne was left governor of Scotland: Englishmen were intrusted with the chief offices; and Edward, flattering himself, that he had ended all of his wrongs, and that the numerous acts of fraud and violence, which he had practised against Scotland, had terminated in the final reduction of that kingdom, returned with his victorious army into England.

With an attempt which he made about the same time, for the recovery of Guenne, was not equally successful. He sent thither an army of 7000 men, under the command of his brother, the Earl of Lancaster, and with all the advantages over the French at Bourdeaux: but he was soon after seized with a distemper, of which he died at Bayonne. The command devolved on the Earl of Lincoln, who was not able to put any thing considerable during the rest of the campaign.

But the active and ambitious spirit of Edward, while his conquests brought such considerable acquisitions to the English, never suffered him to rest. The ancient patrimony of his family, which was wrested from him by the dishonourable arts of the French monarch, he resolved to recover. Finding that the distance of that province rendered all his forces insufficient for this attempt, he proposed to attack France in a quarter where she appeared more vulnerable; and with this view he married his daughter, Elizabeth, to John, Earl of Holland, and at the same time engaged them - with the archbishop of York, who, related to pay him the sum of 75,000 pounds, and projected an invasion, with their united forces, upon Philip, their common enemy. He hoped that, when he himself, at the head of the English, Flemish, and Dutch armies, reinforced by his German allies, to whom he had promised or remitted considerable sums, should enter the frontiers of France, and threaten the capital itself, Philip would at least be obliged to relinquish his acquisitions, and purchase peace by the restoration of Guenne. But, in order to set this great machine in movement, considerable supplies were requisite from the parliament; and Edward, without much difficulty, obtained from the barons and knights a new grant, and induced them to renew their service against the church, on account of the former zeal of the clergy for the Moorfoot faction, made him resolve to load them with still more considerable impositions; and he required of them a fifth of their moveables. But he here met with an opposition, which for some time disconcerted all his measures, and engaged him to enterprises, that were somewhat dangerous to him; and would have proved fatal to any of his predecessors.

Dimensions with Boniface VIII. who had succeeded Celestine, the clergy, in the papal throne, was a man of the most lofty and enterprising spirit: and, though not endowed with the qualities which accompanied ambition in men of his order, he was determined to carry the authority of the tiara, and his dominion over the temporal power, to so great a height as it had ever attained in any former period. Sensible that his immediate predecessors, by oppressing the church in every province of Christendom, had extremely alienated the affections of the clergy, and had afforded the civil magistrate a pretence for making inroads into the spiritual revenues, he attempted to resume the former station of the sovereign pontiffs, and to establish himself as the common protector of the spiritual order against all invaders. For this purpose, he issued very early in his pontificate a general bull, prohibiting all princes from levying, without his consent, any taxes on the clergy of any kind, to exempt them from paying them to the secular clergy; and he threatened both of them with the penalties of excommunication in case of disobedience. This important edict was followed by the arrest of the bishop of Chichester, John de Winchelsey, Archbishop of Canterbury, who intended to employ it as a rampart against the violent extortions which the church had felt from Edward, and the still greater which the new laws threatened to inflict on them. His request to the pope for a subsidies gave them reason to apprehend. When a demand, therefore, was made on the clergy of a fifth of their moveables, a tax which was probably much more grievous than a fifth of their revenue, as their hands were mostly stocked with their cattle, and cultivated by their vassals; the clergy took shelter under the bull of Pope Boniface, and pleaded conscience in refusing compliance. The king came not immediately to extremities on this repulse; but, after a serious negociation, in which much sensible priviledge, on which they set so high a value. He had formerly seized, in an arbitrary manner, all the money and plate belonging to the churches and convents, and had applied them to public use. He was not satisfied, however, but expect more violent treatment on this sharp refusal, grounded on such dangerous principles. Instead of applying to the pope for a relaxation of his bull, he resolved immediately to employ the power in his hands; and he told the ecclesiastics, that, since they refused to support the civil government, they were unworthy to receive any benefit from it; and he would accordingly put them out of the protection of the laws. This vigorous measure was immediately carried into execution. Orders were issued to the judges to receive no cause brought before them by the clergy; to hear and decide all causes in which they were defendants; to do every man justice, and to execute every sentence. The ecclesiastics soon found themselves in the most miserable station imaginably. They could not remain in their own houses or convents for want of subsistence; if they went abroad in search of rest or maintenance, they were, if not robbery, robbed of their horses and clothes, abused by every rufian, and no redress could be obtained by them for the most violent injury. The prince himself was attacked on the highway, was stripped of his equipage and furniture, and was at last reduced to board himself, with a single servant, in the house of a country clergyman. The king, meanwhile, remained an indiffernt spectator of all these violations; and without employing his officers in committ-from the Scots, voluntarily, from the first, voted a fifth of their movables; the Bishops of Salisbury, Ely, and some others, made a composition for the secular clergy within their dioceses: and they agreed not to pay the fifth, which would have been an act of disobedience to Boniface's bull, but on condition of obtaining from some church appurtenant to the king's officers. Many particular convents and clergymen made payment of a like sum, and received the king's protection. Those who had not so far proceeded interceded for their neglect; and they were discharged. And there was scarcely found one ecclesiastic in the kingdom, who seemed willing to suffer, for the sake of religious privileges, this new species of martyrdom, the most terrible and unmerited of all. It was owing to the great variety, spiritual pride, and not rewarded by that crown of glory, which the church holds up, with such ostentation, to her devoted adherents.

Arbitrary. But as the money granted by parliament, though considerable, was not sufficient to supply the king's necessities, and that levied by compositions with the clergy came in slowly, Edward was obliged, for the obtaining of further supply, to exert his arbitrary power, and to lay an oppressive hand on all orders of men in the kingdom. He limited the merchants in the quantity of wool allowed to be exported; and at the same time forced them to pay him a duty of forty shillings a sack, which was the third of the value of their goods. He seized all the rest of the wool, as well as all the lether of the kingdom, into his hands, and disposed of these commodities for his own advantage. He required the sheriffs of each county, when they came to him, with 2000 marks of their gold, and as many of oats, which he permitted them to seize wherever they could find them; the cattle and other commodities necessary for supplying his army were laid hold of without the consent of the owners: and though he promised to pay afterwards the equivalent of all these goods, men saw but little probability that a prince, who submitted so little to the limitations of law, could ever, without violence, respect the rights of property. He showed, at the same time, an equal disregard to the principles of the feudal law, by which all the lands of his kingdom were held: in order to increase his army, and enable him to support that great effort which he intended to make against France, he required the attendance of every proprietor of land possessed of twenty pounds a year, even though he held not of the crown, and was not obliged by his tenure to perform any such service.

These acts of violence and of arbitrary power, notwithstanding the great personal regard generally borne to the king, were the order of the day; and it was not long ere the greater nobility, jealous of their privileges as well as of national liberty, came countenance and authority to these complaints. Edward assembles on the sea-coast an army, which he purposed to send over to Guienne, while he himself should in person make an impression on the side of Flanders; and he intended to put these forces under the command of Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Hereford, the Constable, and Roger Bigod, Earl of Norfolk, the Marschall of England. But these two powerful earls refused to execute his commands, and affirmed, that they were only obliged by their office to attend his person in the wars. A violent altercation ensued, and the king, in the height of his passion, addressing himself to the constable, exclaimed, Sir Earl, by God, you shall either go or hang. By God, Sir King, replied Hereford, I will neither go nor hang! And he immediately departed with the marshall, and above thirty other considerable barons.

Upon this opposition, the king had aside the project of an expedition against Guienne; and assembled the forces which he himself purposed to transport into Flanders. But the two earls, irritated in the contest and elated by impunity, pretending that none of their ancestors had ever served in that country, refused to perform the duty of their office in mustering the army. The king, now finding it advisable to proceed with moderation, instead of assuaging the ears, who possessed their dignities by hereditary right, appointed Thomas de Berkeley, and Geoffrey de Gurney, to act, in that emergency, as constable and marschall, respectively. He made the great number of the nobility in Westminster-hall, to whom he designed to make an apology for his past conduct. He pleaded the urgent necessities of the crown; his extreme want of money; the great engagement of his spirit; and his lack of interest to support his foreign allies: and he promised, if ever he returned in safety, to redress all their grievances, to restore the execution of the laws, and to make all his subjects compensation for the lesser hardships they had sustained. Meanwhile, he begged them to suspend their animosities; to judge of him by his future conduct, of which, he hoped, he should be more master; to remain faithful to his government; to forget in the present war, to preserve their allegiance to his son and successor.

There were certainly, from the concurrence of discontent among the great, and grievances of the people, materials sufficient, in any other period, to have kindled a civil war in England. But Edward kept every one in awe; and his dexterity, in stopping on the brink of danger, and retracting the measures to which he had been pushed by his violent temper and arbitrary principles, showed how readily he could have turned the two great earls dared not to break out into open violence: they proceeded no further than framing a remonstrance, which was delivered to the king at Windsor, when he was mild and moderate, and which was not in consequence of the violations of the Great Charter and that of forests; the violent seizures of corn, leather, cattle, and above all, of wool, a commodity which they affirmed to be equal in value to all others in the kingdom, and to which these demands was the greatest of the king's necessities, was the great concessions of any of forty shillings a sack on the small quantity of wool allowed to be exported by the merchants; and they claimed an immediate redress of all these grievances. The king told them, that the greater part of his council were now at a distance, and without their advice he could not deliberate on measures of so great importance.

But the constable and marschall, with the disobedience of their adherents, perceived the advantage of Edward's absence, and to obtain an explicit assent to their demands. When summoned to attend the parliament at London, they came with a great body of cavalry and infantry; and before they entered the city, required as a condition to their coming, that the privy seal should be given up to their custard. The privy seal, who secretly favoured all their pretensions, advised the council to comply; and thus they became masters both of the young prince and of the resolutions of parliament. Their demands, however, were moderate, and such as sufficiently justify the purity of their intentions in all their past measures: they only required, that the two charters should receive a solemn confirmation; that a clause should be added to secure the nation for ever against all impositions and taxes without consent of parliament; and that they themselves and their adherents, who had refused to attend the king into Flanders, should be pardoned for the offences, and be restored to all the honours of their rank. The prince of Wales and his council assented to these terms; and the charters were sent over to the king in Flanders, to be there confirmed by him. Edward felt the utmost reluctance to this measure, which, he apprehended, would fetter the future impose fœters on his conduct, and set limits to his lawless authority. On various pretences, he delayed three days giving any answer to the decrees; and when the period expired, and the sureties of his refusal were represented to him, he was at last obliged, after many internal struggles, to affix his seal to the charters, as also to the clause that bereaved him of power which he had hitherto assumed, of imposing arbitrary taxes upon the people.

That we may finish at once this interesting transaction concerning the settlement of the charters, we shall briefly mention the subsequent events which relate to it. The complaints of national privilege, Three knights' oaths, and the consequences of the appointment of the king's officers, were satisfied; and not only ceased from disturbing the government, but assisted the regency with their power against the Scots, who had risen in arms, and had thrown off the yoke of Edward. Indeed, it was alleged that the smallest pretence would suffice to make Edward retract these detested laws, which, though they had often received the sanction both of king and parliament, and had been acknowledged by the people, were declared to have sufficient validity; which insisted that he should again confirm them on his return to England, and should thereby renounce all plea which he might derive from his residing in a foreign country, when he formerly affixed his seal to them. It appeared that they judged right of Edward's character and intentions: he delayed this confirmation as long as possible; and when the fear of worse consequences obliged him again to comply, he expressly added a new fee of his royal dignity or prerogative, which in effect enervated the whole force of the charters.

The two ears and their adherents left the parliament in disgust; and the king was constrained, on a future occasion, to make a more formal declaration of his pure and absolute confirmation of those laws, which were so much the object of their passionate affection. Even further securities were then provided for the establishment of national privilege. Three knights, appointed to be chosen in each county, and were invested with the power of punishing, by fine and imprisonment, every transgression or violation of the charters; a precaution, which, though it was soon disused, as encroaching too much on royal prerogative, proves the attachment which the English in that age bore to liberty, and their well-grounded jealousy of the arbitrary disposition of Edward.

The work, however, was not yet entirely finished and complete. In order to execute the lesser charter, it was requisite, by new perambulations, to set bounds to the royal forests, and to dispossess all land which former encroachments rendered waste. Edward discovered the same reluctance to comply with this equitable demand; and it was not till after many delays on his part, and many solicitations and requests, and a few days' imprisonment of the chief of the barons, that the perambulations were made, and exact boundaries fixed, by a jury in each county, to the extent of his forests. Had not his ambitious and active temper raged against the customs and habits of his time, he might have recourse so often to the assistance of his subjects, it is not likely that those concessions could ever have been extorted from him.

But while the people, after so many successful struggles, deemed themselves happy in the secure possession of their privileges, they were surprised in 1305 to find that Edward had secretly applied to Rome, and had procured from that mercenary court an absolution from all the oaths and engagements, which he had so often reiterated, to observe both the charters. There are some historians so credulous as to imagine, that this perilous step was taken by him for no other purpose than to acquire the merit of granting charters or confirmations of charters, as he did so soon after; and a confirmation so much the more unquestionable, as it could never after be invalidated by his successors, on pretence of any force or violence which he might have used against them. But the granting of this might have been done with a better grace, if he had never applied for any such absolution, the whole tenor of his conduct proves him to be little susceptible of such refinements in patronage and this very deed itself, in which he never confirmed the charters, carries the face of it a very opposite presumption. Though he ratified the charters in general, he still took advantage of the papal bull so far as to invalidate the late perambulations of the forests, which had been made with such care and attention, and to reserve to himself the power, in case of its favourable incidents, to create and extend his own arbitrary jurisdictions. If the power was not in fact made use of, we can only conclude, that the favourable incidents did not offer.

Thus, after the contests of near a whole century, and these ever accompanied with violent jealousies, often with public convulsions, the Great Charter was finally established; and the English nation have the honour of extorting, by their own strength, the defence of their liberties, the most warlike, and the most ambitious of all their princes. It is computed, that above thirty confirmations of the charters were at different times required of these kings, and granted by them, in full parliament; a precaution which, while it discovers some ignorance of the true nature of law and government, proves a laudable jealousy of national privileges in the people, and an extreme anxiety lest contrary precedents should ever be pleased as an authority for restraining them. Accordingly, we find that though arbitrary practices often prevailed, and were even able to establish themselves into settled customs, the validity of the Great Charter was never afterwards formally questioned and disputed, but was regarded as the basis of English government, and the sure rule by which the authority of every custom was to be tried and examined. The jurisdiction of the Star-chamber, martinet courts, imprisonment, and perambulations, of privy-council, and other practices of a like nature, though established for several centuries, were scarcely ever allowed by the English to be parts of their constitution: the affection of the nation for liberty still prevailed over all precedent, and even all political reasoning: the exercise of these powers, after being long the source of secret murmurs among the people, was, in fullness of time, solemnly abolished as illegal, at least as oppressive, by the whole legislative authority.

To return to the period from which this account of the charters has led us: though the king's impatience to appear at the head of his armies in Flanders made him overlook all considerations, either of domestic dispatches or of commotions among the Scots; his embarkation had been so long retarded by the various obstructions thrown in his way, that he lost the proper season for action, and after one memorable battle, and the defeat of the enemy, the King of France, taking advantage of his absence, had broken into the Low Countries; had defeated the Flemings in the battle of Furnes; had made himself master of Ypres, St. Omer, and many other places, and seemed in a situation to take full vengeance on the Earl of Flanders, his rebellious vassal. But Edward, seconded by an English army of 30,000 men, (for this number assigned by historians, was able to stop the career of his victories; and Philip, finding all the weak resources of his kingdom already exhausted, began to dread a reverse of fortune, and to apprehend an invasion on France itself. The King of England on the other hand, disappointed of assistance from Adolph, King of the Romans, which he bad purchased at a very high price, and finding many urgent calls for his presence in England, was desirous of easing, on any honourable terms, a war which, as it is said, next to the execution of more important projects. This disposition in both monarchs soon produced a cessation of hostilities for two years; and engaged them to submit their differences to the arbitration of Pons de Bouches.

Boniface was among the last of the sovereign pontiffs that exercised an authority over the temporal jurisdiction of princes; and these exorbitant pretensions which he had been attempted to assume from the successful example of his predecessors, but of which the season was now past, involved him in so many calamities, and were attended with so unfortunate a catastrophe, that they have been scarcely abandoned, though never openly relinquished, by his successors in the apotolic chair. Edward and Philip, equally jealous of papal claims, took care to insert in their reference, that Boniface was made judge of the difference by their consent, as a prudent conduct in right of the Pope; and the Pope, without seeming to be offended at this mortifying clause, proceeded to give a sentence between them, in which they both acquiesced. 9 He brought them to agree, that the Pope should be and was increased, and that of Edward himself, who was now a widower, with Margaret, Philip's sister, and that of the Prince of Wales, with Isabella, daughter of that monarch. 10 Philip was likewise willing to restore Guinevere to the English, which he himself, indeed, no word prudence to desire; but he insisted that the Scots, and their king, John Baliol, should, as his allies, be comprehended in the treaty, and should be Pard with restored to their liberty. The difference, after several disputes, was compromised, by their making mutual sacrifices to each other. Edward agreed to abandon his ally, the Earl of Flanders, on contition that Philip should treat in like manner his ally, the Earl of Scots. The prospect of conquering these two countries, whose situation made them so commodious an acquisition to the respective kingdoms, prevailed over all other considerations; and though they were both finally dismissed with this noble offer, their contract was very recep-tible to the principles of an interested policy. This was the first specimen which the Scots had of the French alliance, and which was exactly conformable to what a small power may always expect, when it blindly attaches itself to the will and fortunes of a greater. That unhappy people, now engaged in a brave though unequal contest for their liberties, were totally abandoned, by the ally in whom they reposed their final confidence, to the will of an insolent conqueror.

Revisit of England, as well as other European countries, was, in its ancient state, very ill qualifyed for making, and still worse for maintaining, conquest. Scots, Selden, and very much inferior in its military force, and was so ill situated for receiving foreign succours, that it is no wonder Edward, an ambitious monarch, should have cast his eye on so tempting an acquisition, which brought both security and greatness to his native country. But the instruments whom he employed to maintain his dominion over the northern kingdom, were not happily chosen; and acted not with the requisite prudence and solicitude in the prosecution of his plan. The late Sir John of Cressingham, and Cressingham, who bore the office of treasurer; and a small military force remained, to secure the precariuous authority of those ministers. The latter had no other object than the amassing of money by rapine and injustice:
the former distinguished himself by the rigour and severity of his temper: and both of them, treating the Scots as a conquered people, made them sensible, too early, of the grievous servitude into which they had fallen. As Edward required that all the proprietors of land should swear fidelity to him, every one who refused or delayed giving this testimony of submission, was outlawed and imprisoned, and punished without mercy; and the bravest and most generous part of the nation were thus exasperated, to the highest degree, against the English government.

There was one William Wallace, of a small fortune, but descended of an ancient family in the west of Scotland, who never openly renounced, by his ancestors in the apostolic chair. Edward required that all the proprietors of land should swear fidelity to him, every one who refused or delayed giving
this testimony of submission, was outlawed and imprisoned,
and punished without mercy; and the bravest and most generous part of the nation were thus exasperated, to
the highest degree, against the English government.8

This man, whose valorous exploits are the object of just admiration, but not the subject of imitation, by his nation, was thus exasperated; and the prop-
totions of his countrymen, had been provoked by the insolence of an English officer to put him to death; and finding himself obstinately, on that account, to the severity of the administration, he fled into the woods, and offered himself as a leader to all those whom his crimes, or bad fortune, or avowed hatred of the English, had reduced to a like necessity. He was endowed with gigantic force of body, with heroic courage of mind, with disinterested magnanimity, with incredible patience, and ability, to bear brutal treatment, to answer the ravings of hunger, for which he was not more sensitive than a pauper, when he sooon acquired, among those desperate fugitives, that authority to which his virtues so justly entitled him.
Beginning with small attempts, in which he was always successful, he proceeded to more momentous enterprises; and he discovered equal caustion in executing his followers, and valor in annoying the enemy. By his knowledge of the country, he was enabled, when pursued, to assure a retreat among the moorasses, or forests, or mountains, and thereby favoured and protected himself, he unexpectedly appeared in another quarter, and surpised, and routed, and put to the sword, the unwary English. Every day brought accounts of his great actions, which were received with no less favour by his countrymen than terror by the enemy: all those who thirsted after military fame were desirous to partake of his renown: his successful valour seemed to vindicate the nation from the ignominy of the same, in which it had been involved, as long as it was subject to the English: and though no nobleman of note ventured as yet to join his party, he had gained a general confidence and attachment, which birth and fortune are not alone able to confer.

Wallace having, by many fortunate enterprises, brought the valour of his followers to correspond to his own, resolved to strike a decisive blow against the English government; and he concerted the plan of obtaining an army of 40,000 men, of whom he expected to find an equal number at Scote, and of taking vengeance on him for all the vioience and tyranny of which he had been guilty. The scourge, apprized of his intentions, fled hastily into England; all the other officers of that nation imitated his example: they were alarmed at the thought of being brought round to the Scots, who betook themselves to arms in every quarter. Many of the principal barons, and among the rest Sir William Douglas, 9 openly countenanced Wallace's party: RobertBruce, and many other gentlemen in Scotland, were for the most part convinced, that the purpose of the English was to enslave Scotland, and to consolidate his dominion. Bruce, finding that no salvage of himself, promised to deliver hostages for their good behaviour, and received a pardon for past delicts.5 Others who had not yet declared themselves, such as the Steward of Scotland and the Earl of Lenox, joined, though with reluctance, the English army; and wished a favourable opportunity for enhancing the cause of their distressed country. But Wallace, whose authority over his retainers was more fully confirmed by the presence of his noble companions, persevered obstinately in his purpose; and finding himself unable to give battle to the enemy, he resolved to retire into the mountains, by its isolation of ominating the war, and of turning to his advantage the situation of that mountainous and barren country. When Wallace advanced to Surling, he found Wallace encamp-who sincerely adhered to the English, he ordered his army to pass a bridge which lay over the Forth; but he was soon convinced, by fatal experience, of the error of his conduct. Wallace, allowing such numbers of the English to pass, to serve his front; lined the interval behind the bridge, and when they were fully formed, put them to rout, pushed part of them into the river, destroyed the rest by the edge of the sword, and gained a complete victory over them. Among the slain were those whom they expected the most, an extremely odious to the Scots, that they flayed their dead body, and made saddles and girds of his skin. Warrene, finding the remainder of his army much dismayed by the first success, was obliged to retire to his own, and remain behind the bridge, and retire into England. The castles of Roxborough and Berwick, ill fortified and feebly defended, fell soon after into the hands of the Scots.

Wallace, universally revered as the deliverer of his country, now received, from the hands of his followers, the dignity of regent or guardian under the captive Rabid; and finding that the disorders of war, as well as the unfavourable seasons, had produced a famine in Scotland, he urged his army to march into England, to subsist at the expense of the enemy, and to revenge all past injuries by retaliating on that hostile nation. The Scots, who deemed every thing possible under such a leader, joyfully attended his advice. In the meantime, he employed during the winter season, hid every place waste with fire and sword; and after extending on all sides, without opposition, the fury of his ravages as far as the bishopric of Durham, and the counties of Lincoln and Yorkshire, he returned with glory, into his own country. The disorders which at that time prevailed in England, from the refractory behaviour of the constable and mareschal, made it impossible to collect an army sufficient of their enemy, and exposed the nation to this loss and dishonour.

But Edward, who received in Flanders intelligence of these events, and had already concluded a truce with France, would not allow himself to be imposed upon by his activity and valor, not only of wipping off this disgrace, but of recovering the important conquest of Scotland, which he always regarded as the chief glory and advantage of his reign. He appeared immediately, and was received by the citizens of London the election of their own magistrates, of which they had been bereaved in the latter part of his father's reign; he ordered strict inquiry to be made concerning the corn and other goods which had been violently seized before his departure, as if he intended to pay the value to the owners; and making public professions of confining and observing the charters, he regained the confidence of the disaffected, and himself, with his brother Edward, the popular arts, rendered himself entire master of his people, he collected the whole military force of England, Wales, and Ireland, and marched with an army of near a thousand thousand men, to the north country, and to the northern frontiers.

Nothing could have enabled the Scots to resist, but for one season, so mighty a power, except an entire union among themselves; but as they were deprived of their king, whose personal qualities, even when he was present, appeared so contemptible, and had left among his subjects no principle of attachment to him or his family; factions, jealousies, and animosities unavoidable arose among the great, and distracted all their councils. The elevation of Wallace, though purchased by so great merit, and such eminent services, was the object of envy to the nobility, who repined to see a private gentleman raised above them by his rank, and still more by his glory and reputation.

Wallace himself, sensible of their jealousy, and dreading the ruin of his country from those intestine discord, voluntarily resigned his authority, and retained only the command over that body of his followers, who, being accustomed to victory under his standard, refused to follow into the field any other leader. The chief power devolved on the Stewart of Scotland, and Cummin of Badenoch; men of equal birth, under whom the great chieftains were more willing to serve. The two Scottish commanders, collecting their several forces from every quarter, fixed their station at Falkirk, and purposed there to abide the assault of the English. Wallace was at the head of a third body, which acted under his command. The Scottish army placed their pikemen along the whole of their front; followed the interval, and loaded the great superiority of the English in cavalry, endeavoured to secure their front by pulliards, tied together by ropes. In this disposition they expected the entrance of the English archers, and to divide his army into three bodies, he led them to the attack. The English archers, who began about this time to suffer those of other nations, first chascd the Scottish bowmen off the field; then pouring in their arrows among the pikemen, who were cooled up within their intrenchments, threw them into disorder, and rendered the assault of the English pikemen and cavalry more easy and successful. The whole Scottish army was broken, and chased off the field with great slaughter; which the historian, attending more to the exaggerated relations of the populace, than to the probability of things, make amount to fifty or sixty thousand men. It is only certain, that the Scots never suffered a greater loss in any action, and what appeared to threaten more irrevocable ruin to their country.

In this general rout of the army, Wallace's military skill and presence of mind enabled him to keep his troops entire; he made the Cavally charge, and retiring on the Carloway, along the banks of that small river, which protected him from the enemy. Young Bruce, who had already given many proofs of his aspiring genius, but who served hitherto under the English, appeared on this occasion, and distinguished the Scottish chief, as well by his majestic port as by the intrepid activity of his behaviour, called out to him, and desired a short conference. He here represent to Wallace the danger which was prepared for him, which he was engaged; and endeavoured to bend his inflexible spirit to submission under superior power and superior fortune. He insisted on the unequal contest between a weak state, deposed of its head and agitation by internal discord, and a mighty nation, conducted by the ablest and most martial monarch of the age, and possessed of every resource either for proscribing the war, or for pushing it with vigour and activity. If the love of his country, and his motive for perseverance, his obstinacy tended only to prolong her misery; if he carried his views to private grandeur and ambition, he might reflect, that, even if Edward should withdraw his armies, it appeared from past experience, that the loss of Scotland, and the pre-emience of their families, would never submit to personal merit, whose superiority they were less inclined to regard as an object of admiration, than as a reproach and injury to themselves. To these exhortations he replied, that, if he had hitherto acted alone as the champion of his country, it was solely because no second or competitor, or what he rather wished, no leader, had yet appeared to place himself in that honourable station; that the blame lay entirely on the nobility, and chiefly on Bruce himself, who wanting personal merit to dignify of family, had desert ed the post which both nature and fortune, by such powerful calls, invited him to assume; that the Scots possessed of such a head, would, by their unanimity and concord, have surmounted the chief difficulty under which they now laboured, and might hope, notwithstanding their present misfortunes, to recover all their past glory and abilities of Edward; that Heaven itself could not set a more glorious prize before the eyes either of virtue or ambition, than to join, in one object, the acquisition of royalty with the defence of national independence; and that as the interests of his country, more than those of any man, could never be sincerely cultivated by a sacrifice of liberty, he himself was determined, as far as possible, to prolong, not her misery, but her freedom, and was desirous that his own life, as well as the existence of the nation, might terminate, when they could no otherwise be pro-served than by prevailing the chains of a haughty victor. The gallantry of these sentiments, though delivered to an armed enemy, struck the generous mind of Bruce; the flame was conveyed from the breast of one hero to that of another; he repented of his engagements with Edward; and opening his breast to the heroism pointed out to him by Wallace, secretly determined to seize the first opportunity of embracing the cause, however desperate, of his oppressed country. A.D. 1299.

Conquering this great victory of Edward, was not yet entirely completed. The English army, after reducing the southern provinces, was obliged to retire for want of provisions; and left the northern counties in the hands of the Scotch. The Scots, not less enraged at their present defeat, than elated by their past victories, still maintained the costest for liberty; but being fully sensible of the great inferiority of their force, they endeavoured, by applications to foreign courts, to procure to themselves some assistance. The supplications of the Scottish ministers were rejected by Philip; but were more successful with the court of Rome. Boniface, pleased with an occasion of exerting his authority, wrote a letter to Edward, exhorting him to put a stop to his oppressions on Scotland, and displaying all the proofs, such as they had probably been furnished him by the Scots themselves, for the ancient independence of the Scotch kingdom. Among other arguments, in a paragraph hinted at above, he mentioned the treaty conducted and finished by Edward himself, for the marriage of his son with the heiress of Scotland; a marriage which had been wholly abjured, had he been a superior lord of the kingdom, and had possessed, by the feudal law, the right of disposing of his ward in marriage. He mentioned several other striking facts, which fell within the compass of Edward's own knowledge, particular to Alexander, when he did homage to the king, openly and expressly declared in his presence, that he swore fealty, not for his crown, but for the lands which he held in England: and the Pope's letter might have passed for a reality stroke on the British monarchy. It is not possible to enumerate all the particulars of these arguments, as the Pope's letter, containing particulars no less singular and remarkable. It there proves the superiority of England by historical facts, deduced from the particulars of the Trojan, who, as a British monarchy in the age of Eli and Samuel: he supports his position by all the events which passed in the island before the arrival of the Romans: and after laying great stress on the extensive dominions and heroic victories of King Arthur, he vouchsafes at last to descend to the time of Edward the elder, with which, in his speech to the states of Scotland, he had chosen to begin his claim of supremacy. He asserts it to be, a fact, notorious and confirmed by the records of antiquity, that the English monarchs had often conferred the kingdom of Scotland on their own subjects; had dethroned these vassal kings when unfaithful to them; and had substituted others in their stead. He displays, which may amount, the full and complete homage which William had done to Henry II. without mentioning the formal abdication of that exerted dux of King Richard, and the renunciation of all future claims of the same nature. Yet this paper he begins with a solemn appeal to the Almighty, the Searcher of hearts, for his own firm persuasion of the justice of his claim; and no less than a hundred and four bars assembled in public council, in Lincoln, concur in this opinion. The Pope, under their seals, the validity of these pretensions. At the same time, however, they take care to inform Boniface, that though they had justly caused their

*This story is told by all the Scotch writers: though it must be owned that Trivet and Hemingford, authors of good credit, both agree that Bruce was present at that time with Edward's army.

Edward, having completed his conquest, which employed him during the space of near two years, now undertook the more difficult work of settling the country, of establishing a new form of government, and of making his acquisition durable to the crown of England. He seems to have carried matters to extremity against the natives: he arrogated all the Scottish laws and customs; he endeavored to substitute the English to their place; he entirely rased or destroyed all the monuments of antiquity: such records or histories as had escaped his former search were now burnt or dispersed: and he hastened by too precipitate steps, to abolish entirely the Scottish name, and to sink it finally in the English.

Edward, however, still deemed his former conquest exposed to some danger, so long as Wallace was alive; and being prompted both by revenge and policy, he employed every art to discover his retreat, and become master of his person. At last, that hardy warrior, who was determined, amidst the universal cries of joy, still to maintain his independence, was betrayed into Edward's hands by Sir John Monteil, his friend, whom he had made acquainted with the place of his concealment. The king, whose usual severity, in the absence of the English, had made him to respect like qualities in an enemy, enraged at some acts of violence committed by Wallace during the fury of war, resolved to overawe the Scots by an example of severity: he ordered Wallace to be carried to the castle of Castle, where he was to be tried as a traitor, though he had never made submissions, or sworn fealty to England, and to be executed on Towerhill. This was the unworthy fate of a hero, who, through a course of many years, had possessed the respect of his countrymen, industry, perseverance, defended, against a public and oppressive enemy, the liberties of his native country.

But the barbarous policy of Edward failed of the purpose to which it was directed. The Scots, already distrustful at the great innovations introduced by the sword of a conqueror into their laws and government, were further enraged at the injustice and cruelty exercised upon Wallace; and all the people, which, during his life-time, had attended that gallant chief, being now buried in his grave, he was universally regarded as the champion of Scotland, and the patron of her expiring independence. The people, inflamed with resentment, were everywhere directed against the king, and, as he found himself in a dangerous situation, he was not long ere a new and more fortunate leader presented himself, who conducted them to liberty, to victory, and to vengeance.

It is the opinion of Robert Bruce, grandson of that Robert Bruce, who had been one of the competitors for the crown, that he had succeeded, by his grandfather's and father's death, to all their rights; and the demise of John Baliol, together with the captivity of Edward, eldest son of that prince, seemed to open a full career to the genius and ambition of this young oboleman. He saw that the Scots, whose the title to their crown had expired in the males of their ancient royal family, had been divided into parties nearly equal between the houses of Bruce and Balliol; and that every incident, which had since happened, had tended to weaken them from any attachment to the latter. The slender capacity of John had proved unable to defend him against his enemies; he had been reduced by the weight of events, and had lost the crown into the hands of the conqueror: he had, before his deliverance from captivity, renounced that resignation in a manner seemingly voluntary; and had in that deed thrown out many reflections which bore hardly upon his ancient subjects, whom he publicly called traitors, ruffians, and rebels, and with whom he declared he was determined to maintain no further correspondence: he had, during the time of captivity, held himself subject to resolution; and his son, being a prisoner, seemed ill qualified to revive the rights, now fully abandoned, of his family. Bruce therefore hoped that the Scots, so long exposed, from the want of a leader, to the oppressions of their enemies, would onaniously fly to his standard, and would seat him on the vacant throne, to which he brought such plausible pretensions. His aspiring spirit, inflamed by the fervour of youth, and buoyed up by his natural courage, saw the glory alone of the enterprise, or regarded the provisos of the undertaking as mere appendages to the main object, only of further glory. The miseries and oppressions which he had beheld his countrymen suffer in this unequal contest; the repeated defeats and misfortunes which they had undergone; proved to him so many incentives to bring them relief, and conduct them to vengeance against the haughty victor. The circumstances which attended Bruce's first declaration are various related; but we shall rather follow the account given by the Scottish historians; not that their authority is in general anywise comparable to that of the English, but because they may be supposed sometimes better informed concerning facts which so nearly interested their own nation.

Bruce, who had long harboured in his breast the design of freeing his enslaved country, ventured at last to open his mind to John Cummin, a powerful obolemman, with whom he lived in strict intimacy. He found his friend, and the slaughters of the English, so fared at home, that he was determined to use every art of persuasion, to make him embrace the resolution of throwing off, on the first favourable opportunity, the usurped dominion of the English. But knowing how implacably Bruce had abhorred the name of Edward to London, Cummin, who either had all along assembled with him, or began to reflect more coolly in his absence on the desperate nature of the undertaking, resolved to settle for his crime in ascertaining this rebellion, by the means of a league of Edward to England. Edward did not immediately commit Bruce to custody; because he intended, at the same time, to seize his three brothers, who resided in Scotland; and he contrived himself with secret setting spies upon him, and ordering all his motions to be strictly watched. A nobleman of Edward's court, Bruce's intimate friend, was apprised of his danger; but not daring, amongst so many jealous eyes, to hold any conversation with him, but fell on an expeditious to give him warning, that it was full time he should make his escape. He sent him, by his servant, a pair of gift spurs, and a purse of gold, which he pretended to have borrowed from him; and it was the sagacity of his friend to discover the meaning of the present. Bruce immediately contrived the means of his escape; and as the ground was at that time covered with snow, he had the precaution, it is said, to order his horses to be shod with their shoes with sand on the soles, that he might more easily track his path over the open fields or cross roads, through which he purposed to travel. He arrived in a few days at Dumfries in Amandelle, the chief seat of his family interest; and he happily found there the Scottish nobility there assembled, and among the rest, John Cummin, his former associate.

The noblemen were astonished at the appearance of Bruce among them; and still more when he discovered to them the object of his journey. He told them that he was come to live or die with them in defence of the liberties of his country, and hoped, with their assistance, to redeem the Scottish name from all the indignities which it had so long suffered from the tyranny of their imperious masters: that the sacrifice of the rights of his family was the first injury which had prepared the way for their ensuing slavery; and by recovering them, which was his firm purpose, he hoped to open to them the joyful prospect of recovering from the fraudulent usurper-their ancient and hereditary independence: that all past misfortunes had proceeded from their dissension; and that the sooner they were united, the sooner they could throw off the yoke of Brute, and recover their liberty from all the efforts of the Roman empire, would still be sufficient, were they worthy of their generous ancestors, to defend them against the utmost violence of the English tyrant; that it was unbecoming... men, born to the most ancient independence known in Europe, to submit to the will of any masters; but fatal to receive those who, being irritated by such persevering resistance, and inflamed with the highest animosity, with never deigning to spare, sought the annihilation of their monarchy and dominion, but by exterminating all the ancient nobility, and even all the ancient inhabitants; and that, being reduced to this desperate extremity, it was better for them at once to perish like brave men, with swords in their hands, than to dread long, and at last undergo the scourge of the unfortunate Wallace, whose merits, in the brave and obstinate defence of his country, were finally rewarded by the hands of an English executioner:

The spirit with which this discourse was delivered, the bold sentiments which it conveyed, the novelty of Bruce's declaration, assisted by the graces of his youth and manly deportment, made deep impression on the minds of his auditors. Thus, as by all the means then in use, ran to Cummin, and revenge with which they had so long been secretly actuated. The Scottish nobles declared their unanimous resolution to use the utmost efforts in delivering their country and estates to the Pope, and to join the brave Bruce, in asserting his and their undoubted rights against their common oppressors. Cummin alone, who had secretly taken his measures with the king, opposed this general determination; but, by reviving the greater power of England, governed by a prince of such uncommon vigour and abilities, he endeavoured to set before them the certain destruction which they must expect, if they persisted in their opinions of Bruce as a leader, took immediately his resolution; and moved partly by resentment, partly by policy, followed Cummin on the dissolution of the assembly, attacked him in the cloisters of the Grey Friars, through which he passed, and running him through the body, left him his head only. Thomas Kirkpatrick, one of Bruce's friends, asking him soon after if the traitor were slain; I believe so, replied Bruce. And is that a matter, cried Kirkpatrick, to be left to conjecture? I will secure him. The family of Kirkpatrick took for the crest of their arms, which they still wear, a hand with a bloody dagger; and chose for their motto these words, I will secure him; an epitaph enamelled by their ancestor when he executed that violent act.

Third revolt of the murder of Cummin affixed the seal to the conspiracy of the Scottish nobles: they had now assurance left but to renounce the yoke of England, or to perish in the attempt: the genius of the nation roused itself from its present dejection: and Bruce, flying to different quarters, excited his partizans to arms, attacked with success the dispersed bodies of the English, got possession of many of the castles, and having made his authority be acknowledged in most parts of the kingdom, was solemnly crowned and inaugurated in the abbey of St. Andrews, by the Bishop of that see, who zealously embraced his cause. The English were again chased out of the kingdom, except such as took shelter in the castles that still remained in their hands; and Edward found that the Scots, twice conquered in his reign, and often defeated, must yet be once again subdued. Not discouraged with these unexpected difficulties, he sent Aymer de Valence with a considerable force into Scotland, to check the progress of the insurrections; and the flaw of fortune which attended him in this enterprise was also in this case a providence to the 6a. But this proved of no advantage to the conquerors, as by all the means then in use, he was delivered, the bold sentiments which it conveyed, the novelty of Bruce's declaration, assisted by the graces of his youth and manly deportment, made deep impression on the minds of his auditors. Thus, as by all the means then in use, ran to Cummin, and revenge with which they had so long been secretly actuated. The Scottish nobles declared their unanimous resolution to use the utmost efforts in delivering their country and estates to the Pope, and to join the brave Bruce, in asserting his and their undoubted rights against their common oppressors. Cummin alone, who had secretly taken his measures with the king, opposed this general determination; but, by reviving the greater power of England, governed by a prince of such uncommon vigour and abilities, he endeavoured to set before them the certain destruction which they must expect, if they persisted in their opinions of Bruce as a leader, took immediately his resolution; and moved partly by resentment, partly by policy, followed Cummin on the dissolution of the assembly, attacked him in the cloisters of the Grey Friars, through which he passed, and running him through the body, left him his head only. Thomas Kirkpatrick, one of Bruce's friends, asking him soon after if the traitor were slain; I believe so, replied Bruce. And is that a matter, cried Kirkpatrick, to be left to conjecture? I will secure him. The family of Kirkpatrick took for the crest of their arms, which they still wear, a hand with a bloody dagger; and chose for their motto these words, I will secure him; an epitaph enamelled by their ancestor when he executed that violent act.
repressed robberies and disorders; encouraged trade, by giving merchants an easy method of recovering their debts; and in short, introduced a new face of things by the vigour and wisdom of his administration. As law began now to be well established, the abuse of that blessing began also to be remarked. Instead of their former associations for robbery and violence, men entered into formal combinations to support each other in law-suits; and a sound requisite to check this iniquity by act of parliament.

There happened in this reign a considerable alteration in the execution of the laws: the king abolished the office of chief justice, which he thought possessed too much power. He was an excellent master to the crown: he completed the division of the court of exchequer into four distinct courts, which managed, each, its several branch, without dependence on any one magistrate; and as the lawyers afterwards invented a method, by means of their fictions, of carrying business from one court to another, the several courts became rivals and checks to each other; a circumstance which tended much to improve the practice of the law in England.

But though Edward appeared thus, throughout his whole reign, a friend to law and justice, it cannot be said that he was an enemy to arbitrary power; and in a government more regular than was customary in England in his age, such practices, as those which may be remarked in his administration, would have given sufficient ground of complaint, and sometimes were, even in his own time, much commented on; such as the plunder and devastation of the Jews; the putting of the whole clergy at once, and by an arbitrary edict, out of the protection of the law; the seizing of all the wool and leather of the kingdom; the heightening of the impositions on the commonalty valuable, the new and illegal commission of Trailbaston; the taking of all the money and plate of monasteries and churches, even before he had any quarrel with the clergy; the subjecting of every marriage to the payment of a large sum of money, and this without due process of law; such as the procuring of the Pope's dispensation from the oaths which he had taken to observe that charter; and his levying of tallages at discretion even after the statute, or rather charter, by which he had renounced that prerogative; these are some of the most notable instances of his arbitrary disposition, and prove with what ease and reserve we ought to celebrate his love of justice. He took care that his subjects should be justice to each other; but he desired all, and he had a care of his officers in their transactions, both with them and with their neighbours.

The chief obstacle to the execution of justice in those times was the power of the great barons; and Edward was perfectly qualified, by his character and abilities, for keeping these tyrants in awe, and restraining their illegal practices. This salutary purpose was accordingly the great object of his attention; yet he was immoderately led into a measure which tended to increase and confirm their dangerous authority. He passed a statute which, by allowing them to entail their estates, made it impracticable to diminish the property of the great families, and left them in the enjoyment of their inheritances.

Edward observed a contrary policy with regard to the church: he seems to have been the first Christian prince that passed a statute of mortmain; and prevented by law the close and secret mode of mortifying new lands, which, by the ecclesiastical canons, they were for ever prohibited from alienating. The opposition between his maxims with regard to the nobility and to the ecclesiastics, leads us to conjecture that it was only by chance he professed a beneficial intention to the commons, in order to maintain the number of knights' fees, and to prevent the sepoirs from being defrauded of the profits of warlands, og of the cloth abroad, particularly at Antwerp. For the English at this time scarcely thought of any more distant commerce. This king granted a charter of declaration of protection and privileges to foreign merchants, and also ascertainment of the other duties which those merchants were in return to pay on merchandise imported and exported. He promised them security; allowed them a jury on trials, consisting half of natives, half of foreigners; and appointed the court of barons in London for their protection. But notwithstanding this seeming attention to foreign merchants, Edward did not free them from the cruel hardship of making one answerable for the debts, and even for the crimes, of another, the same event resulting, very often, to the injury of the ignorant. Because of the organizing the company of the present barbarous nations. The king also imposed on them a duty of two shillings on each tun of wine imported, over and above the old duty; and forty pence on each sack of wool exported, besides half a mark, the former duty.

In the year 1303, the Exchequer was robbed, and of no less a sum than 100,000 pounds, as is pretended. The abbot and monks of Westminster were indicted for this robbery, but acquitted. It does not appear that the king ever discovered the criminals with certainty; though his indignation fell on the society of Lombard merchants, particularly the Florentines, very openly. The Pope having in 1307 collected much money in England, the king enjoined the oncino not to export it in specie, but in bills of exchange. A proof that commerce was still understood at that time. Edward had by his first wife, Eleanor of Castle, four sons; but Edward his heir and successor was the only one that survived him. She also bore him eleven daughters, most of whom died in their infancy; of the surviving, Joan was married, first to the Earl of Gloucester, and after his death to Ralph de Montemer, Margaret espoused John, Duke of Brabant; Elizabeth espoused, first John, Earl of Holland, and afterwards the Earl of Hereford; Mary was a nun at Amesbury. He had by his second wife, Margaret of France, two sons and a daughter; Thomas created Earl of Norfolk, and Mareschal of England; and Edmund, who was created Earl of Kent by his brother when king. The princess died in her infancy.

A. D. 1307. The possessorsentiments in favour of young Edward, kept the English from being fully sensible of the extreme loss which they had sustained by the death of the great monarch who filled the throne; and all men hastened with alacrity to take the oath of allegiance to his son and successor. This prince was in the twenty-third year of his age, was of an agreeable figure, of a mild and gentle disposition, and having never discovered a propensity to any dangerous vice, it was natural to prognosticate tranquillity and happiness from Weakness of the government. But the first act of his reign was, to return hasted all these hopes, and showed himself to be totally unqualified for that perilous situation, to which every English monarch, during those ages, had, from the unstable form of the constitution, and the turbulent dispositions of the people derived from it, the misfortune to be placed. The undaftagible Robert Bruce, though his army had been dispersed, and he himself had been obliged to take shelter in the western isles, remained not long inactive; but, before the death of the late king, had salied from his retreat, and again collected his followers, had appeared in the field, and had obtained by suprise an important advantage over Aymer de Valence, who commanded the English forces. He was now become so considerable as to have added the King of England sufficient glory in subduing him, without incurring any danger of seeing all those mighty preparations, made by his father, fail in the enterprise. But Edward, instead of pursuing his advantage, which was the outset, rapidly turned southward, and pressed into Scotland; and having an utter incapacity and equal aversion for all application or serious business, he immediately returned upon his footsteps and disbanded his army. His grandees perceived from this conduct, that the authority of the English monarch was as insufficient to support such fabulous to be dreaded, and that every insolence might be practised by them with impunity.

The next measure taken by Edward gave his passion for favourites. He now attacked those nobles which no longer kept them in awe. There was one Piers Gavaston, son of a Gascoigne knight, of some distinction, who had honourably served the late king, and who, in reward of his services, had obtained an establishment for his son in the family of the prince of Wales. This young man soon insinuated himself into the affections of his master, by his agreeable behaviour, and by supporting his reckless projects with unceasing amusements, which suited his capacity and his inclinations. He was endowed with the utmost elegance of shape and person, was noted for fine men and easy carriage, and was reckoned himself in all respects well suited for various exercises, and was celebrated for those quick sallies of wit, in which his countrymen usually excel. By all these accomplishments he gained so entire an ascendant over young Edward, whose heart was disposed to make him his friend and confidence, that the late king, apprehensive of the consequences, had banished him the kingdom, and had, before he died, made his son promise never to recall him. But no sooner did he find himself master, as he vainly called it, of the crown, than he recalled Gavaston, and without any ceremony, or even before his arrival at court, endowed him with the whole earldom of Cornwall, which he had escheated to the crown by the death of Edmond, son of Richard, King of the Romans; and seemed to enjoy with indifference his royal dignity, as but it enabled him to exalt to the highest splendour this object of his fond affections.

The haughty barons, offended at the supere
courtship of the favourite, whose birth, though quite respectable, was not respectable; whose conduct, though quite respectable, was not respectable to the great officers of state, whose name, though quite respectable, was not respectable to the great officers of state, were displeased in the way they were used, in the way they were used, and, concealing not their discontent; and soon found reasons to justify their animosity in the character and conduct of the man they deplored. Instead of diminishing envy by every means of gratification and modesty of his behaviour, Gavaston displayed his power and influence with the utmost ostentation; and deemed no circumstance of his good fortune so agreeable, as its enabling him to eclipse and mortify all his rivals. He was vainglorious, profuse, rapacious; fond of exterior pomp and appearance, giddy with prosperity; and as he imagined that his fortune was now as strongly rooted in the kingdom, as his ascendant was uncontrolled over the weak princes, who were so unprepared to meet him, that he might support his sudden and ill-estabished gran deur. At all tournaments he took delight in foiling the English nobility by his superior address; in every conversarion he made them the object of his wit and raillery; every day his enemies multiplied upon him; and nought but wanting but a little time to cement their union, and render it fatal both to him and to his master. It became the king to take a firm hold of France, both in order to do homage for the duchy of Guienne, and to espouse the Princess Isabella, to whom he had long been attached, though unexpected accidents had hitherto retarded the completion of the marriage. Edward left Gavaston, Guardian of the realm, with more ample powers than had usually been conferred upon him, returned with his young queen, renewed all the proofs of that fond attachment to the favourite, of which every one so loudly complained. His behavior was of an insinuating and inguining spirit; and finding that her husband's capacity required, as his temperament inclined, him to be governed, she thought herself best entitled, on every account, to perform the remainder of his conduct in the kingdom. A revolt against the person who had disappointed her in these expectations. She was well pleased therefore to see a combination of the nobility forming against Gavaston, who, sensible of her talents, had wantonly provoked her by new insults and injuries.

Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, cousin-german to the king, and first prince of the blood, was by far the most opulent and powerful subject in England, and possessed in his own right, and soon after in that of his wife, heretofore the family of Lincoln, no less than six baronies, with a proportionable estate in land, attended with all the jurisdictions and powers, which commonly in that age were exercised. He was ambitious and factious in his disposition; mortally hated the favourite, whose influence over the king exceeded his own; and he soon became the head of that party among the barons, who were called the king's friends, and were the midwife of civil war; and the royal authority, despised in the king's own hands, and hated in those of Gavaston, became insufficient for the execution of the laws, and the maintenance of order. He was summoned at Westminster, Lancaster and his party came thither with an armed retinue; and were there enabled to impose their own terms on the sovereign. They required that the king, who had, at the instance of his predecessor, imposed an oath on him never to return, and engaged the bishops, who never failed to interpose in all civil concerns, to pronounce him excommunicated if he remained any longer in the kingdom. Edward was obliged to submit; but, before he returned to his empire, gave proofs of his fond attachment to his favourite. Instead of removing all unbridge by sending him to his own country, as was expected, he appointed him Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; attended him to Bristol, on his journey thither, and before last degree conferred on him new lands and riches both in Gascony and England. Gavaston, who did not want bravery, and possessed talents for war, acted during his government with vigour against some of the barons, whom he engaged to pay him a new subsidy.

Meanwhile the king, less shocked with the illegal violence which had been imposed upon him, than unhappy in the absence of his minister, employed every expedient to seduce the opposition of the barons to his return; as if his success in that point were the chief object of his government. The high office of hereditary steward was conferred on Lancaster; his father-in-law, the Earl of Lincoln, was bought off by other concessions; Earl Warren was also mollified by civilities, grants, or promises; the insolence of Gavaston being no longer before men's eyes, was less the object of general indignation; and Edward, deeming matters sufficiently prepared for the purpose, applied to the court of Rome, and obtained for Gavaston dispensation from that oath which the barons had compelled him to take, that he would for ever abjure the realm. He went down to Chester to receive him on his first landing from Ireland; flew into his arms with transports of joy; and having obtained the formal consent of the barons in parliament to his re-establishment, set no longer any bounds to his extravagant fondness and affection. Gavaston himself, still disposed to thwart the barons in their just causes, resumed the same ostentation and insolence; and became, more than ever, the object of general detestation among the nobility.

The barons first discovered their animosity by absenting themselves from parliament; and finding that this expedient had not been successful, they began to think of employing sharper and more effectual remedies. Though there had scarcely been any national ground of complaint, except some disquieting reports of the public presses; yet it was the opinion of all the acts of mal-administration, objected to the king and his favourite, seemed of a nature more proper to excite heart-burnings in a ball or assembly, than commotions in a great kingdom. But they saw, that the times, that the barons were determined, and were able, to make them the reasons of a total alteration in the constitution and civil government. Having come to a defiance of the laws, 7th Feb. by the king's proclamation, with a numerous retinue of armed followers, they found themselves entirely masters; and they presented a petition, which was equivalent to a command, requiring Edward to devolve, on his choosing judges, the whole authority, both of the crown and of the parliament. The king was obliged to sign a commission, empowering the Prelates and barons to elect twelve persons, who should, till the term of Michaelmas in the year following, have authority to enact ordinances for the government of the kingdom, and regulation of the king's household; consenting that those ordinances should thenceforth, and for ever, have the force of laws; allowing the barons to select among themselves and their friends, for their distinct and regular observance; and all this for the greater glory of God, the security of the church, and the honour and advantage of the king and kingdom. The barons, in their declaration, in which they acknowledged that they owed these concessions merely to the king's free grace; promised, that this commission should never be drawn into precedent; and engaged, that the power of the ordinances should expire at the time appointed.

The chosen Junto accordingly framed their ordinances, and presented them to the king and parliament for their confirmation, in the ensuing year. Some of these ordinances were laudable, and tended to the regular execution of justice: such as those, requiring sheriffs to be men of property, abolishing the practice of issuing privy seals for the oppression of justice, restraining the practice of purveyance, prohibiting the adulteration and alteration of the coin, excluding foreigners from the farms of the revenue, ordering all payments to be regularly made into the exchequer, revoking all late grants of the crown, and giving the parties damages in the case of venial or poxutions. But what chiefly grieved the king, was the ordinance for the removal of evil counsellors, by which a great number of persons were by name excluded from every office and power. Gavaston himself was for ever banished the king's dominions, under the penalty, in case of disobedience, of being declared a public enemy. Other persons, more agreeable to the barons, were substituted in all the offices. And it was ordained, that, for the future, all the considerable dignities in the household, as well as in the law, revenue, and military governments, should be appointed by the barons, and the power of making war, or assembling his military tenants, should no longer be vested solely in the king, nor be exercised without the consent of the nobility.

Edward, from the same weakness both in his temper and situation, which had engaged him to grant this unlimited commission to the barons, was led to give a parliamentary sanction to their ordinances: but as a consequence of the same character, he secretly made a protest against them, and declared, that, since the commission was granted only for the making of ordinances to the advantage of king and kingdom, such articles as should be found prejudicial to both, were to be held as not ratified, and confirmed. In forgetfulness of the bad purpose, he had been set, to train a firm purpose to revoke ordinances which had been imposed on him by violence, which entirely annulled the royal authority, and above all, which deprived him of the company and society of a person, whom, by a usual infatuation, he valued above all the world, and above every consideration of interest or tranquillity.

As soon, therefore, as Edward, removing to York, had freed himself from the immediate terror of the barons' power, he invited back Gavaston from Flanders, which that favourite had made the place of his retreat, and declared his banishment to be illegal, and contrary to the laws and customs of the kingdom, openly reinstated him in his favour, and conferred upon him a new authority. The barons, highly provoked at this disappointment, and apprehensive of danger to themselves, from the declared animosity of so powerful a minister, saw that either his or their ruin was now at hand, and they removed, with remarkable zeal, their former confederacies against him. The Earl of Lancaster was a dangerous head of this alliance: Guy, Earl of Warwick, entered into it with a furious and precipitate passion: Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Hereford, the comatose, and Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, brought to it a great accession of power and interest; even Earl Warrenne deserted the royal cause, which he had hitherto supported, and was induced to embrace the side of the confederates. And as Robert de Winchelsey, Archbishop of Canterbury, professed himself of the same party, he determined the body of the clergy, and consequently the people, to declare against Henry and his minister. So formidable, at that time, was the power of the great nobility, that the combination of a few of them was always able to shake the throne; and such an universal concurrence became irresistible. The Earl of Lancaster, in the interest of his friend and master, the king, York, where he found the king already removed to Newcastle, he flew thither in pursuit of him; and Edward had just time to escape to Tintern, where he embarked, and sailed with Gavaston to Scarborough. The last of his favourites, in which, had it been properly supplied with provisions, was deemed impregnable; and he marched forward to York, in hopes of raising an army, which might be able to support him against his enemies. There being no way of deposing the king, or besieging the castle of Scarborough; and Gavaston, sensible of the bad condition of his garrison, was obliged to capitulate, and to surrender himself prisoner.

He stipulated for two months; that endeavours should, during that time, be mutually used for a general accommodation; that if the terms proposed by the barons were not accepted, the castle should be restored to him; and that the Earl of Pembroke and Henry Percy should, by contract, pledge all their lands for the fulfilling of these conditions. Pembroke, now master of the person of this public enemy, confederate in the castle of Deffling, where, on pretence of other business, he left him, protected by a feeble guard. Warwick, probably in concert with Pembroke, attacked the castle: the garrison refused to make any resistance; Gavaston was yielded up to him, and conducted to Warwick castle: the Earl of Lancaster, Hereford, and Arundel, immediately repaired thither; and without any regard either to the laws or the military capitulation, they ordered the head of the obnoxious favourite to be struck off by the hands of the executioner. The king had retired northward to Berwick when he heard of Gavaston's murder, and his resentment in all portions of England must have been the more terrible, since he had ever borne him while living. He threatened vengeance on all the nobility who had been active in that bloody scene; and he made preparations for war in all parts of England. But being less constant in his enmities than in his friendships, he soon after hearkened to terms of accommodation; granted the barons a pardon of all offences; and as they stipulated to ask him publicly pardon on their knees, he was so pleased, and was won over by other considerations, that he seemed to have sincerely forgiven them all past injuries. But as they still pretended, notwithstanding their lawless conduct, a great anxiety for the maintenance of law, and required the establishment of their former ordinances as a necessary security for that purpose, Edward told them, that he was willing to grant them a free and legal confirmation of such of those ordinances as were not entirely derogatory to the prerogative of the crown. This answer was received, for the present, as satisfactory. The king's person, after the death of Gavaston, was now become less obnoxious to the public; and as the ordinances insisted on were to be nearly the same with those which had formerly been extorted from Henry III. by Montfort, and which had been attended with so many fatal consequences, they were, on that account, demanded with less vehemence by the nobility and people. The minds of all men seemed to be thus allayed; and time and the longer prevailed: and England, now united under its head, would henceforth be able, it was hoped, to take vengeance on all its enemies; particularly on the Scots, whose progress was the object of general resentment and indignation.

Immediately after Edward's retreat from war with Scotland, Robert Bruce left his fastnesses, in hand, which he intended to have sheltered his feeble army; and supplying his defect of strength by superior abilities, he made deep impression on all his enemies, foreign and domestic. He chased Lord Argyile, and the chiefest of the Macdowals, from their hills, and made himself master of the same; broke, with success, the Cummins in the low counties of the north: he took the castles of Inverness, Forfar, and Brechin. He daily gained some new accession of territory to himself, and his interests, by the time he daily reconciled the minds of the nobility to his dominion, and enlisted under his standard every bold leader, whom he enriched by the spoils of his enemies. Sir James Douglas, in whom commenced the greatness and renown of that of the barons of the high countries enterprises: Edward Bruce, Robert's own brother, distinguished himself by acts of valour; and the terror of the English power being now abated by the feeble conduct of the king, even the province of the independent states, had new and distant hopes of recovering their independence; and the whole kingdom, except a few fortresses, which he had not the means to attack, had acknowledged the authority of Robert.

In this situation, Edward had found it necessary to grant a truce to Scotland; and Robert successfully employed the interval in consolidating his power, and introducing a spirit of law and order to the government, disturbed by a long continuance of wars and confiscations. The interval was very short: the truce, ill-observed on both sides, was at last openly violated; and war recommenced with greater fury than ever. Robert, not content with defending himself, made a raid into the northern part of England; he subjugated his needy followers by the plunder of that country, and taught them to despise the military genius of a people who had long been the object of their terror. Edward, at last, roused from his lethargy, had marched an army into Scotland; and Robert, determined not to risk too much against an enemy so much superior, retired again into the mountains. The king advanced beyond Edinburgh, but being destitute of provisions, and being ill supported by the English nobility, who were then employed in framing their ordinances, he was soon obliged to retreat without gaining any advantage over the enemy. But the union of the king with his confederates was the last and after the death of Gavaston, seemed to restore that kingdom to its native force, opened again the prospect of reducing Scotland, and promised a happy conclusion to a war in which both the interests and passions of the nation were so deeply engaged.

Edward assembled forces from all quarters, with a view of finishing, at one blow, this important enterprise. He summoned the most warlike of his vassals from Gascony: he enlisted troops from the high and other foreign countries: he invited over great numbers of the disorderly Irish as to a certain prey; he joined to them a body of the Welch, who were actuated by like motives; and assembling the whole military force of England, he marched to the frontiers with an army which, according to the Scotch writers, amounted to an hundred thousand men.

The army collected by Robert exceeded not thirty thousand combatants; but being composed of men who had distinguished themselves by many acts of valour, who were rendered desperate by their situation, and who were inured to all the varieties of fortune, they might justly, under such a leader, be deemed formidable to the most numerous and best armed troops of Stirling, which, with Berwick, was the only fortress in Scotland that remained in the hands of the English, had long been besieged by Edward Bruce: Philip de Mowbray, the constable of that place, obstinately held out, last obliged to capitulate, and to promise, that if, before a certain day, which was now approaching, he were not relieved, he should open his gates to the enemy. Robert, therefore, sensible that here was the ground on which he must expect the English, chose the field of battle with all the skill and prudence imaginable, and made the necessary preparations for their reception. He posted himself at Bannockburn, about two miles from Stirling; where he had a hill on his right flank, and a morass on his left, and not content with having taken these precautions to prevent his being surrounded by the more numerous army of the English, he foresaw the superior strength of the enemy in cavalry, and purposely chose a rivulet in front, he commanded deep pits to be dug along its banks, and sharp stakes to be planted in them; and he ordered the whole to be carefully covered over with more stakes, and with a reed pavement, and a bloody conflict immediately ensued between two bodies of cavalry; where Robert, who was at the head of the Scots, engaged in single combat with Henry de Bohun, a gentleman of the family of Hereford, and at one stroke cut off his head, and injured many of the two armies. The English horse fled with precipitation to their main body.

The Scots, encouraged by this favourable event, and gleaning in the value of their prudence, professed a happy issue to the combat on the ensuing day: the English, confident in their numbers, and elated with former successes, longed for an opportunity of revenge: and the night, though extremely short in that season and in that climate, appeared tedious to the impiants of the several combatants. Early in the morning, Edward drew out his army, and advanced towards the Scots; and Earl Morphoe, his nephew, who commanded the left wing of the cavalry, impelled by the ardour of youth, rushed on to the attack without preparation, and fell among the covered pits which had been prepared by Bruce for the reception of the enemy. His horse was cast, and he himself was overthrown and slain: Sir James Douglas, who commanded the Scotch cavalry, gave the enemy no leisure to rally, but pushed them off the field with considerable loss, and pursued them in sight of their whole line of infantry. While the English army were alarmed with this unfortunate beginning of the action, which commonly proves decisive, they observed an army on the heights towards the left, which seemed to be marching leisurely in order to surround them; and they were distracted by their multiplied fears. This was a number of waggoners and sapper-boys, whom Robert had collected, and having supplied them with military standards, gave them a distance, of a formidable body. The stratagem took effect: a panic seized the English: they threw down their arms and fled: they were pursued with great slaughter, for the space of ninety miles, till they reached Berwick: and the Scots, besides an inestimable booty, took many persons of quality prisoners, and above 400 gentlemen, whom Robert treated with great humanity, and whose ransom was a new encouragement, and pursued them in sight of these noble prisoners. While the English were thus left without an army to oppose them, Robert, who had narrowly escaped, by taking shelter in Dunbar, whose gates were opened to him by the Earl of March; and he thence passed by sea to Berwick.

Edward, on the throne of that kingdom, and may be deemed the greatest overthrow that the English nation, since the conquest, has ever received. The number of slain on those occasions is always uncertain, and is commonly much magnified by the victors; but this defeat made a deep impression on the minds of the English; and it was remarked, that for some years, no superiority of numbers could encourage them to keep the field against the Scots. Robert, in order to check all intimation of his expected success, entered England, and ravaged all the northern counties without opposition: he besieged Carlisle; but that place was saved by the valour of Sir Andrew Halka, the governor; he was also successful against Berwick, which he took by assault: and this prince, elated by his continued prosperity, now entertained hopes of making the most important conquests on the English. He sent over his brother Edward, with an army of 6000 men, into Ireland; and that nobleman assumed the title of king of that island. He himself followed soon after with more numerous forces. The horrible and absurd oppressions which the Irish suffered under the English government, made them at first fly to the standard of the Scots, whom they regarded as their deliverers; but a grievous famine, which at that time desolated both Ireland and Britain, reduced the Scotch army to the greatest extremities; and Robert was obliged to yield to the power of his forces much diminished, into his own country. His brother, after having experienced a variety of fortune, was defeated and slain near Dundalk by the English, commanded by Lord Leveret; and these projects, too extensive for the force of the Scotch nation, thus vanished into smoke.

Edward, besides suffering those disasters from the invasion of the Scots, and the insurrection of the Irish, was also infested with civil wars in Wales; and above all by the factions of his own nobility, who took advantage of the public calamities, insulted his fallen fortunes, and endeavoured to establish their own independence on the ruins of the crown. He himself, who had declined attending him on his Scotch expedition, no sooner saw him return with disgrace, than they insisted on the renewal of their ordinances, which, they still pretended, had validity; and the king's ungallant situation obliged him to submit to their demands. The ministry was new-modelled by the direction of Lancaster: that prince was placed at the head of the council; it was declared, that all the offices should be filled, from time to time, by the votes of parliament, or rather by the will of the barons and the nation, under this new model of government, endeavoured to put itself in a better posture of defence against the Scots. But the factious nobles were far from being terraced with the public necessities of the times: on the contrary, they founded the hopes of their own future grandeur on the weakness and distresses of the crown: Lancaster himself was suspected, with great appearance of reason, of holding a secret correspondence with the King of Scots; and though he was intrusted with the command of the English armies, he took care that every enterprise should be disappointed, and every plan of operations prove unsuccessful.

All the European kingdoms, especially that of England, were at this time unacquainted with the office of a prime minister, so well understood at present in all regular monarchies; and the people could form no conception of a man, who, though situated in the highest stations, and possessed by reason of the greater nobles by their submission to his temporary authority. Edward was plainly, by nature, unfit to hold himself the reins of government: he had no vices, but was unhappy in a total incapacity for serious business: he was not capable of knowing or of wisely and seriously to be governed: yet every favourite whom he successively chose was regarded as a fellow-subject exalted above his rank and station: he was the object of envy to the great body; his character and conduct were detested by the people; his authority of the king a kingdom was considered as an usurpation; and unless the prince had embraced the dangerous expedient of devolving his power on the Earl of Lancaster or some mighty baron, whose family interest was so extensive as to be able alone to maintain his influence, he could expect no more than immediate mutiny on the throne.

Sir Hugh de De
gaveston, was Hugh le Despenser, or Spenser, a young man of English birth, of high rank, and of the Louvain family. His power and influence extended all the exteriors of person and address, which were fitted to engage the weak mind of Edward; but was destitute of that moderation and prudence which might have qualified him better to the inordinate and vengeful temper of the king. Through all the perils of that dangerous station to which he was advanced. His father, who was of the same name, and who, by means of his son, had also attained great influence over the king, was a nobleman weareable from his years, respected through all his past life for wisdom, valor, and integrity, and well fitted, by his talents and experience, to have supplied the defects both of the king and of his munition.5 But no sooner was Edward's attachment declared for young Spenser, than the turbulent Lancaster, and most of the great barons, regarded him as the enemy of their interest, the object of their animosity, and the instrument of his ruin.6 They first declared their discontent by withdrawing from parliament; and it was not long ere they found a pretence for proceeding to greater extremities against him.

The king, who set no limits to his bounty civil commo toward his minions, had married the young lord Spenser to his niece, one of the eboires of the Earl of Gloucester, slain at Barnockburn. The favour of such a success to that opulent baron, had inherited great possessions in the marches of Wales; and being desirous of extending still further his influence in those quarters, he is accused of having committed injustices to the barons of Audley and Standfast, and had married two sisters of the same family. There was likewise a baron in that neighbourhood, called William de Brinouse, Lord of Gower, who had made a settlement of his estate on John de Mowbray, his son-in-law; and, in case of failure of that nobleman and his issue, had substituted the Earl of Hereford in the succession to the barony of Gower. Mowbray, on the decease of his father-in-law, entered immediately in possession of the estate, without the formality of taking livery and seisin from the crown; but Spenser, who coveted that barony, persuaded the king to put in execution the rigors of the feudal law, to seise the estate of Mowbray, and to confer it upon him.7 This transaction, which was produced by a spirit of faction, immediately excited a civil war in the kingdom. The Earls of Lancaster and Hereford flew to arms; Audley and Ammon joined them with all their forces; the two Rogers de Mortimer, and Roger de Clifford, with many other, despaired, for private reasons, at the Spencers, brought a considerable accession to the party; and their army being now formidable, they sent a message to the king, requiring him immediately to dismiss or confine the younger Spenser; and menacing him, in case of refusal, with renouncing their allegiance to him, and taking revenge on that minister by their own authority. They severely waited for an answer; and immediately fell upon the lands of young Spenser, which they pillaged and destroyed; murdered his servants, drove off his cattle, and burned his houses;8 they thence proceeded to confront him, and his adherents, the estates of the father, whose character they had hitherto seemed to respect: and having drawn and signed a formal association among themselves,9 they marched to London with all their forces, and assaulted themselves in the neighbourhood of that city, as a demand of the king's protection on both the Spencers. These noblemen were then absent; the father abroad, the son at sea; and both of them employed in different commissions: the king therefore replied, that he would be bound to observe the laws, restrained him from giving assent to so illegal a demand, or compelling noblemen who were accused of no crime, nor had any opportunity afforded them of making answer.10 Equity and reason were but a feeble opposition to men who had arms in their hands, and who, being already involved in guilt, saw no safety but in success and victory. They entered London with their troops; and gaining in to the parliament, which was then sitting, a charge against the Spencers, of which they attempted not to prove one article, they procured, by merces and vices, to have the sons of Spenser attainted of attainder against these ministers.11 This sentence was voted by the lay barons alone: for the commons, though now an estate in parliament, were yet of so little consideration, that their assent was not demanded; and even the votes of the latter were neglected amidst the present disorders. The only symptom which these turbulent barons gave of their regard to law, was their requiring from the king an indenity for their illegal proceedings, after which they disbanded their army, and separated, in security, as they imagined, to their several castles.

This act of violence, in which the king was obliged to acquiesce, was followed by a declaration of war, which was not long delayed. The king, acting on the example of his ancestors, felt the spirit of the age, in which it was not contemptible, that every one thought himself entitled to treat with him, with slighting courtesy. The queen, having occasion soon after to pass by the castle of Leeds in Kent, which belonged to the Lord Spenser, desired a night's lodging, but was refused accommodation. She then sent two officers, who presented themselves at the gate, were killed.12 The insurrection upon this princess, who had always endeavoured to live on good terms with the barons, and who joined them heartily in the ruin of her guilty family, involved no action which nobody pretended to justify; and the king thought that he might, without giving generalumbrage, assemble an army, and take vengeance on the offender. No one had ever done him so much wrong, who had been so treacherous a friend. On his side he had engaged perpetual Edeward prevailed.13 But having now some forces on foot, and having concertled with his friends through-out England, he ventured to take off the mask, to attack all his enemies, and to recall the two Spencers, whose sentence he declared illegal, unjust, contrary to the tenor of the Great Charter, passed without the assent of the prelates, and executed by violence from him and the estate of barons.14 Still the commons were not mentioned by either party.

The king had now got the start of the barons; and an advantage, which, in those times, was commonly decisive: and he hastened with his army to the court, where the prince, the emperor, and the rest of his enemies, whom he found totally unprepared for resistance. Many of the barons in those parts endeavoured to appear born by submission: their castles were seized, and their persons committed to custody. But Lancaster, in order to prevent the total ruin of his party, summoned together his vassals and retainers; declared his alliance with Scotland, which had long been suspected; received the promise of a reinforcement from that country, under the command of Randolph Earl of Murray, and Sir James Douglas;15 and being joined by the Earl of Hereford, advanced with all his forces against the king, who had collected an army of 10,000 men, and was in possession of Edinburgh. Lancaster posted himself at Burton upon Trent, and endeavoured to defend the passages of the river: but being disappointed in that plan of operations, this prince, who had no men remaining on foot, and his command so scattered was even suspected, fled with his army to the north, in expectation of being there joined by his Scottish allies, who he was pursued by the king; and his army diminished daily, till it came to Banoughbridge, where he found Sir Andrew Hare, the great favourite of King Robert, and his comrade in the same battle of the river, and ready to dispute the passage with him. He was repulsed in an attempt which he made to force his way; the Earl of Hereford was killed; the whole army of the rebels was disconcerted; Lancaster himself was become incapable of taking any measures either for flight or defence; and he was seized, without resistance, by Hainault, and conducted to the king.1 In those violent times, the laws were so much neglected on both sides, that, even where they might, without any sensible inconveniency, have been observed, the conquerors deemed it unnecessary to pay any regard to them. Lancaster, who was guilty of open rebellion, and was taken in arms against his sovereign, instead of being tried by the laws of his country, which pronounced the difference with which he was treated by the court, and led to execution. Edward, however little vindictive in his natural temper, here indulged his revenge, and employed against the prisoner the same indignities which had been exercised, by his orders, against Gaveston. He was cloathed in a mean attire, placed on a lean jade without a bridle, a hood was put on his head, and in this posture, attended by the acclamations of the people, this prince of the blood invaded to an eminence near Fornfirt, one of his own castles, and there beheaded.2

Thus perished Thomas Earl of Lancaster, prince of the blood, and one of the most potent barons that had ever been in the land. He now for the first time discovered the violence and turbulence of his character: his private deportment appears not to have been more innocent; and his hypocritical devotion, by which he gained the favour of the monks and populace, will rather be regarded as an aggravation of the crime. Badlesmere, Giffard, Barret, Cheyne, Fleming, and about eighteen of the most notorious offenders, were afterwards condemned by a legal trial, and were executed. Many were thrown into prison: others made their escape beyond sea: some of the king's servants were rewarded from their forfeitures: Harcla received for his services the earldom of Carlisle, and a large estate, which he soon afterwards sold. He received special commendation for saving the king's person, and the crown from the danger of a mutiny, which was discovered by the king himself, and which sought to make the journey alone; both fearing, lest that easy prince should in his absence fall under other influence, and foreseeing the perils to which he himself should be exposed, if, without the protection of his household, he should appear in the field, where he was so generally hated. While these doubts occasioned delays and difficulties, Isabella A.D. 1263, proposed, that Edward should resign the dominion of Guernsey to his son, now fourteen years of age; and that the prince should come to Paris, and do the homage which every vassal owed to his superior lord. This expeditious, which seemed so happily to remove all difficulties, was immediately deferred by the king, who was charmed with the contrivance: young Edward was sent to Paris: and the run covered under this fatal snare, was never perceived or suspected by any of the English council.

The queen, on her arrival in France, had there found a great number of English fugitives, the remains of the Lancasterian faction; and their common hatred of Spenser soon began a secret friendship and correspondence between them and that part of the people who had been led by Mortimer, a potent baron in the Welsh marches, who had been obliged, with others, to make his submission to the king; and had been condemned for high treason; but having received pardon for bred life, was afterwards detained in the Tower, with an intention of rendering his confinement perpetual. He was so fortunate as to make his escape into France; and being one of the most considerable persons now remaining of the party, as well as distinguished by his violent animosity against Spenser, he was easily admitted to pay his court to Queen Isabella. The graces of his person and address advanced him quickly in her affections: he became her confident and counsellor in all her measures; and gaining ground daily upon her heart, he engaged her to sacrifice at last to her passion, all the sentiments of honour and of fidelity to her husband.6 Hatting the man whom she had injured, and whom she had so much valued,6 she married him ardently into all Mortimer's conspiracies; and having artfully gotten into her hands the young prince, and heir of the monarchy, she resolved on the utter ruin of the king, as well as of his favourite. She even took her brother to take part in the same criminal purpose: her court was daily filled with the exiled barons: Mortimer lived in the most declared intimacy with her: a correspondence was secretly carried on with the exiled party in England: and when Edward, informed of those alarming circumstances, required her speedy to return with the prince, she publicly replied, that she would never

Hutin, who, after a short reign, dying without male issue, was succeeded by Philip the Long, his brother, whose death soon after made way for Charles the Fair, the youngest brother of that family. This monarch had some grounds of complaint against the king's ministers in Guernsey, and as there was no common or council, he judged in that strange species of sovereignty established by the feudal law, he seemed desirous to take advantage of Edward's weakness, and, under that pretence, to confiscate all his foreign domains. After an embassy by the Earl of Kent, the king's brother, had been tried in vain, Queen Isabella obtained permission to go over to Paris, and endeavour to adjust, in an amicable manner, the difference which had been created by his new court in the kingdom. Charles started a new pretension, the justice of which could not be disputed, that Edward himself should appear in his court, and do homage for the fees which he held in France. But there occurred many difficulties in complying with this demand. Young Spenser, by whom the king was implicitly governed, had unavoidably been engaged in many quarrels with the queen, who aspired to the same influence; and though that artful prince, on her leaving England, had dispersed her animosity, Spenser, well acquainted with her secret sentiments, was unwilling to attend his master to Paris, and appear in a court, where her credit might expose his errors. Not to lose the advantage of such an opportunity as he had hitherto no less on allowing the king to make the journey alone; both fearing, lest that easy prince should in his absence fall under other influence, and foreseeing the perils to which he himself should be exposed, if, without the protection of his household, he should appear in the field, where he was so generally hated. While these doubts occasioned delays and difficulties, Isabella proposed, that Edward should resign the dominion of Guernsey to his son, now fourteen years of age; and that the prince should come to Paris, and do the homage which every vassal owed to his superior lord. set foot in the kingdom till Spenser was for ever removed from his presence and counsels: a declaration which procured his great popularity in England, and threw a decent veil over all her treasonable enterprises.

Edward endeavoured to put himself in a posture of defence; but besides the difficulties arising from his own indolence and slender abilities, and the want of authority which of consequence attended all his resolutions, it was not easy for him, in the present state of the kingdom and revenues, to maintain a constant force ready to repel invasion, which he knew not at what time or place he had reason to expect. All his efforts were unequal to the truculent and hostile conspiracies, which, mingling with abode, were forming against his authority, and which were daily perseverance further even into his own family. His brother, the Earl of Kent, a virtuous but weak prince, who was then at Paris, was engaged by his sister-in-law, and by the King of France, who was also his cousin-german, to give countenance to the invasion, whose sole object, he believed, was the expulsion of the Spencers: he prevailed on his elder brother, the Earl of Norfolk, to enter secretly into the same design; the Earl of Leicester, brother and heir of the Earl of Lancaster, had too many reasons for his hatred of these ministers, to refuse his concurrence. Walter de Reynel, Archbishop of Canterbury, and many of the prelates, expressed their approbation of the queen's measures: several of the most potent barons, evrying the authority of the favourite, were ready to fly to arms: the minds of the people, by means of some truths and many calumnies, were early disposed to the same party; and though checked but the appearance of the queen and prince, with such a body of foreign troops as might protect her against immediate violence, to turn all this tempest, so artfully prepared, against the unhappy Edward.

Clearing, though the countenance and assistance to the faction, was opened openly to support the queen and prince against the authority of a husband and father; and Isabella was obliged to court the alliance of some other foreign princes, whose dominions she might set out on her intended enterprise. For this purpose, she advanced young Edward, whose tender age made him incapable to judge of the consequences, with Philippa, daughter of the Count of Holland and Hainault; and having, by the open assistance of this prince, and the secret protection of her brother, enlisted in her service near 3,000 men, she set sail from the harbour of Dort, and landed safely, and without opposition, at that of Southampton. The Earl of Kent was in her company: two other princes of the blood, the Earl of Norfolk and the Earl of Leicester, joined her soon after her landing, with all the forces of the three quarters of the kingdom: the prelates, bishops of Ely, Lincoln, and Hereford, brought her both the force of their vessels and the authority of their character: even Robert de Watteville, who had been sent by the king to oppose her progress in Suffolk, deserted to her with all his forces. To render her cause more favourable, she renewed her declaration, that the sole purpose of her enterprise was to free the king and kingdom from the tyranny of the Spencers, and of Chancellor Baldwin, their确立. The populace were allured by her specious pretences: the barons thought themselves secure against foritures by the appearance of the prince in her army: and a weak irresistible bug, supported by ministers generally odious, was unable to sink the torrent of which bore with such irresistible violence against him.

Edward, after trying in vain to rouse the citizens of London to some sense of duty, departed for the west, where he hoped to meet with a better reception; and he had no sooner discovered his weakness by leaving the city, than the rage of the populace broke out without control against him and his ministers. They first plundered them in their houses, and then, when they were obvious to them, seized the Bishop of Exeter, a virtuous and loyal prelate, as he was passing through the streets; and having beheaded him, they threw his body into the river. They made themselves masters of the Tower by surprise: then entered into a formal assemblage to put to death, without mercy, every one who should dare to oppose the enterprise; or, in acquiescence, or offer, condemned to death by the rebellious barons: he was hanged on a gibbet; his body was cut in pieces, and thrown to the dogs; and his head was sent to Winchester, the place whose title he bore, being a real and absolute head of the state, or a pole, and exposed to the insults of the populace.

The king, disappointed anew in his expectations of succour from the Welsh, took shipping for Ireland; but being accompanied by no force, and by contrary wind, he endeavoured to conceal himself in the mountains of Wales: he was soon discovered, was put under the custody of the Earl of Leicester, and was confined in the castle of Kenilworth. The younger Spencer, his favourite, who also fell into the hands of the king, was soon executed. He had not shown any appearance of a legal trial: the Earl of Arundel, almost the only man of his rank in England who had maintained his loyalty, was, without any trial, put to death at the instigation of Mortimer; Baldwin, the chancellor, being a priest, could not with safety be suddenly despatched; but being sent to the Bishop of Hereford's palace in London, he was there, as his enemies probably suspected, seized by the populace, was thrown into Normandy, and soon after expired, from the cruel usage which he had received. Even the usual reverence paid to the sacred dotal character gave way, with every other consideration, to the present rage of the people.

The Earl of Kent, on his arrival in England, was hailed by the prevalent delusion, summoned, in the king's name, a parliament at Westminster; where, together with the power of her army, and the authority of her partisans, she engrossed, by using the power committed to her by past treasons by committing new acts of violence against their sovereign, she expected to be seconded by the fury of the populace, the most dangerous of all instruments, and the least answerable for their excesses. A great charge was drawn up against the king, in 13th Jan. which, though it was framed by his invertebrate enemies, nothing but his narrow genius, or his misfortunes, were objected to him; for the greatest malice found no particular crime with which it could reproach this unhappy prince. He was accused of incapacity for government, of wasting his time in idle amusements, of neglecting public business, of being swayed by evil counsellors, of losing, by his misconduct, the Kingdom of Scotland, and part of Guern; and to swell the charge, even the death of some barons, and the imprisonment of some prelates, convicted of treason, were laid to his account. It was in vain, amidst the violence intended to secure their lives, the people, to appeal either to law or to reason; the deposition of the king, without any appearing opposition, was voted by the parliament: the prince, already declared regent, was placed on the throne; and a deputation was sent to Edward at Kenilworth, to require his resignation, which menaces and terror soon extorted from him.

But it was impossible that the people, however corrupt the barbarity of the times, still further inflamed by faction, could for ever remain insensible to the voice of nature. Here, a wife had first deserted, next invaded, and then deserted her husband; bad made her minor son an insubordinate and unnatural testament of his fate; then, by his being treacherously, seduced the nation into a rebellion against their sovereign; had pushed them into violence and cruelties that had dishonoured them: all those circumstances were so odious in themselves, and formed such a complicated scene of guilt, that the least reflection sufficed to open men's eyes, and make them detest this flagrant infringement of every public and private duty. The suspicions which soon arose of Isabella's criminal commerce with Mortimer, the proofs which daily broke out of this part of her guilt, increased the general abhorrence against her; and her hypocrisy, in publicly bewailing with tears the king's unhappy fate, was not able to deceive even the most stupid and most prejudiced of her adherents. In proportion as the queen became the object of public hatred, the dethroned monarch, who had been the victim of her crimes and her ambition, was regarded with the greatest contempt, with venison and slaughter. He became sensible, that all his misconduct, which faction had so much exaggerated, had been owing to the unavoidable weakness, not to any voluntary depravity, of his character. He then viewed with compassion to whose custody he had been committed, was soon touch ed with those generous sentiments; and besides using his prisoner with gentleness and humanity, he was suspect to have retained still more honourable intentions in his favour. To screen himself from his own enemies, he took his wife, his person, and his children, from his hands, and delivered over to Lord Berkeley, and Mautravers, and Gourna, who were intrusted alternately, each for a month, with the charge of guarding him. While he was in the custody of Berkeley, the care he was taken with the gentlest due to his rank and his misfortunes; but when the turn of Mautravers and Gourna came, every species of indignity was practised against him, as if his intention had been to break entirely the prince's spirit, and to employ his sorrows and afflictions, instead of more violent and more dangerous expiriments, for the instruments of his murder. It is reported, that one day, when Edward was to be shaved, they ordered cold and dirty water to be brought from the ditch for that purpose; and when he desired it to be changed, and was still denied his request, he burst into tears, which bedewed his cheeks; and he exclaimed, that, in spite of their insolence, he should appear before the world with a face wet with tears. But this method of laying Edward in his grave appeared still too slow to the impatient Mortimer, he secretly sent orders to the two keepers, who were at his discretion, instantly to depose him, and having thus extricated himself from the manner of his death as cruel and barbarous as possible. Taking advantage of Berkeley's sickness, in whose custody he then was, and who was thereby incapacitated from attending his charge? they came to Berkeley castle, and put themselves in possession of the king's person. They threw him on a bed; held him down violently with a table, which they flung over him, and plunged him into his fundament a red hot iron, which they inserted through a horn; and though the outward marks of violence upon his person were prevented by this expedient, the horrid deed was discovered to all the guards and attendants by the screams with which the agonizing king filled the castle, while his bowels were consuming. Gourna and Mautravers were held in general detestation; and when the ensuing revolution in England threw their protectors from power, they found it necessary to provide for their safety by flying the kingdom. Gourna was afterwards seized at Marseilles, delivered over to the Seneschal ofGuencenc, put on board a ship with a view of carrying him to France, but was murdered at sea by secret orders, as was supposed, from some nobles and prelates in England, anxious to prevent any discovery which he might make of his accomplices. Mautravers conceded himself for several years in Germany; but having found means of rendering some service to Edward III, he ventured to approach his person, he laid his hand on his knees before him, submitted to mercy, and received a pardon.

It is not easy to imagine a more intricate and more dangerous than the uniform. His character, whose tragic death we have related; nor a prince less fitted for governing that fierce and turbulent people subjected to his authority. He was obliged to dover the sins of others the worst by the weight of public, by the ability or inclination to bear: the same indolence and want of penetration led him to make choice of ministers and favourites who were not always the best qualified for the trust committed to them: the seducers grapple, pleased with his weakness, yet complaining of it, under pretence of attacking his ministers, insulted his person and invaded his authority: and the impatient populace, mistaking the source of their grievances, threw all the blame upon the king, and increased the public disorders by their faction and violence. It was in vain to look for protection from the laws, whose voice, always feeble in those times, was not heard amidst the din of arms; and he could not defend himself by the same means or the same sacrifices. He was always to any of the people: the whole machine of government was torn in pieces with fury and violence: and men, instead of regretting the manners of their age, and the form of their constitution, were hard pressed to know which of the most skillful hand to conduct them, imputed all errors to the person who had the misfortune to be intrusted with the reins of empire.

But though some mistakes are natural and almost unavoidable, while the events are recent, it is a shameful delusion in modern histories, to imagine that all the ancient princes who were unfortunate in their government, were also tyrannical in their conduct, and that the seditions of the people were always proceeded from some invasion of their privileges by the monarch. Even a great and a good king was not, in that age, secure against faction and rebellion, as appears in the case of Henry 11; but a great king had the best chance, as we learn from the history of the same period, for quelling and subduing them. Compare the reigns and characters of Edward I and II. The father made several violent attempts against the liberties of the people; his barons opposed him: he was obliged at least found prudent, to submit: but as they dreaded his valour and abilities, they were content with reasonable satisfaction, and pushed no further their advantages against him. The facility and weakness of the son, not his violence, he considered: and even the same government were overturned: an attempt to reinstate them, was an unpardonable crime: and no atonement, but the deposition and tragic death of the king himself, could give those horrid contumacy. It is easy to see that a constitution which depended so much on the personal character of the prince, must necessarily, in many of its parts, be a government of will, not of laws. But always to throw, without distinction, the blame of all disorders upon the sovereign, would introduce a fatal error in politics, and serve as a perpetual apology for treason and rebellion: as the turbulence of the great, and madness of the people, were not, equally with the tyranny of princes, evil; and the latter, when they rebel against society, and no less carefully to be guarded against in every well-regulated constitutions.

While these abominable scenes passed in England, the theatre of France was stained with a wickedness equally barbarous, and still more public and deliberate. The order of knights templars had arisen during the first servour of the Crusades; and uniting the two qualities, the most popular in that age, devotion and valour, and exercising both in the most popular of all enterprises, the defence of the Holy Land, they had made rapid advances in credit and authority, and had acquired, from the pugnacity of the time, the character of its most faithful, ample, and powerful friends, especially in France. Their great riches, joined to the course of time, had, by degrees, relaxed the severity of these virtues; and the templars had, in a great measure, lost that popularity which first raised them to honour and distinction. Acquainted, from experience, with the fatigues and dangers of the endless travels which led them to the East, they rather chose to enjoy in ease their opulent revenues in Europe: and being all men of hir, educated, according to the custom of that age, without any tincture of letters, they scorned all kind of secular occupations of a monastic life, and passed their time wholly in the fashionable amusements of hunting, gallantry, and the pleasures of the table. Their rival order, that of St. John of Jerusalem, whose poverty had as yet preserved them from like corruptions, still proceeded by steps, and marched against the infidels, and succeeded to all the popularity, which was lost by the indolence and luxury of the templars. But though these reasons had weakened the foundations of this order, once so celebrated and revered, the immediate cause of their destruction proceeded from the cruel and vindictive spirit of Philip the Fair, who, having entered a private disgust against some eminent templars, determined to gratify at once his avidity and revenge, by involving the whole order in an un distinguished ruin.

On no better information than that of two knights, condemned by their superiors to perpetual imprisonment for their vices and profligacy, he ordered on one day all the templars, who were to be committed to be committed to such enormous and absurd crimes, as are sufficient of themselves to destroy all the credit of the accusation. Besides their being universally charged with murder and vices the most shocking, every one, it was pretended, whom they received into their order, was obliged to renounce his Saviour, to spit upon the cross, and to join in this impious, the superstition of worshipping a gilded head, which was secretly kept in one of their houses at Marseilles. They also initiated, it was said, every candidate by such infamous rites, as could serve to no other purpose, than to degrade the order in his eye, and destroy for ever the authority of all his superiors over him. Above a hundred of these unhappy gentlemen were put to the question, in order to extort from them a confession of their guilt: the more obstinate persisted in the hands of their tormentors: several, to procure immediate ease, in the violence of their agonies, acknowledged whatever was required of them: forged confessions were imputed to others: and Philip, as if their guilt were now certain, proceeded to a confiscation of all their treasures. But no sooner were the templars relieved from their tortures, than, preferring the most cruel execution to a life with infamy, they disavowed their confessions, exclaimed against the forgers, justified the innocence of their order, and asserted that all the gallant actions of the past, in ancient or later times, as a full apology for their conduct. The tyrant, enraged at this disappointment, and thinking himself now engaged in honour to proceed to extremities, ordered fifty-four of them, whom he had branded for all eternity, to be relapsed in their breaches, to perish by the punishment of fire in his capital: great numbers expired, after a like manner, in other parts of the kingdom: and when he found that the perseverance of these unhappy victims in justifying to the last their innocence, had made deep impression on the spectators, he endeavoured to overcome the constancy of the templars by new inhumanities. The grand master of the order, John de Molay, and another great officer, brother to the sovereign of Dauphiny, were conducted to a scaffold erected before the church of Notre Dame, at Paris; a full pardon was offered them on the one hand; the fire, destined for their execution, was shown on the other; these men, from their own innocence, and that of their order, and were instantly hurled into the flames by the executioner. In all this barbarous injustice, Clement V. who was the executor of Philip's will, and then resided in France, fully concurred; and with all the pomp and ceremony, by any inquiry into the truth of facts, he, summarily, by the plenitude of his apostolic power, abolished the whole order. The templars, all over Europe, were thrown into prison; their conduct underwent a strict scrutiny; the power of their enemies still pursued and oppressed them; but no where, except in France, were the smallest traces of their guilt produced to be found. England sent an ample testimony of their piety and morals; but as the order was now annihilated, the knights were distributed into several convents, and their possessions were, by command of the Pope, transferred to the order of St. John. We now proceed to relate some other detached transactions of the present period.

The kingdom of England was afflicted with a grievous famine during several years of this reign. Perpetual rains and cold continued, and the harvests, for want of winds, suffered a mortality among the cattle, and raised every kind of food to an enormous price. The parliament, in 1315, endeavoured to fix more moderate rates to commodities; not sensible that such an attempt was impracticable, and that, were it possible to reduce the price of provisions by any other expedient than by introducing plenty, nothing could be more pernicious and destructive to the public. Where the produce of a year, for instance, falls so far short, as to afford full subsistence only for nine months, the only expedient for making it last all the twelve, is to raise the prices, to put the people by that means on short allowance, and oblige them to save themselves till a more plentiful season: this measure may be doubled in the necessary consequence of scarcity; and laws, instead of preventing it, only aggravate the evil by compelling and restraining commerce. The parliament accordingly, in the ensuing year, had an opportunity of repairing the mischief, which they had found useless and burdensome.

The prices affixed by the parliament are somewhat remarkable: three pounds twelve shillings of our present money for the best stalled ox; for other oxen, two pounds eight shillings: a fat hog of two years old, ten shillings: a fat wether unshorn, a crown; if shorn, three shillings and six-pence: a fat goose, seven-pence halfpenny: a fat fow, a shilling, three-pence; a chicken, three-pence: four pigeons, three-pence: two dozen of eggs, three-pence. If we consider these prices, we shall find that butcher's meat, in this time of great scarcity, must still have been sold, by the parliamentary ordinance, three times cheaper than our middling prices at present: poultry somewhat lower; because, being now considered as a delicacy, it has risen beyond its proportion. In the country places of Ireland and Scotland, where delicacies bear no price, poultry is at present as cheap, if not cheaper, than butcher's meat. But the inference I would draw from the comparison of prices in still more considerable: I suppose that the rates, affixed by parliament, were inferior to those of a former age, when scarcity was an extraordinary and mortal calamity; and that these commodities, instead of a third, had really risen to half of the present value. But the famine at that time was so consuming, that what was formerly called a pillar, or a dozen shillings a quarter, usually for three pounds; that is, twice our middling prices: a certain proof of the wretched state of tillage in those ages. We formerly found, that the middling price of corn in that period was half of the present price; while the middling price of cattle was only an eighth part: we here find the same immense disproportion in years of scarcity. It may thence be inferred with certainty, that the raising of corn was a species of manufactory unknown in that age: it was all produced in the midst of Europe; there was no other source of the national wealth; and there is reason to think, that other manufactures more refined were sold, even beyond their present prices: at least there is a demonstration for it in the reign of Henry III., when a piece of cloth was sold at twenty shillings, and a yard at eight marks. But this is the subject of another place; and I shall confine myself to what the present bill contains. As to the execution of the laws, which has belonged to the ostentatious Gavaston, and to the family which the king received from the Earl of Lancaster, after the murder of that favourite, we find some embroidered girdles, flowered shits, and silk waistcoats.
It was afterwards one article of accusation against that potent and opulent earl, when he was put to death, that he had purloined some of that finery of Gawston's. The ignorance of those ages in manufactures, and still more, their unskilful husbandry, seem a clear proof, that the country was then far from being populous. All trade and manufactures indeed were then at a very low ebb. In the midst of Europe, where they seem to have risen to any tolerable degree of improvement, was Flanders. When Robert, Earl of that country, was applied to by the king, and was desired to break off commerce with the Scots, whom Edward called his apprizers and - representative on that account by the church, the earl replied, that Flanders was always considered as common, and free and open to all nations. The petition of the elder Spencer to parliament, complaining of the devastation committed on his lands by the barons, contains several particulars which are curious, and discover the manner of the age. He affirms, that they had ravaged sixty-three mansions belonging to him, and he makes his losses amount to 46,000 pounds; that is, to 135,000 of our present money. Among other particulars, he enumerates 28,600 sheep, 1000 oxen and heifers, 1200 cows, and 500 horses, which lived for two years, 560 cwt. of beef, 2000 hogs; together with 600 beacons, 40 carcases of beef, and 600 muttons in the larder; ten tons of cider, arms for 200 men, and other warlike engines and provisions. The place of residence of the steward of the earl, was his own estate, as well as the estates of the other nobility, was farmed by the landlord himself, managed by his stewards or bailiffs, and cultivated by his villeins. Little or none of it was let on lease to usurers; its produce was consumed in its own necessaries by the heritors or their heirs. A great number of idle retainers, ready for any disorder or mischief, were maintained by him: all who lived upon his estate were absolutely at his disposal; instead of applying to others for the support of his retainers he resorted to open force and violence; the great nobility were a kind of independent potentates, who, if they submitted to any regulations at all, were less governed by the municipal law, than by a rude species of the law of nations. The method in which we find they treated the king's favourites and ministers, is a proof of their usual way of dealing with each other. A party which complains of the arbitrary conduct of ministers, ought naturally to affect a great regard for the laws and constitution, and maintain, at last, the appearance of justice in their proceedings; yet those barons, when discontented, came to parliament with an armed force, constituted the king to assent to their measure, and this was done without being brought to a trial by the court of law; they committed him, but the organ of present power. Though the persons, of whom it was chiefly composed, seemed to enjoy great independence, they really possessed no true liberty; and the security of each individual among them, was not so much derived from the general protection of law, as from his own private power and that of his confederates. The authority of the monarch, though far from absolute, was irregular, and might often reach him; the current of a faction might overwhelm him: a hundred considerations, of benefit and injuries, friendships and animosities, hopes and fears, were able to influence his conduct; and amidst these motives, a habitual respect to equity and law and justice was commonly, in those rude ages, of little moment. Nor did any man entertain thoughts of opposing present power, who did not deem himself strong enough to dispute the felicity, with it by force, and was not prepared to give battle to the sovereign of the ruling party.

Before I conclude this reign, I cannot forbear making another remark, drawn from the detail of losses given in by the elder Spencer; particularly, the great quantity of slaughtered cattle which were taken and consumed. 80,000 carcases of beef, 600 muttons. We may observe that the outrage of which he complained began after the third of May, or the eleventh, new style, as we learn from the same paper. It is easy therefore to conjecture, what a vast store of the same kind he must have laid up at the beginning of winter, and we may draw a new conclusion with regard to the wretched state of ancient husbandry, which could not provide subsistence for the cattle during that season. The earl's house at the south west corner of England: for Spencer had but one manor so far north as Yorkshire. There being few or no enclosures, except perhaps for deer, no sown grass, little hay, and no other cattle to feed the barons, as well as the people, were obliged to kill and salt their oxen and sheep in the beginning of winter, before they became lean upon the common pasture; a precaution still practised with regard to oxen in the least cultivated parts of this island. The saving of mutton is a sensible expedient which is observed every where where long disused. From this circumstance, however trivial in appearance, may be drawn important inferences with regard to the domestic economy and manner of life in those ages.

The disorders of the times, from foreign wars and internal dissensions, but above all, the cruel famine, which obliged the nobility to dismiss many of their retainers, increased the number of robbers of the kingdom; and no place was secure from their incursions. They met in troops like armies, and overran the country. Two cardinals themselves, the Pope's legates, notwithstanding the numerous troops which attended them, were robbed, and despoiled of their goods and equipage, when they traveled on the highway.

Among the other wild fancies of the age, it was imagined, that the persons affected with leprosy, a disease at that time very prevalent, and when the country was overflowed by the sea, a great number of idle retainers, ready for any disorder or mischief, were maintained by him: all who lived upon his estate were absolutely at his disposal; instead of applying to others for the support of his retainers he resorted to open force and violence; the great nobility were a kind of independent potentates, who, if they submitted to any regulations at all, were less governed by the municipal law, than by a rude species of the law of nations. The method in which we find they treated the king's favourites and ministers, is a proof of their usual way of dealing with each other. A party which complains of the arbitrary conduct of ministers, ought naturally to affect a great regard for the laws and constitution, and maintain, at last, the appearance of justice in their proceedings; yet those barons, when discontented, came to parliament with an armed force, constituted the king to assent to their measure, and this was done without being brought to a trial by the court of law; they committed him, but the organ of present power. Nor did any man entertain thoughts of opposing present power, who did not deem himself strong enough to dispute the felicity, with it by force, and was not prepared to give battle to the sovereign of the ruling party.

I have seen a French manuscript, containing accounts of some private disbursements of this king. There is an article, among others, of a crown paid to one for making the king laugh. The number of this. It is judged by the events of the reign, this ought not to have been an easy undertaking.

This king left four children, two sons and two daughters: Edward, his eldest son and successor; John, created afterwards Earl of Cornwall, who died young at Perth; Jane, afterwards married to David Bruce, King of Scotland; and Eleanor, married to Reginald, Count of Gueldres.

security to pay so far an exterior obedience to the law, as to desire a parliamentary indemnity for all their illegal proceedings; on account of the necessity, which it was pretended they lay under, of employing force against the Spencers and other evil counsellors, enemies of the king-

the Earl of Lanark, and his adherents, when the change of war turned against them, were easily reversed during the triumph of their party and the Spencers, whose for-er attainted had been reversed by parliament, were now agreed to the want of fortunes, condemned by the votes of their enemies. A council of regency was likewise appointed by parliament, consisting of twelve persons; five prelates, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Bishops of Winchester, Westminister, and Hereford; and seven lay peers, the Earls of Norfolk, Kent, and Surrey, and the Lords Wake, Ingham, Percy, and Ross. The Earl of Lancaster was appointed guardian and protector of the king's person. But though it was reasonable to ex-tune, now professed opportunities for reparation, and set out for the engaging of England. He first made an attempt on the castle of Norham, in which he was disappointed; he then collected an army of 25,000 men on the frontiers, and having given the command to the Earl of Murray, and Lord Douglas, threatened an incursion into the northern countries. The English regency, after trying in vain every ex-army of near sixty thousand men, they invited back John of Hainault, and some foreign cavalry, whom they had dismissed, and whose discipline and arms had appeared superior to those of their own country. Young Edward revenues; be never consulted either the princes of the blood, or the nobility, in any public measure; the king himself was so besieged by his creatures, that no access could be procured to him; and all the envy which had attended Boulain and Spenser fell much more deservedly on the new favourite.

A. D. 1328.

Mortimer, sensible of the growing hatred of the people, thought it requisite, on any terms, to secure his life; and accordingly, on a negotiation with Robert Bruce for that purpose. As the claim of superiority in England, more than any other cause, had tended to inflame the animosities between the two nations, Mortimer, besides stipulating a marriage between his daughter and the king, was persuaded by her of Robert, consented to resign absolutely this claim, to give up all the homages done by the Scottish parliament and nobility, and to acknowledge Robert as independent sovereign of Scotland.1 In return for these advantages, Robert stipulated the payment of 30,000 marks to England. This treaty was ratified by parliament; but was nevertheless the source of great discontent among the people, who, having enteredaneously into the pretentions of Edward I. and deeming themselves disgraced by the successful resistance made by so inferior a nation, were disappointed, by this treaty, in all future hopes of recovering their independence.

The princes of the blood, Kent, Norfolk, and Lancaster, were much united in their councils; and Mortimer entertained great suspicions of their designs against him. In summoning them to parliament, he strictly prohibited them from keeping any kind of armed force, and, on his command, had brought only their usual retinue with them, Mortimer and his party were attended by all their followers in arms, and they began with some reason to apprehend, and to be a danger to the king. They resorted, assembled their retainers, and were returning with an army to take vengeance on Mortimer, when the weakness of Kent and Nurfolk, who deserted the common cause, obliged Lancaster also to make his submissiou.2 The quarrel, by the interposition of the prelates, seemed for the present to be appeased.

But Mortimer, in order to intimidate the princes, determined to have a victm; and the simplicity of the queen's mind was so much to the advantage of the Earl of Kent, afforded him soon after an opportunity of practising upon him. By himself and his emissaries, he endeavored to persuade that prince, that his brother, King Edward, had been deprived of his kingdom by some secret prison in England. The earl, whose remorses for the part which he had acted against the late king, probably inclined him to give credit to this intelligence, entered into a design of restoring him to liberty, of re-instating him on the throne, and of making thereby some atonement for the injuries which he himself had unwarily done him.3 After this harmless contrivance had been allowed to proceed a certain length, the earl was seized by Mortimer, was accused before the parliament, and condemned by those slavish, though turbulent barons, to lose his life and fortune. The queen and Mortimer, apprehensive of young Edward's design, were desirous of proceeding with more secrecy; and the prisoner was beheaded next day; but so general was the affection borne him, and such pity prevailed for his unhappy fate, that though peers had been easily found to condemn him, it was evening before his enemies could find an executioner to perform the office.

The Earl of Lancaster, on pretence of his having assigned to the queen's hand, was soon after thrown into prison: many of the prelates and nobility were procured to : Mortimer employed this engine to crush all his enemies, and to enrich himself and his family by the for-features. The estate of the Earl of Kent was seized for his younger son, Geoffrey: the immense fortunes of the Spencers and their adherents were mostly converted to his own use: he affected a state and dignity equal or superior to the royal; his power became formidable to every one: his illegal practices were daily complained of: and all parties, forgetting past animosities, conspired in their hatred of Mortimer.

It was impossible for these abuses could long escape the observation of a prince, endowed with so much spirit and judgment as young Edward, who, being now in his eighteenth year, and feeling himself capable of governing, repined at being held in fetters by this insolent minister. It is supposed that Mortimer, being conscious of his unfavourable connections with the emissaries of Mortimer, that it behoved him to conduct the project for subverting him with the same secrecy and precaution as if he had been forming a conspiracy against his sovereign. He communicated his intentions to Lord Montacute, who engaged the Lords Molins and Clifford, Sir John Nevil of Hornby, Sir Edward Boulain, and others, to enter into their views; and the castle of Nottingham was chosen for the scene of the enterprise. The queen dowager and Mortimer lodged in that fortress: the king also was admitted, though with a few only of his attendants; and as the castle was strictly guarded, the gates locked in the night, evening, and morning, it became necessary to communicate the design to Sir William Eland, the governor, who zealously took part in it. By his direction the king's associates were admitted through a subterraneous passage, which had formerly been concealed by the castellane of the castle, but was now burned in rubbish; and Mortimer, without having it in his power to make resistance, was suddenly seized in an apartment adjoining to the queen's.4 A parliament was immediately summoned for his condemnation. He was accused before that assembly of having usurped regal power from the council of regency appointed by parliament; of having procured the death of the late king; of having deceived, and having deceived his brother; of having committed a design to restore that prince; of having solicited and obtained exorbitant grants of the royal demesnes; of having dissipated the public treasure; of secreting 20,000 marks of the money sent him by the king of Scotland, and of other crimes and misdemeanours.5 The parliament condemned him, from the supposed notoriety of the facts, without trial, or hearing his answer, or examining a witness; and he was hanged on a gibbet at the Elmes, in Westminster. This was, indeed, a period remarkable that this sentence was, near twenty years after, reversed by parliament in favour of Mortimer's son; and the reason assigned was the illegal manner of proceeding. The principles of law and justice were established in England, not in such a degree as to prevent any iniquitous sentence against a person obnoxious to the ruling party; but sufficient, on the return of his credit, or that of his friends, to serve as a reason or pretence for its reversal.

Justice was also executed, by a sentence of the House of Peers, on some of the inferior criminals, particularly on Simon de Bereford; but the barons in that act of jurisdiction entered a protest, that though they had tried Bereford, he was none of their peers, they should not for the future be obliged to receive any such indictment. The queen was confused to her own house and fortune. It was pretended that her revenue was reduced to 4000 pounds a year;7 and though the king, during the remainder of her life, paid her a decent visit once or twice a year, she never was able to reintaste herself in any credit or authority.

Edward having now taken the reins of government into his own hands, applied himself, with industry and judgment, to redress all those grievances which had preceded to these keys carried to the queen's ear from the late abuses of it. He issued writs to the judges, enjoining them to administer justice, without paying any regard to arbitrary orders from the ministers: and as the robbers, thieves, murderers, and criminals of all kinds, had, during the course of public convulsions, multiplied to an enormous degree, and were openly protected by the great officers, who made use of them against their enemies, the king, after exacting from the peers a solemn promise in parliament that they would break off all connexions with such malefactors, set himself in earnest to remedy the evil. Many of these gangs had become so numerous as to require his own personal presence at them; and he exerted both courage and industry in executing this salutary office. The ministers of justice, from his example, employed the utmost diligence in discovering, pursuing, and punishing the criminals; and this disorder was by degrees corrected, at least palliated; the utmost that could be expected with regard to a disease hitherto inherent in the constitution.

In proportion as the government acquired authority at home, it became formidable to the neighbouring nations; and the ambitious spirit of Edward sought, and soon found, an opportunity of exerting itself. The wise and valiant Robert Bruce, who had recovered by arms the independence of his country, and had fixed it by the last treaty of peace with England, soon after died, and left David, his son, a minor, under the guardianship of Randolph, Earl of Murray, the companion of all his victories, now suppliant in that country, that both the Scottish nobility, who, before the commencement of the wars, enjoyed lands in England, and the English who inherited estates in Scotland, should be restored to their respective situations; but though the article had been executed pretty regularly on the part of Edward, Robert, who observed that the estates claimed by Englishmen were much more numerous and valuable than the others, cited as his reason to admit so many of the exiles into the kingdom, or found it difficult to wrest from his own followers the possessions bestowed on them as the reward of former services; and he had protracted the performance of his part of the stipulation. The English nobles, however, in their expectations, began to think of a remedy; and as their influence was great in the north, their enmity alone, even though unsupported by the King of England, became dangerous to the minor prince, whom he submitted to the influence of the barons.

Edward Baliol, the son of that John who was crowned King of Scotland, had been detained some time a prisoner in England after his father was released; but having also obtained his liberty, he went over to France, and resided in Normandy, on his paternal estate in that country, without any thoughts of reviving the claims of his family to the crown of Scotland. He was, however, everywhere unhesitatingly and unanimously abjured by the Scots, and rejected by the English, that he was universally regarded as a private person; and he had been thrown into prison, on account of some private offenses of which he was accused. Lord Beaumont, a great English baron, who, in the right of his wife, claimed the earldom of Buchan in Scotland, 4 found him in this situation, and deeming him a proper instrument for his purpose, made such interest with the King of France, who was not aware of the consequences, that he recovered him his liberty, and brought him over with him to England.

The injured nobles, possessed of such a head, began to think of vindicating their rights by force of arms, and the appeal to Edward for his concurrence in the accu-

Scoths. vol. i. c. 30. 6 I. iii. cap. 21. 7 As Regent of Scotland, on every demand which had been made of restitution to the English barons, had always confessed the justice of their claim, and had only given an evasive answer, grounded on plausible pretences, Edward resolved not to proceed by open violence, but to employ his artifices against him. He secretly encouraged Baliol to his enterprise; convinced at his assembling forces in the north, and gave countenance to the nobles who were disposed to join in the attempt. A force of over 2,000 men was enrolled under Sir Donald Beaton; and the Lords Beaumont, Ferrars, Fitz-warn, Wake, Stafford, Talbot, and Mowbray. As these adventurers apprehended that the frontiers would be strongly armed and guarded, they resolved on a surprise; and having embarked at Ravenspur, they reached in a few days the coast of Fife.

Scotland was at that time in a very different situation from that in which it had appeared under the victorious Robert. Besides the loss of that great monarch, whose genius and authority preserved whole the political fabric, and maintained a union among the unruly barons, Lord Douglas, impatient of rest, had gone over to Spain in a crusade against the Moors; and Edward, though in the battle: the Earl of Murray, who had long been declining through age and infirmities, had lately died, and had been succeeded in the regency by Donald Earl of Marre, a man of no extraordinary abilities. The Commons of the Scots, though still unbroken, was left without a proper guidance and direction: and a minor king seemed ill qualified to defend an inheritance, which it had required all their joint strength to consolidate. With this situation they expected and were prepared to meet. As they had been apprised of the intended invasion, great numbers, on the appearance of the English fleet, immediately ran to the shore, in order to prevent the landing of the enemy. Earl Marre had valour and activity, and he drove back the Scots with considerable loss. He marched westward into the heart of the country, flattering himself that the ancient partisans of his family would declare for him. But the force ammunitions which had been medled between the two nations, inspired the Scots with a strong prejudice against a prince supported by the English, he was regarded as a common enemy; and the regent found no difficulty in assembling a great army to oppose him. It is pretended that Earl Marre had less than 40,000 men under his banners; but the same hurry and impatience that made him collect a force, which from its greatness was so disproportioned to the occasion, rendered all his motions unskillful and imprudent. The river Earne ran between the two armies; and the Scots, confiding in that security, as well as in their great superiority of numbers, kept no order in their encampment. Baliol had not been so prudent as to attack the unguarded and undissembled Scots; threw them into confusion, which was increased by the darkness, and by their very numbers to which they trusted; and he beat them off the field with great slaughter. But in the morning, when the Scots were at a certain distance, they were ashamed of having yielded the victory at so weak a file, and they hurried back to recover the honour of the day. Their eager passions urged them precipitately to battle, without regard to some broken ground which lay between them and the enemy, and which disordered and confounded their ranks. Baliol seized the favourable opportunity, advanced his troops upon the confounded princes, who had been prevented the previous night by Earl Marre, Lord Lynedoch, and many others, of the miserable state of military discipline in those ages. Baliol soon after made himself master of Perth; but still was not able to bring over any of the Scots to his party. Patrick Dunbar, Earl of March, and Sir Archibald Douglas, brother to the lord of that name, appeared at the head of the Scottish armies, which amounted still to near 40,000 men; and they purposed to reduce Baliol and the English by famine. They blockaded Berwick by land; they collected some vessels with which they invested it by water; but Baliol's ships fled or were taken, and thus a complete victory; and opened the communication between Berwick and the sea. The Scottish armies were then obliged to disband for want of pay and subsistence; the nation was, in effect, the loss of the hands of men: each nobleman who found himself most exposed to danger, successively submitted to Baliol; that prince was crowned at Scione: David, his competitor, was the forlorn husband, wife, Jane, sister to Edward: and the heads of his party sued to Baliol for a truce, which he granted them, in order to assemble a parliament in tranquility, and have his title recognised by the whole Scottish nation.

But Baliol's imprudence, or his necessities, making him dismiss the greater part of his English followers, he was, notwithstanding the truce, attacked on a sudden near Annan, by Sir Archibald Douglas, and other chieftains of that party; he was routed; his brother John Baliol was slain; he himself was chased into England in a miserable condition; and thus lost his kingdom by a revolution as sudden as that by which he had gained it.

While Baliol enjoyed his short-lived and precarious royalty, he had been sensible, that, without the protection of England, it would be impossible for him to maintain possession of the throne; and he had secretly sent a message to Edward, by way of the Scots, professing to renew the homage for his crown, and to espouse the Princeess Jane, if the Pope's consent could be obtained for dissolving her former marriage, which was not yet consummated. Edward, ambitious of recovering Scotland, and old school to the most important concessions, by Mortimer during his minority, threw off all scruples, and willingly accepted the offer; but as the detaining of Baliol had been a great object of the English, the king was prepared to reinstate him in possession of the crown; an enterprise which appeared from late experience so easy and so little hazardous. As he possessed many popular arts, he consulted his parliament on the occasion; but that assembly, finding the resolution already taken, declined giving any opinion, and only granted him, in order to support the enterprise, an aid of a fifteenth, from the personal estates of the nobility and centre, and a tenth of the value of the salt in the south of England; and they added a proviso, that the king would thenceforth live on his own revenue, without grudging his subjects by illegal taxes, or by the outrageous seizure of their goods in the shape of purveyance.

As the Scots expected that the chief brunt of the war would fall upon Berwick, Douglas, the Regent, threw a strong garrison into that place, under the command of Sir William Douglas, the brother of the man who had given the hand of his young king to the hand of Baliol; the English were greatly alarmed on the news; and they quitted their own garrison in the north of England, without a struggle, and passed over the Tweed, and then the Tweed, and committed the frontier to the English. The English monarch, after his residence in Scotland, returned to London.

A. D. 1334.

The Scots were not at all disposed to make peace. The Regent, with the consent of the Scots, sent a letter to Philip the Fair, the king of France, inviting him to come to a conference to settle the dispute. Philip the Fair came in December, 1337. The English monarchs met at Halidon-hill, a little north of Berwick; and though his heavy-armed cavalry dissolved in the field, under the action more steady and desperate, they were received with such regard by Edward, and were so galled by the English archers, that they were soon thrown into disorder, and, on the fall of Douglas, their general, were totally routed. The whole army was swept off, the English generals lost only one of their companions, and, besides, the Irish, gave little quarter in the pursuit: all the nobles of chief distinction were slain or taken prisoners; near thirty thousand of the Scots fell in the action; while the number of the English was lost in the fine of the battle. A considerable body with Baliol to complete the conquest of the kingdom, returned with the remainder of his army to England. Baliol was acknowledged king by a parliament assembled at Edinburgh: the superiority of England was again recognised; many of the Scottish nobility made fealty to Edward; and to complete the misfortunes of that nation, Balioileed Berwick, Donbar, Roxborough, Edinburgh, and all the south-east counties of Scotland, which were declared to be forever annexed to the English monarchy.

If Baliol, on his first appearance, was dreaed by the Scots, as an instrument employed by England to subvert the kingdom, this deed confirmed all their suspicions, and rendered him the object of universal hatred. Whatever submissions they might be obliged to make, they considered him, not as their prince, but as the delegate and confidante of their conqueror. Sir Andrew Murray, appointed Regent by the party of this latter prince, employed with success his valour and activity in many small but decisive actions against Baliol, and was himself almost wholly expelled him the kingdom. Edward was obliged again to assemble an army, and to march into Scotland: the Scots, taught by experience, withdrew into their hills and fastnesses; they fortified the houses and ravaged the estates of those whom he called rebels; but this confirmed them still further in their obstinate antipathy to England and to Baliol; and being now rendered desperate, they were ready to take advantage of the first opportunity of the retreat of their enemy, and they soon re-conquered their country from the English. Edward made anew his appearance in Scotland with like success: he found every thing hostile, and the king himself in the spot on which he was encamped: and though he marched uncontrolled over the low countries, the nation itself was further from ever being broken and subdued. Besides being supported, by their pride and anger, passions difficult to tame, they were encouraged, amidst all their calamities, by daily promises of relief from France; and as a war was now likely to break out between that kingdom and England, they had reason to expect, from this incident, a great division of that force which had so long oppressed and overwhelmed them.

A. D. 1335.

We now come to a transaction, on which depended the most memorable events, not only of this king, but of the whole English and French history, during more than a century; and it will therefore be necessary to give a particular account of the springs and causes of it. It had long been prevailing opinion, that the crown of France could never descend to a female; and, in order to give more authority to this maxim, and assign it a determinate end, it had been usual to derive it from a clause in the Salian Code, the law of an ancient tribe among the Franks; though that clause, when strictly examined, carries only the appearance of favouring this principle, and does not really, by the confession of the best antiquaries, in the sense commonly understood upon 19th July.

it. But though positive law seems wanting among the French for the exclusion of females, the practice had taken place; and the rule was established beyond controversy on some account as well as some modern precedents.
During the first race of the Capets, the Franks were so rude and barbarous a people, that they were incapable of submitting to a female reign; and in that period of their history there were frequent instances of kings advanced to royal dignity by the succession of dyed, were related to the woman by nearer degrees of consanguinity. These preced-tents, joined to like causes, had also established the male succession in the second race; and though the instances were not always so circumstantial that persons of either sex might assert, the principle of excluding the female line seems still to have prevailed, and to have directed the conduct of the nation. During the third race, the crown had descended from father to son for eleven generations, from Hugh Capet to Louis Hutin; and thus, in fact, during the course of nine hundred years, the French monarchy had always been governed by males, and no female, and none who founded his title on a female line ever mounted the throne. Philip the Fair, father of Lewis Hutin, left three sons, this Lewis, Philip the Long, and Charles the Fair, and one daughter, Isabelia, Queen of England. Lewis Hutin, the eldest, left at his death one daughter, by Marpanga, Queen of Scotland; and as the queen was then pregnant, Philip, his younger brother, was appointed regent till it should appear whether the child proved a son or a daughter. The queen bore a male, who lived, and hence Philip became eldest, as the Duke of Burgundy made some opposition, and asserted the rights of his niece, the states of the kingdom, by a solemn and deliberate decree, gave her an exclusion, and declared all females for ever incapable of succeeding to the crown of France. Philip died after a short reign, leaving three daughters; and his brother Charles, without dispute, or controversy, then succeeded to the crown.
The reign of Charles was also short; he left one daughter;
but before his death he made his heiress, or at least his age-pointed regent, with a declared right of succession, if the issue should prove female. This prince was Philip de Valois, cousin-german to the deceased king; being the son of Charles de Valois, brother of Philip the Fair.
The Queen of France was delivered of a daughter:
the regency coded; and Philip de Valois was unanimously placed on the throne of France.
The Kings of England, who was at that time a youth of fifteen years of age, embraced a notion that he was entitled, in right of his mother, to the succession of the crown, and that the claim of the nephew was preferable to that of the French monarch. But Edward, not well imagined a notion weaker or worse grounded. The principle of excluding females was of old an established opinion in France, and had acquired equal authority with the most express and positive law; it was supported by ancient precedents; it was confirmed by recent instances; solemnly and deliberately decided: and what placed it still further beyond controversy, if Edward was disposed to question its validity, he thereby cut off his own preten-sions; since the three last kings had all left daughters, who were still alive, and who stood before him in the order of succession. He was therefore reduced to assert, that, though his mother Isabella was, on account of her sexual incapacity of succeeding, he himself, who inherited through her, was liable to no such objection, and might claim by the right of proprium. But, besides that this pretension was more favourable to Charles, King of Navarre, a brother of the deceased, than to a sister, it was clearly contrary to the established principles of succession in every country of Europe.24 was so repugnant to the practice, both to private and public inheritances, that nobody in France, at that time, under his claim; Philip's assertion was universally rejected: 25 and he explained, that he had a competitor; much less so formidable a one as the King of England.

But through the youthful and ambitious mind of Edward had rashly entertained this notion, he did not think proper to insist on his pretensions, which must have immediately involved him, on very unequal terms, in a dangerous and unpalatable war with so powerful a monarch.

Philip was a prince of mature years, of great experience, and, at that time, of an established character both for prudence and valour; and by these circumstances, as well as by the internal union of his people, and their acquiescence in his undoubted right, he possessed every advantage above all his enemies. He could, by injurious and violent, to the government of the most intractable and most turbulent subjects in Europe. But there immediately occurred an accident which required that Edward should either open the war by a fresh renewal of resistance and abjure them. He was summoned to do homage for Guennue: Philip was preparing to compel him by force of arms: that country was in a very bad state of defence; and the forfeiture of so rich an inheritance was, by the feudal law, the immediate consequence of his refusing or deciding to perform the duty of a vassal. Edward therefore thought it prudent to submit to present necessity: he went over to Amiens; did homage to Philip; and as there had arisen some controversy concerning the terms of submission, he afterwards sent over a formal deed, in which he acknowledged that he owed liege homage to France; 26 which was in effect ratifying, and that in the strongest terms, Philip's pretensions. Philip was, however, his own claim indeed was so unreasonable, and so thoroughly disavowed by the whole French nation, that to insist on it was no better than pretending to the violent conquest of the kingdom; and Edward, on further thought of it, had it not been for some incidents which excited an animosity between the monarchs.

Robert of Artois was descended from the blood royal of France, was a man of great character and authority, had espoused Philip's sister, and, by his birth, talents, and credit, was entitled to make the highest figure, and fill the most important offices, in the monarchy. This prince had lost the county of Artois, which he claimed as his birthright, by his ancestor, his heir was age, pointed regent, with a declared right of succession, if
the issue should prove female. This prince was Philip de Valois, cousin-german to the deceased king; being the son of Charles de Valois, brother of Philip the Fair.
The Queen of France was delivered of a daughter:

placed on the throne of France.

Low Countries and on the borders of Germany, the only places from which he either could make an effectual attack upon France, or produce such a diversion as might save the province of Guisene, which lay so much exposed to the power of Philip.

Preparations for war with France. The king began with opening his intentions to the Count of Hainault, his father-in-law; and having engaged him in his interests, he employed the good offices and counsels of that prince in his plans; and soon afterwards referred the expenses of those undertakings to the count of Namur. The Duke of Brabant was induced, by his mediation, and by large remittances of money from England, to promise his concurrence; the Archbishop of Cambrai, and the Marquis of Juliers, the Count of Namur, the Lords of Fauquemont and Baupen, were engaged by like motives to embrace the English alliance. These sovereign princes could supply, either from their own states or from the bordering countries, great numbers of warlike troops; and nought was wanting to make the force on that quarter very formidable but the accession of Flanders; which Edward procured by means somewhat extraordinary and unusual.

As the Flemings were the first people in the northern parts of Europe that cultivated arts and manufactures, the Flemish names are at this day a degree of opulence unknown elsewhere to those of their station in that barbarous age; had acquired privileges and independence; and began to emerge from that state of vassalage, or rather of slavery, into which the common people had long been reduced. The power of the court at Brussels, it was probably difficult for them to bring their sovereign and their nobility to conform themselves to the principles of law and civil government, so much neglected in every other country; but it was impossible for them to confine themselves within the proper bounds in their opposition and resentment against any instance of tyranny: they had risen in tumults; had insulted the nobles: had ceased to regard the monarch as an authority; and, over to the guidance of a sedulous leader, had been guilty of all that insolence and disorder, to which the thoughtless and enraged populace are so much inclined, whenever they are unfortunate enough to be their own masters. Their present leader was James d'Arteville, a brewer in Ghent, who governed them with a more absolute sway than had ever been assumed by any of their lawful sovereigns. He was placed and disseized all the magnates at pleasure; he was accompanied by a guard, who, on the least signal from him, instantly assassinated any man that happened to fall under his displeasure: all the citizens of Ghent were deprived of their property, and were destined to death to give him the smallest umbrage: the few nobles who remained in the country, lived in continual terror from his violence: he seized the estates of all those whom he had either banished or murdered; and bestowed a great part on their wives and children, converted the remainder to his own use. Such were the first effects that Europe saw of popular violence; after having grounded, during so many ages, under monarchal and aristocratical tyrannies. James d'Arteville was the man to whom Edward addressed himself for bringing over the Flanders to his interests; and that prince, the most haughty and most aspiring of the age, never courted any ally with so much ardor. He seconded the king in this great enterprise, affected to consult his parliament, asked their advice, and obtained their consent. And the more to strengthen his hands, he procured from them a grant of 20,000 sacks of wool; which might amount to about a hundred thousand pounds: this commodity was a good instrument to employ with the Flemings; and the price of it with his German allies. He completed the other necessary sums by loans, by pawning the crown jewels, by confining, or rather robbing at once all the Lombards, who now exercised the invincible trade formerly monopolized by the Jews, of lending on interest; and being attended by a body of English forces, and by several of his nobility, he sailed over to Flanders.

The Germans were provoked by the strides of France, and their unprovoked hostilities against France, A.D. 1338, had required the sanction of some legal authority; and Edward, that he might give them satisfaction on this head, had applied to the Kings of Castile, of Naples, and the Marquis of Juliers, the Count of Namur, the Lords of Fauquemont and Baupen, were engaged by like motives to embrace the English alliance. These sovereign princes could supply, either from their own states or from the bordering countries, great numbers of warlike troops; and nought was wanting to make the force on that quarter very formidable but the accession of Flanders; which Edward procured by means somewhat extraordinary and unusual.

to be exhausted, they were slow in their motions, and irresolute in their measures. The Duke of A. D. 1328. Brabant, the most powerful among them, seemed even inclined to withdraw himself wholly from the alliance; and the king was necessitated, both to gain the Brabanters new privileges in trade, and to contract to his son Edward with the daughter of that prince, ere he could bring him to fulfil his engagements. The summer was wasted in indecisions and negociations; and Edward could take the field; and he was obliged, in order to allure his German allies into his measures, to pretend that the first attack should be made upon Cambry, a city in his marches, which had been consecrated for his protection.
But finding, upon trial, the difficulty of the enterprise, he conducted them towards the frontiers of France; and he there saw, by a sensible proof, the vanity of his expectations: the Count of Namur, his brother-in-law, (for the old count was dead,) refused to commence hostilities against his hereditary lord, and retired with his troops. So little account did they make of Edward's pretensions to the crown of England.

War with France. The king, however, entered the enemy's country, and encamped on the fields of Vi-ronfosse, near Capelle, with an army of near 50,000 men, commanded by the family of Forester, which had contracted to his honour, without running any unnecessary hazard.
The two armies faced each other for some days; mutual defense; the Earl of Northumberland, at his rest retired into Flanders, and disbanded his army.a

Such was the fruitless and almost ridiculous conclusion of Edward's mighty preparations; and, as his measures were made more difficult from the situation in which he found himself, he might learn from experience in what a hopeless case he was engaged. His expenses, though they had led to no end, had been consuming and destructive: he had contracted debts; he had anticipated all his revenue; he had pawed every thing of value which belonged either to himself or his queen; he was obliged, in some measure, even to pawn himself to his creditors, by not sailing to England till he obtained their permission, and by promising on his word of honour to return in person, if he did not remit their money.

But he was a prince of too much spirit to be discouraged by the first difficulties of an undertaking; and he was anxious to retrieve his honour by more successful and more gallant enterprises. For this purpose he had, during the course of the campaign, sent orders to summon a parliament by the royal name, Edward, whom he had left with the title of guardian, and to demand some supply in his urgent necessities. The barons seemed inclined to grant his request; but the knights, who often at this time acted as a separate body from the barons, made some scruple of taxing their constituents without their consent; and they desired the guardian to summon a new parliament, which might be properly empowered for that purpose.
The situation of the king and parliament was for the time nearly similar to that which they constantly fell into about the beginning of the last century; and similar consequences began visibly to appear. The king, sensible of the frequent demands which he should be obliged to make on his subjects, had been anxious to assure to his friends a seat in the House of Commons, and at his instaigation, the sheriffs and other placemen had made interest to be elected into that assembly; an abuse which the parliament of England, by the tenor of the four magnae charters, was accordingly remedied. On the other hand, the knights had professedly annexed conditions to their intended grant, and required a considerable retribution of the royal prerogatives, particularly with regard to purveyance, and the levying of the ancient feudal aids for knightng the king's eldest son, and marrying his eldest daughter. The new parliament, called by the guardian, retained the same free spirit; and though they offered a large supply of 30,000 sacks of wool, no business was concluded, because the conditions which they annexed were considered as a temporary concession. But when Edward himself came over to England he summoned another parliament, and he had the interest to procure a supply on more moderate terms. French parliaments before Edward's times, and of the privileges of boroughs, a pardon for old debts and trespasses, and a remedy for some abuses in the execution of common law, were the chief conditions insisted on; and the king promised, if this was made, a grant of 30,000 pounds obtained from the barons and knights an unusual grant for two years of the ninth sheaf, lamb, and fleece on their estates; and from the burgesses a sixth of their movables at their true value. The whole parliament agreed to a duty of forty shillings on each sack of wool exported, on each three hundred woolwells, and on each last of leather for the same term of years; but dreading the arbitrary spirit of the crown, they expressly declared that this grant was to continue no longer, and was not to be drawn into precedent. Being soon after sensible that this supply, though considerable, and very unusual in that age, would come in slowly, and would not answer the king's urgent necessities, the king approached the French kings openly in all public deeds gave himself that appellation, and always quartered the arms of France with those of England in his seals and ensigns. The parliament thought proper to oblige the consequences of this measure, and declare that they owed him no obedience as King of France, and that the two kingdoms must for ever remain different and independent. They undoubtedly foresaw that France, if subdivided, would in the end prove the seat of government, and they deemed this present protestation necessary, in order to prevent their becoming a province to that monarchy. A frail security, if the event had really taken place!

As Edward was imprifized, from the preparations which were making both in England and the Low Countries, that he must expect another invasion from Edward, he fitted out a great fleet of 400 vessels, with men of war, and brought the fleet to Sluise, with a view of intercepting the king in his passage. The English navy was much Naval victory, inferior in number, consisting only of 240 sail; but whether it were by the superior abilities of Edward, or the greater dexterity of his seamen, they gained the wind of the enemy, and had the sun in their backs; and with these advantages began the action. The battle was fierce and bloody: the English archers, whose force and address were now much celebrated, galled the French on their approach; and when the ships grappled together, and the contest became more steady and furious, the example of the king and the knight of Flamborough, by the tenor of the four magnae charters, was accordingly remedied. On the other hand, the knights had professedly annexed conditions to their intended grant, and required a considerable retribution of the royal prerogatives, particularly with regard to purveyance, and the levying of the ancient feudal aids for knightng the king's eldest son, and

* Froissart, liv. i. chap. 10.
The lustre of this great success increased the king's authority in his own eyes, and the forces of war, with expedition, and joined the English army. Edward marched to the frontiers of France at the head of above 100,000 men, consisting chiefly of foreigners, a more numerous army than either before or since has ever been commanded by a king of England; and that at a time when the Flemings, to the number of 50,000 men, marched out under the command of Robert of Artois, and laid siege to St. Omer; but this tumultuary army, composed entirely of treacherous and cowardly subjects, was routed, by a sally of the garrison, and notwithstanding the abilities of their leader, was thrown into such a panic, that they were instantly dispersed, and never more appeared in the field. The enterprises of Edward, though not attended with so inglorious an issue, proved equally vain and fruitless. The King of France had assembled an army more numerous than the English; was accompanied by all the chief nobility of his dominions, by his crown princes, and even by three monarchs, the Kings of Bohemia, Scotland, and Navarre: yet he still adhered to the prudent resolution of putting nothing to hazard, and after throwing strong garrisons into all the frontier towns, he retired to his courts, persuaded that the enemy, having wasted their force in some tedious and unsuccessful enterprise, would afford him an easy victory.

Tournaix was at that time one of the most considerable cities in Flanders, and had 50,000 inhabitants of all ages, who were averse to the French government; and as the secret of Edward's design had not been strictly kept, Philip learned that the English, in order to gratify the discontent of his subjects, were determined to attack the city with the siege of this place: he took care, therefore, to supply it with a garrison of 14,000 men, commanded by the bravest nobility of France; and he reasonably expected that these forces, joined to the inhabitants, would be able to defend the city against all the efforts of the enemy. Accordingly Edward, when he commenced the siege, about the end of July, found every where an obstinate resistance; the valour of one side was encountered with equal valour by the other: every assault was repulsed, and proved unsuccessful: and the king was at last obliged to turn the siege into a blockade, in hopes that the great numbers of the garrison and citizens, which had enabled them to sustain their resistance, would be too feeble to expose them to the more easily reduced by famine. The Count of Eu, who commanded in Tournaix, as soon as he perceived that the English had formed this plan of operations, endeavoured to save his possessions, by expelling all the useless mouths; and the Duke of Brabant, who wished no success to Edward's enterprises, gave every one a free passage through his quarters.

After the siege had continued ten weeks, the city was reduced to distress; and Philip, recalling all his scattered garrisons, advanced towards the English camp, at the head of a mighty army, with an intention of still avoiding any decisive action, but of seeking some opportunity for thorough defeat. Here Edward, irritated with the small progress he had hitherto made, and with the disagreeable prospect that lay before him, sent Philip a defiance by a herald, and challenged him to decide their claims from the crown of France, either by single combat, or by an action of a hundred against a hundred, or by a general engagement. But Philip replied, that Edward, having done homage to him for the duchy of Guisnez, and having endeavoured to save his provinces, by expelling all the useless mouths; and the Duke of Brabant, who wished no success to Edward's enterprises, gave every one a free passage through his quarters.

But Philip replied, that Edward, having done homage to him for the duchy of Guisnez, and having endeavoured to save his provinces, by expelling all the useless mouths; and the Duke of Brabant, who wished no success to Edward's enterprises, gave every one a free passage through his quarters.

After the siege had continued ten weeks, the city was reduced to distress; and Philip, recalling all his scattered garrisons, advanced towards the English camp, at the head of a mighty army, with an intention of still avoiding any decisive action, but of seeking some opportunity for thorough defeat. Here Edward, irritated with the small progress he had hitherto made, and with the disagreeable prospect that lay before him, sent Philip a defiance by a herald, and challenged him to decide their claims from the crown of France, either by single combat, or by an action of a hundred against a hundred, or by a general engagement. But Philip replied, that Edward, having done homage to him for the duchy of Guisnez, and having endeavoured to save his provinces, by expelling all the useless mouths; and the Duke of Brabant, who wished no success to Edward's enterprises, gave every one a free passage through his quarters.
duce, could possibly be contrived by the king or his ministers. And though the parliament, foreseeing the inconvenience, had granted, as a present resource, 20,000 sacks of wool, the only English goods that bore a sure price, the quantity next to rentless for money; it was impossible but the getting possession of such a bulky commodity, the gathering of it from different parts of the kingdom, and the disposing of it abroad, must take a long time. Besides the urgency, the parliament would not permit, and must occasion all the disappointments complained of during the course of the campaign. But though nothing had happened, which Edward might not reasonably demand, he had got within what was an unfortunate issue of his military operations, and so much vexed and annoyed by his foreign creditors, that he was determined to throw the blame somewhere off himself, and he came in very bad humour into England. He dis- covered his peevish disposition by the first act which he performed after his arrival: as he landed unexpectedly, he found the Tower negligently guarded; and he immedi- ately committed to prison the constable, and all the others who had the charge of that fortress, and treated them with unusual rigour. His vengeance fell next on the officers of the revenue, the sheriffs, the collectors of the taxes, the under-takers of all kinds of work; besides dismissing all of them from their employments, he appointed commissioners to inquire into their conduct; and these men, in order to gratify the king's humour, were sure not to find any per- son innocent who came before them. Sir John St. Paul, keeper of the great seal, Sir John Smith, chief justice, Andrew Aubrey, Mayor of London, were disabled and imprisoned; as were also the Bishop of Chichester, chan- cellor, and the Bishop of Lichfield, treasurer. Stratford, Archbishop of Canterbury, to whom the charge of collecting the new taxes had been chiefly intrusted, fell likewise under the king's displeasure; but being absent at the time of Edward's arrival, he escaped feeling the immediate effects of his anger. There were strong reasons which might discourage the kings of England, in those ages, from bestowing the chief offices of the crown on prelates and other eccle- siastics or laymen. These men had so intrusted them- selves in privileges and immunities, and so openly chal- lenged an exemption from all secular jurisdiction, that no civil penalty could be inflicted on them for any malversa- tion in office; and as even treason itself was declared to be no canonical offence, nor was allowed to be a sufficient reason for depriving or other spiritual censures, that order of men had insured to themselves an almost total immunity, and were not bound by any political law or statute. And on the other hand, these were men of a pecu- liar class which favoured their promotion. Besides that they possessed almost all the learning of the age, and were best qualified for civil employments; the prelates enjoyed equal dignity with the ranks of the crown; as their crimes bore weight, by their personal authority, to the powers intrusted with them: while at the same time they did not endanger the crown, by accumulating wealth or influence in their families, and were restrained, by the decency of their character, from that open rapine and violence so often practised by the nobles. These motives had induced Edward, as well as many of his predecessors, to intrust the chief depart- ments of government in the hands of ecclesiastics, at the hazard of seeing them disown his authority as soon as it was turned against them. A. D. 1341. This was the case with Archbishop Strat- ford, with the prelates, informed of Edward's indignation against him, prepared himself for the storm; and not content with standing upon the defensive, he re- solved, by beginning the attack, to show the king that he knew the pretensions of his character, and had courage to maintain them. He issued a general summons of excommunion against all who, on any pretext, exercised vio- lence on the person or goods of clergy-men; who infringed those privileges secured by the Great Charter, and by eccle- siastics or laymen; or who accused a prelate of treason, or any other crime, in order to bring him under the king's displeasure. Even Edward had reason to think himself struck at by this sentence; both on account of the imprisonment of the two bishops, and that of other clergy- men concerned in levying the taxes, and on account of having their goods and movables, that he might make them amenable for any balance which appeared due in their hands. The clergy, with the prince at their head, were now formed into a regular combination against the king; and many calumnies were spread against him, in order to turn the public against his person. He was accused of having deprived so many of his followers of their possessions, that it was pretended that he meant to recall the general par- don, and the remission which he had granted of old debts, and to impose new and arbitrary taxes without consent of parliament. He had entered into operations, by which he had imprisoned one of his own household, and had authorized them for their obstinate offenders. These topics were not well calculated to appease Edward's indignation; and when he called a parliament, he sent not to the privy, as to the other peers, a summons to attend on him. Stratford, chief justice, was accused of being a traitor or anger: he appeared before the gates, arrayed in his pontifical robes, holding the crosser in his hand, and ac- companied by a pompous train of priests and prelates; and he required of them all the declared to be enemies to the crown. During two days the king rejected his application: but sensible, either that this affair might be attended with dangerous consequences, or that in his im- patience he had perhaps unthoughtfully accused some people, at his return in his office, which seems really to have been the case, he at last permitted him to take his seat, and was reconciled to him. Edward was now found himself in a bad situation both with his own people and with foreign states; and it required all his genius and capacity to extricate himself from such multiplied difficulties and embarrassments. His unjust and exorbitant demands on France and Scotland had en- gaged him in an unpopular war with these two kingdoms, his nearest neighbours: he had lost almost all his foreign alliances by his irregular payments: he was deeply in- volved in debts, for which he owed a consuming interest; and his military operations on many other hands, except his naval victory, none of them had been attended even with glory or renown, either to himself or to the nation: the animosity between him and the clergy was open and declared, and the people were discouraged on ac- count of many arbitrary measures in which he had been engaged: and what was more dangerous, the nobility, taking advantage of his present necessities, were deter- mined to retract his power, and by encroaching on the ancient prerogatives of the crown, to acquire to themselves independence and authority. But the aspiring genius of Edward, which had so far transported him beyond the bounds of discretion, proved at last sufficient to reinstate him in his former authority, and finally, to render his reign the most triumphant that is to be met with in English story: though for the present he was obliged, with some losses of dignity, to yield to the current which bore so strongly against him. The parliament framed an act, which was likely to produce considerable innovations in the government. They presumed, that, whereas the great charter had to prohibit the damages of the people, been violated in many points, particularly by the imprisonment of free men, and the seizure of their goods, without suit, indictment, or trial, it was necessary to con- form it anew. It abolished all chief debtors, and put together with the steward and chamberlain of the house- hold, the keeper of the privy seal, the comptroller and treauser of the wardrobe, and those who were intrusted with the education of the young prince, to swear to the regular observance of it. They also remarked, that the peers of the realm had formerly been arrested and imprisoned, and disposed of their temporalities and lands, and that the consequence of such conduct was not to preclude future enjoyment of the same, but that the king should fill it by the advice of his council, and the consent of such barons as should at that time be found to reside in the neighbourhood of the court. And they endeavoured to demonstrate that the king should resume into his own hand all these offices, except those of justices of the two benches, and the barons of exchequer; that the ministers should for the time be reduced to private persons; that they should in that condition answer before parliament to any accusation brought against them; and that, if they were found anyway guilty, they should finally be disfranchised of their offices, and more persons be substituted in their place.

These last regulations the barons approached as near as they durst to those restrictions which had formerly been imposed on Henry III. and Edward II., and which, from the dangerous considerations attending them, had become so odious that, for fifteen years, no barons were willing to hazard the concurrence of the people in demanding them, or the ascent of the present king in granting them.

In return for these important concessions, the parliament declared the king himself a traitor to the good of the state, and his wants so urgent, from the clamours of his creditors, and the demands of his foreign allies, that he was obliged to accept of the supply on these hard conditions. He ratified this statute; but he secretly entered a protest of such a nature as were sufficient, one should imagine, to destroy all future trust and confidence with his people: he declared, that as soon as his brother and the other dispossessed barons should have withdrawn from the public令牌, revoke what had been extorted from him. Accordingly, he was no sooner possessed of the parliamentary supply, than he issued an edict, which contains many extraordinary provisions and penaltys. In his first article, that statute had been enacted contrary to law; as if a free legislative body could ever do any thing illegal. He next affirms, that as it was hurtful to the prerogatives of the crown, which he had returned in their place, he had only dissembled when he seemed to ratify it, but that he had never in his own breast given his assent to it. He does not pretend that either he or the parliament lay under force; but only that some inconvenience would have ensued. He ratified this statute under the aspect of the pretended statute. He therefore, with the advice of his council, and of some earls and barons, advocates and amis his; and though he professes himself willing and determined to observe such articles of it as were formerly law, he declares it to have beenforth no force or authority. The statutes that were afterwards assembled took no notice of this arbitrary exration of royal power, which, by a parity of reason, left all their laws at the mercy of the king; and, during the course of two years, Edward had so far re-established his influence, and freed himself from his present necessities, that he then obtained from the parliament this repeal of the obnoxious statute.

This transaction certainly contains remarkable circumstances, which discover the manners and sentiments of the age; and may prove what inaccuracy work might be expected from such rubbish, when employed in legislation, and in retiring the delicate fabric of laws and a constitution.

But though Edward had happily recovered his authority at home, which had been impaired by the losses of the French war, he had undergone so many mortifications from that attempt, and saw so little prospect of success, that he would probably have dropped his claim, had not a revolution in Brittany opened him to more promising views, and given his-enterprising genius a full opportunity of displaining itself.

John III. Duke of Brittany had, during some years, found himself declining through age and infirmities; and having no issue, he was solicitous to prevent the succession to his title, either by the birth or death of his deisme, a disputed succession might expose his subjects. His younger brother, the Count of Penthièvre, had left only one daughter, whom the duke displeased her; and as his family inherited the duchy by the female line, and he judged his recent marriage, the marriage was the male heir of that principality. He accordingly prepared to dispose in the manner he thought best to the crown of Montfort, who being his brother by a second marriage, was the male heir of that principality. He accordingly prepared to dispose in the manner he thought best to that crown.

But on the death of this good prince, the ambition of the Count of Montfort broke through all those regulations, and kindled a war, not only dangerous to Brittany, but to a great part of Europe. While Charles of Blois was soliciting at the court of France the investiture of the duchy, Montfort was active in acquiring immediate possession of it; and by force or intrigue he made himself master of Rennes, Nantz, Brest, Hennebont, and all the most important fortresses, and engaged many confederates to his aid; for he seemed to calculate that he could expect no favour from Philip, he made a voyage to England, on pretence of soliciting his claim to the earldom of Richmond, which had devolved to him by his brother's death; and he there offered to do homage, and Edward as King of France, for the duchy of Brittany, he proposed a strict alliance for the support of their mutual pretensions. Edward saw immediately the advantages attending this treaty; Montfort, an active and valiant prince, closely united to the state, was given an entrance into the heart of France, and afforded him much more flattering views than his allies on the side of Germany and the Low Countries, who had no sincere attachment to him, and whose assistance was obstructed by those numerous fortifications which had been raised on that frontier. Robert of Artois was zealous in enforceing these considerations: the ambitious spirit of Edward was little disposed to sit down in marriage on those repulses which he had received, and which, he thought, had so much impaired his reputation; and it required a very short negotiation to conclude a treaty of alliance between two men, who, though their pleas with regard to the preference of male or female succession were directly opposite, were intimately connected by their immediate interests.

As this treaty was still a secret, Montfort, on his return, ventured to appear at Paris, in order to defend his cause before the court of peers; but observing Philip and his judges to be prepossessed against his title, and dreading their intentions of arresting him, till he should restore what he had seized by violence, he suddenly made his escape; and war immediately commenced between him and Charles of Blois. Philip sent his eldest son, the Duke of Nemours, with a powerful army, to the assistance of the latter; and Montfort, unable to resist the field against his rival, remained in the city of Nantz, where he was besieged. The city was taken by the treachery of the inhabitants; Montfort fell into the hands of his enemies; was conducted as a prisoner to Paris; and was shut up in the tower of the Louvre.\(^3\)

A. D. 1342. This event seemed to put an end to the royal pretensions of the Count of Mountfort; but his affairs were successively disturbed by unexpected incidents, which improved new life and vigour into his party. Jane of Flanders, Countess of Mountfort, the most extraordinary woman of the age, was roused, by the captivity of her husband, from the torpor into which she had hitherto limited her genius; and she courageously undertook to support the falling fortunes of her family. No sooner did she receive the final intelligence, than she assumed the accustomed postures of her inheritance, where she then resided; and carrying her infant son in her arms, deplored to them the calamity of their sovereign. She recommended to their care the illustrious orphan, the sole male heir of the ancient Montfort family. The audience, moved by the affecting appearance, and inspired by the noble conduct, of the princess, vowed to live and die with her in defending the rights of her family; all the houses of the Benedicts adhered to the resolution: the countess went from place to place, encouraging the garrisons, providing them with every thing necessary for subsistence, and concerting the proper plans of defence; and after she had put the whole province in a good posture, she shut herself up in Hennesbonne, where she waited with impatience the arrivals of those succours which Edward had promised her. Meanwhile she sent over her son to England, that she might both put him in a place of safety, and engage the king and the English to make a show of assistance. The defence was no less vigorous: the besiegers were repulsed in every assault; frequent sallies were made with success, and the garrison honourably resisted the most inhuman attempts. Edward, without any fault on his own side, after having maintained for a considerable time that siege, was constrained by his master to make a truce; and the English, who had triumphed, were content with the terms which Edward had extorted from them, by the promise of a new and more powerful succour. The king landed at Morbain, near Vannes, with an army of 12,000 men; and, being master of the field, he endeavoured to give a lustre to his arms, by commencing at once three important sieges, that of Vannes, of Renness, and of Nantes. But by undertaking too much, he failed of success in all his enterprises. Even the siege of Vannes, which Edward, in person, conducted with vigour, was not attended with success; and the French had the usual device of making preparations against him. The Duke of Normandy, eldest son of Philip, appeared in Brittany, at the head of an army of 30,000 infantry and 4000 cavalry, and besieged Vannes, where he was left to himself by the king, and by his master, who was engaged in another contest. Edward, however, was not satisfied with this truce; and he immediately invaded England, exposed to the hazards of the sea, and sometimes to those which arose from the fleet of the enemy. In this dangerous situation, Edward willingly hearkened to the mediation of the Pope's legates, the Cardinals of Palestrine and Freseart, who endeavoured to negotiate, if not a peace, at least a truce, between the two kingdoms. A treaty was concluded for a cessation of arms during three years;\(^4\) and Edward had the abilities, notwithstanding his present dangerous situation, to procure to himself such a formal and honourable term. It was agreed that Vannes should be sequestered, during the truce, in the hands of the legates, to be disposed of afterwards as they pleased; and though Edward knew the partiality of the court of Avignon towards his adversaries, he saved himself, by this device, from the dishonour of having undertaken a fruitless enterprise. It was also stipulated, that all prisoners should be released, that the places in Brittany should be restored to their ancient proprietors, the garrisons to their tenants, and the Bishop of Leon was already engaged, for that purpose, in a conference with Charles of Blois; when the countess, who had mounted to a high tower, and was looking towards the sea with great impatience, descried some sails at a distance. She immediately exclaimed: Behold the succours! the English succours! no capitulation.\(^5\) This fleet had on board heavy armed vessels of war, and a body of troops, which, augmented by the forces that had been prepared for the relief of Hennesbonne, but who had been long detained by contrary winds. They entered the harbour under the command of Sir Walter Manny, one of the bravest officers of the king's guard, and were resolved to enforce the siege by a great body of men, prepared for the relief of Hennesbonne, but who had been long detained by contrary winds. They entered the harbour under the command of Sir Walter Manny, one of the bravest officers of the king's guard, and were resolved to enforce the siege by a great body of men, prepared for the relief of Hennesbonne, but who had been long detained by contrary winds.
The truce, though calculated for a long time, was of very short duration; and each monarch endeavoured to throw on the other the blame of its infraction. Of course, the historians of the two countries differ in their account of the cause of this. It seems probable, however, as is affirmed by the French writers, that Edward, in consenting to the truce, had no other view than to extricate himself from a perilous situation into which he had fallen, and was afterwards very careless in observing it. In the first instance, he clung to it; but when the subject was taken up, he complained chiefly of the punishment inflicted on Olivier de Clisson, John de Monta蜚ban, and other Breton noblemen, who, he said, were partisans of the family of Montfort, and consequently his enemies. He declared that, at the conclusion of the truce, those noblemen had openly, by their declarations and actions, embraced the cause of Charles of Blois; and if they had entered into any secret correspondence and engagements with Edward, they were traitors to their party, and were justly punishable by Philip and Charles for their breach of faith; nor had Edward any ground of complaint against France for the violation of the truce. But when he laid these pretended injuries before the parliament, whom he affected to consult on all occasions, that assembly entered into the quarrel, advised the king not to be a party to a truce which was dissipated by the French for the renewal of the war: the counties were charged with a hundred thousand men, the boroughs with a tenth. The clergy consented to give a tenth for three years.

These supplies enabled the king to complete his military preparations; and he sent his cousin Henry, Earl of Derby, son of the Earl of Lancaster, into Guienne, for the defence of that province. This prince, the most accomplished of the English court, rose to such a height, the virtues of justice and humanity, as well as those of valour and conduct, and not content with protecting and enriching the province committed to his care, he made a successful invasion into the territories of his enemies. He took Monsegur, Monpezat, Villefranche, Miremont, and Tomnus, with the fortress of Damassan. Agugillon, a fortress deemed impregnable, fell into his hands from the cowardice of the governor. Guienne was surrendered after a short siege. The only place where he met with considerable resistance was Rocle, which, however, was at last reduced, after a siege of nine weeks. He made an attempt on Blaye, but thought it more prudent to raise the siege, than waste his time before a place of small importance. The reason why Derby was permitted to make such an impression, was the opposition, so far as the side of Guienne, was the difficulties under which the French finances then laboured, and which had obliged Philip to lay on new impositions, particularly the duty of stamps, by the French discantors, and granted numerous of them subjects. But after the court of France was supplied with money, great preparations were made; and the Duke of Normandy, attended by the Duke of Burgundy, and other great barons, by the town of Guienne a powerful army, which the English could not withstand in the open field. The Earl of Derby stood on the defensive, and allowed the French to carry on, at leisure, the siege of Angoulême, which was their first enterprise. John, Lord Norwich, the governor, after a brave and vigorous defence, found himself reduced to such extremities, as obliged him to employ a straggar in order to save his garrison, and to prevent his being reduced to surrender at discretion. He appeared on the walls, and desired a parley with the Duke of Normandy. The prince there told Norwich, that he supposed he intended to capitulate, and that he was glad, as to-morrow is the feast of the Virgin, to whom I know that you, Sir, as well as myself, bear a great devotion, I desire a cessation of arms for that day. The proposal was agreed to; and Norwich, having ordered his forces to prepare all the necessary works of fortress, and having advanced towards the French camp. The besiegers imagining they were to be attacked, ran to their arms; but Norwich sent a messenger to the duke, reminding him of his engagement. The duke, who urged himself on by faithfully keeping his word, exclaimed, I see the governor has outwaited me: but let us be content with gaining the place: and the English were allowed to pass through the camp un molested. After some other successes, the Duke of Normandy laid siege to Aiguillon; and as the natural strength of the fortress, together with a brave garrison under the command of the Earl of Pembroke, and Sir Walter de Walworth, rendered it impregnable, the place by assault, he proposed, after making several fruitless attacks, to reduce it by famine; but, before he could finish this enterprise, he was called to another quarter of the kingdom, by the news of the greatest disasters that ever befell the French monarchy.

Edward, informed by the Earl of Derby of the great danger to which Guienne was exposed, had prepared a force with which he intended, in person, to bring it relief. He embarked at Southampton, on board a fleet of eight thousand sail of all dimensions, and carried with him, besides all the chief nobility of England, his eldest son, the Prince of Wales, now fifteen years of age. The winds proved long contrary, and the long length of time, spent in the town of Guisnes, for the English troops were not in the province, was at last persuaded by Geoffrey d'Harcourt, to change the destination of his enterprise. This nobleman was a Norman by birth, had long made a considerable figure in the court of France, and was generally esteemed for his personal merit and his valour; but being disobedient and persuaded by Philip, he had fled into England; had recommended himself to Edward, who was an excellent judge of men; and had succeeded to Robert of Arton in the invidious office of excising and assisting the king in every enterprise against his native country. He had long insisted that an expedition by Normandy promised, in the present circumstances, more favourable than any other. Edward would find the northern provinces almost destitute of military force, which had been drawn to the south; that they were full of flourishing cities, whose pluder would enrich the English; that their cultivated fields, as yet unspoiled by war, would supply them with plenty of provisions; and that the neighbourhood of the capital rendered every event of importance in those quarters. These reasons, which had not before been duly weighed by Edward, began to make more impression, after the disappointments which he met with in his voyage to Guienne: he ordered his fleet to sail to Normandy, and safely disembarked his army at La Hogue. This army, which, during the course of the Invasion of the ensuing campaign, was crowned with the most splendid success, consisted of four thousand men at arms, ten thousand mounted men, seven thousand infantry, and six thousand Irish. The Welch and the Irish were light, disorderly troops, fitter for doing execution in a pursuit, or scouring the country, than for any stable action. The bow was always esteemed a formidable weapon, where the military discipline of the enemy was not well armed and armoured. The only solid force in this army were the men at arms; and even these, being cavalry, were, on that account, much inferior, in the shock of battle; and as the whole were new levied troops, we are led to entertain a very mean idea of the military force of those ages, which, being ignorant of every other art, had not properly cultivated the art of war itself, till the general invention. The king created the Earl of Arundel, constable of his army, and the Earls of Warwick and Harcourt, marquises; he bestowed the honour of knighthood on the Prince of Wales, and made the command of the young squires, immediately on his landing. After destroying all the ships in La Hogue, Harfleur, and Cherbourg, he spread his army over the whole country, and gave them an unbounded licence of razing, spoiling, and burning every place of which they became masters. The loose discipline then prevalent could not be much hurt by these disorderly practices; and Edward took care to prevent any surprise, by giving orders to his troops, however they might dispose themselves in the day-time, always to quarter themselves at night near the main body. In this manner, Montebourg, Carentan, St. Lo, Valognes, and other places in the Cotentin, were pillaged without resistance; and a universal consternation was spread abroad.

The intelligence of this unexpected invasion soon reached Paris; and threw Philip into great perplexity. He issued orders, however, for levying forces in all quarters; and to the counties of Eu and Flanders, he sent the Count of Eu, and the Count of Tancarville, with a body of troops, to the defence of Caen, a populous and commercial but open city, which lay in the neighbourhood of the English army. The temptation of so rich a prize, soon allured Edward to approach it; and the inhabitants, encouraged by their numbers, and the reinforcements which they daily received from the country, ventured to meet him in the field. But the king, with his prudent coolness, thought proper to prevent this precipitation: the Counts of Eu and Tancarville were taken prisoners; the victors entered the city along with the vanquished, and a furious massacre commenced, without any discretion, with great expedition, in despair, barricaded their houses, and assaulted the English with stones, bricks, and every missile weapon: the English made way by fire to the destruction of the citizens; till Edward, anxious to save both his spoil and his soldiers, stopped the massacre; and having obliged the inhabitants to lay down their arms, gave his troops licence to begin a more regular and less hazardous plunder of the city. The pillage continued for three days: the king reserved for himself share the jewels, plate, silks, fine cloth, and fine linen; and he bestowed all the remainder of the spoil on his army. The whole was embarked on board the ships, and sent over to England, which together with the treasure of the richest citizens of Caen, whose ransom was an additional profit, which he expected afterwards to levy. This dismal scene passed in the presence of two cardinal legates, who had come to negociate a peace between the king and the English army. The king moved next to Rouen, in hopes of treating that city in the same manner; but found that the bridge over the Seine was already broken down, and that the King of France himself was arrived there with his army. He marched along the banks of that river towards Paris, destroying the whole country, and every town and village which he met with on his road.4 Some of his light troops carried their rapiers even to the gates of Paris; and the royal palace of St. Germans, together with Nanterre, Ruelle, and other villages, was reduced to ashes within sight of the capital. The English intended to pass the river at Poissy, but found the French army encamped on the opposite banks, and the bridge at that place as well as all others over the Seine, broken down by orders from Philip. Edward now saw that the French meant to enclose him in his country, in hopes of attacking him on all sides; but he saved himself by a stratagem from this perilous situation. He gave his army orders to dislodge, and to advance further up the Seine; but on the 13th of March, conning by the same channel, he arrived at Poissy, which the enemy had already quitted in order to attend his motions. He repaired the bridge with increas-

On this side France demanded the king and the resolution which he expected from them. He demanded nothing, he said, but that they would imitate his own example, and that of the Prince of Wales; and as the honour, the lives, the liberties of all were exposed to the same danger, he was confident that they would make one common effort to extirpate themselves from the present difficulties, and that their united courage would secure them the victory over all their enemies.

It is related by some historians, that Edward, besides the resources which he found in his own genius and presence of mind, employed also a new invention against the enemy, and placed in his front some pieces of artillery, the first that had yet been made use of on any remarkable occasion in Europe. This is the epoch of one of the most singular discoveries that has been made around a war; and it is in dispute whether the whole art of war, and by consequence many circumstances in the political government of Europe. But the ignorance of that age in the mechanical arts rendered the prevention useless. This piece, it is true, which was first framed, for the use of men that were immediately sensible of their danger, & the very objects to which the invention was directed, & the overthrow of empires, has in the issue rendered battles less bloody, and has given greater stability to civil societies. Nations by their means have been enabled to continue their existence, and to resist enemies, otherwise inevitable, with less frequent and rapid: success in war has been reduced nearly to a matter of calculation: and any nation overmatched by its enemies, either yields to their demands, or secures itself by alliances against their violence and invasion.

The invention of artillery was at this time known in France, as well as in England; but Philip in his hurry to overtake the enemy, had probably left his cannon behind him, which he regarded as a useless encumbrance. All his other movements discovered the same imprudence and precipitation. Impelled by anger, a desire of revenge, his desire of Alençon was such that he determined, by a declaration of his numbers, he thought that all depended on forcing an engagement with the English; and that, if he could once reach the enemy in their retreat, the victory on his side was sure. But his army, lor which he was advancing, in some confusion, from Abbeville; but after he had advanced above two leagues, some gentlemen, whom he had sent before to take a view of the enemy, returned to him, and brought him intelligence, that they had seen the English drawn up in great order, and awaiting his arrival. They therefore advised him to defer the combat till the ensuing day, when his army would have recovered from their fatigue, and might be disposed into better order than their present hurry had permitted them to observe. Philip assented to this counsel; but the former precipitation of his march, and the impatience of the French nobility, made it impracticable for him to put it in execution. The division pressed upon another; orders to stop were not seasonably conveyed to all of them; this immense body was not governed by sufficient discipline to be manageable: and the French army, perfectly overpowered by the English, was exhausted, fatigued, and disordered, in presence of the enemy. The first line, consisting of 15,000 Genoese cross-bow men, was commanded by Anthony Doria, and Charles Gualdini; the second, by John Henn, Bishop of Alençon: the king himself was at the head of the third. Besides the French monarch, there were no less than three crowned heads in this engagement: the King of Bohemia, the King of the Romans, his son; and the King of Majorca; with all the nobility and great vessels of the crown of France. The army now consisted of above 120,000 men, more than three times the number of the enemy. But the prudence of one man was superior to the advantage of all this force and splendour.

The English, on the approach of the enemy, kept their ranks firm and immovable; and the Genoese first began the attack. There was a prodigious back and forth engagement, a thunder shower, which had monstrosed and relaxed the strings of the Genoese cross-bows; their arrows, for this reason, fell short of the enemy. The English archers, taking their bows out of their cases, poured in a shower of arrows upon this multitude who were opposed to them, and soon threw them into disorder. The Genoese fell back upon the heavy-armed cavalry of the Count of Alençon, who, enraged at their cowardice, ordered his troops to put to the sword. The artillery fired amidst the crowd; the English archers continued to send in their arrows among them; and nothing, by storm and confusion, terror and dismay. The young Prince of Wales had the presence of mind to take advantage of this situation, and to lead on his line to the charge. The English cavalry, however, recovering some of their place, and encouraged by the example of their leader, made a stout resistance; and having at last cleared themselves of the Genoese runaways, advanced upon their enemies, and after a short combat, defeated them. The Earl of Arundel and Northampton now advanced their line to sustain the prince, who, ardent in his first feats of arms, set an example of valour which was imitated by all his followers. The battle became, for some time, hot and dangerous; and the Earl of Warwick, apprehensive of the event from the superior numbers of the French, despatched a messenger to the king, and entreated him to send succours to the relief of the prince. Edward had chosen his situation, and the situation of the Earl of Warwick,uyed in tranquillity the scene of action. When the messenger accosted him, his first question was, whether the prince were slain or wounded! On receiving an answer in the negative, Return, said he, to any ancient and tell him that I reserve the honour of the day to him: I am confident that he will show himself worthy of the honour of highness which I so lately conferred upon him: he will be able, without my assistance, to repel the enemy. This speech being reported to the prince and his attendants inspired them with fresh courage: they made an attack with redoubled vigour on the French, in which the Count of Alençon was killed. The whole line of the French was thrown into disorder: the riders were killed or dismounted: the Welsh infantry rushed into the throng, and with their long knives cut the throats of all who had fallen; nor was any quarter given to the vanquished. The King of France advanced in vain with the rear to sustain the line commanded by his brother; he found them already discomfited; and the example of their rout increased the confusion which was before but too prevalent in his own body. He had himself a horse killed under him; he was remounted; and though left almost alone, he seemed still determined to maintain the combat: when John of Hamault seized the reins of his bridle, turned about his horse, and carried him off the field of battle. The whole French army took to flight, and was followed and put to the sword, without mercy, by the enemy; till the darkness of the night put an end to the pursuit. The king, on his return to the camp, fell into the arms of the Prince of Wales, and exclaimed, My brave son! Persevere in your honourable course: You are my son; for valiantly have you acquitted yourself today: You have shown yourself worthy of the noblest of our race.

This battle, which is known by the name of the battle of Crecy, began after three o'clock in the afternoon, and continued till evening. The next morning was foggy; and the English, observing that they had lost their way in the night and in the mist, they employed a stragglar to bring them into their power; they erected on the eminences some French standards which they had taken in the battle; and all who were allure by this false signal were put to the sword, and no quarter given them. In excuse for this inhumanity, it was alleged that the French king had given like orders to his troops; but the real reason probably was, that the English, in their present situation, did not choose to be encumbered with prisoners. On the day of battle and on the ensuing, there fell, by a moderate computation, 12,000 French knights, 1,400 gentlemen, besides above 30,000 of inferior rank: many of the principal nobility of France, the Dukes of Lorraine and Bourbon, the Earl of Flanders, Blos, Vaucouleurs, Amale, were left on the field of battle. The Bohemian, their.smallest, the estate of the former was remarkable: he was blind from age; but being resolved to hazard his person, and set an example to others, he ordered the reins of his bridle to be tied on each side to the horses of two gentle-mans of his train; and his dead body, and those of his attendants, were afterwards found among the slain, with their horses standing by them in that situation. His crest was three ostrich feathers; and his motto these German words, Ich dien, i servc: which the Prince of Wales and his successors adopted in memorial of this great victory. The action may seem no less remarkable for the small loss sustained by the English, than for the great slaughter of the French: there were killed in it only one esquire and three knights, and very few of inferior rank: a demonstration, that the prudent disposition planned by Edward, and the sagacious conduct of the French, made the battle the whole rather a rout than a battle; which was indeed the common case with engagements in those times. The great prudence of Edward appeared not only in placing his main body towards the right, on the mountain, which he placed after it. Not elated by his present prosperity, so far as to expect the total conquest of France, or even that of any considerable provinces; he purposed only to secure such an easy entrance into that kingdom, as might be the means not only to maintain the war, but to recover the vast domains which he lost by the death of D'Artville, who had been murdered by the populace themselves, his former partisans, on his attempting to transfer the sovereignty of that province to the Prince of Wales. The King, therefore, limited his ambition to the conquest of Calais; and after the interval of a few days, which he employed in entering the stain, he marched with his victorious army, and presented himself before the place.

John of Vienne, a valiant knight of Burgundy, was governor of Calais, and being supplied with every thing necessary for defence, he encouraged the townsmen to persist in their duty to the English, and courage of Edward, therefore, sensible from the beginning that it was in vain to attempt the place by force, purposed only to reduce it by famine: he chose a secure station for his camp; drew intrenchments around the whole city; raised huts for his soldiers, which he covered with straw or bough; and provided his army with all the conveniences necessary to make them endure the winter season which was approaching. As the governor soon perceived his instinct, he expelled all the useless mouths; and the king had the generosity to allow these unhappy people to pass through his camp, and be even supplied with money for their journey.

While Edward was engaged in this siege, which employed him near a twelvemonth, there passed in different places many other events; and all to the honour of the English arms.

The Duke of Normandy from Guienne left the Earl of Derby master of the field; and he was neglectful in making his advantage of the superiority. He took Mirebeau by assault: he made himself master of Lusignan in the same manner: Taillebourg and St. Jean d'Angeli fell into his hands: Pointz opened its gates to him; and Derby, having thus broken into the frontiers on that quarter, carried his incursions to the banks of the Loire, and filled all the southern provinces of France with terror and devastation.

The flames of war were at the same time kindled in Brittany. Charles of Blois invaded that province with a considerable army, and invested the fortress of Roche de Rien; and in twenty days, five thousand English troops under Sir Thomas Dagworth, attacked him during the night in his intrenchments, dispersed his army, and took Charles himself prisoner. His wife, by whom he enjoyed his pretensions to Brittany, compelled by the present danger, offered to take her place in the council, and proved herself a rival in every shape, and an antagonist to the Countess of Montfort, both in the field and in the cabinet. And while these heroic dames presented themselves to the world, and armies in England, of still higher rank, showed herself no less capable of exerting every manly virtue.

The Scottish nation, after long defending, war with incredible perseverance, their liberties against the superior force of the English, recalled their king, David Bruce, in 1342. Though that prince, neither by his age nor capacity, could bring them great assistance, yet he gave them the countenance of nobility; and as Edward's wars on the continent proved a great diversion to the force of England, they rendered the balance more equal between the kingdoms. In every part of France was opinion that Scotland was comprehended; and when Edward made his last invasion upon France, David was strongly solicited by his ally to begin also hostilities, and to invade the northern provinces of his kingdom. The superiority of his nation being always forward to such incursions, David soon mustered a great army, entered Northumberland at the head of above 50,000 men, and carried his mages and devastations to the gates of Durham. But Queen Philippa, assembling a numerous force, and engaging with the Scots to the number of 15,000 men, she carried the battle. The field was fought on the 20th of Oct. till the armies were on the point of engaging. The Scots have often been unfortunate in the great pitched battles which they fought with the English, even though they commonly declined such engagements where the superiority of numbers was not on their side: but never did they receive a more fatal blow than the present. Though the field was broken and chaos, and thousand of them, some historians say twenty thousand, were slain; among whom were Edward Keith, Earl Mareschal, and Sir Thomas Charteris, Chamberlain: and Carrie, Lord Douglas, and many other noblemen.

Philippa, having secured her royal prison in the tower, crowned the sea at Dover; and was received in the English camp before Calais, with all the triumph due to her rank, her merit, and her success. This age was the reign of chivalry and gallantry: Edward's court excelled in these accomplishments as much as in policy and arms; and if anything could justify the obsequious devotion then professed to the fair sex, it must be the appearance of such extraordinary women as shone forth during that period.

The town of Calais had been defended 1177, with remarkable vigilance, constancy, and Calais taken. bravely by the townsmen, during a siege of unusual length; but Philip, informed of their distressed condition, determined to attempt their relief, and he approached the English with an immense army, which the writers of that age make amount to 200,000 men. But he found Edward so surrounded with morasses, and secured by intrenchments, that, without running on inevitable destrucction, he concluded it impossible to make an attempt.

in the English camp. He had no other resource than to send his rival a vain challenge to meet him in the open field; which being refused, he was obliged to despatch with him before his men returned from the chase.

John of Vienne, governor of Calais, now saw the necessity of surrendering his fortress, which was reduced to the last extremity by famine and the fatigue of the inhabitants. He therefore resolved to send the English a signal to the English envoys that he desired a parley. Sir Walter Manny was sent to him by Edward. "Brave Knight," cried the governor, "I have been intrusted by my sovereign with a message from his Majesty, and I must therefore surrender, and desire, as the sole condition, to insure the lives and liberties of these brave men, who have long shared with me every danger and fatigue."

Manny replied, that he was well acquainted with the intentions of the King of England; that that prince was incensed against the townspeople of Calais, for their pertinacious resistance, and for the evils which they had made him and his subjects suffer; that he was determined to take no other method but to receive the town on any condition which should confine them in the punishment of these offenders. "Consider," replied Vienne, "that this is not the treatment to which brave people should be subjected. In your situation, your king would have expected the same conduct from him. The inhabitants of Calais have done for their sovereign what merits the esteem of every prince; making more of the honour of their country than of their own lives, they have given their property to the state; and I expect that you yourself, brave knight, will interpose your good offices with your prince in our behalf."

Manny was struck with the justness of these sentiments, and a sentiment of religion inspired him; he declared, on the authority of the intentions of the King of England, that he should give such treatment to the inhabitants of Calais. Edward was at last persuaded to mitigate the rigour of the conditions demanded; he only insisted that six of the most considerable citizens should be sent to him, to be detained as he thought proper; that they should come to his camp carrying the keys of the city in their hands, bare-headed and bare-footed, with ropes about their necks; and, on these conditions, he promised to spare the lives of all the rest.

When this intelligence was conveyed to Calais, it struck the inhabitants with new consternation. To sacrifice six of their fellow-citizens to certain destruction for signalizing their resistance, and to be removed from the scene of their sufferings, was more severe than that general punishment with which they were before threatened; and they found themselves incapable of coming to any resolution in so cruel and distressing a situation. At last one of the principal inhabitants, called Eustace de St. Pierre, whose name deserves to be recorded, stepped forth, and declared himself willing to encounter death for the safety of his friends and companions; another animated by his example, made a like generous offer: a third, and a fourth, presented themselves to the same fate; and the whole number was soon completed. These six heroic burgesses appeared before Edward in the guise of malefactors, with their feet in irons, and were ordered to be led to execution. It is surprising that so generous a prince should ever have entertained such a barbarous purpose against such men; and still more that he should seriously persist in the resolution of carrying them to a sacrifice, by cutting off their ears, and then throwing them into the flames. They were put to death by the executioner of this infamous king, who, after burning them alive, cast their bodies into deep waters:

and though his biographer was obliged to Queen Philippa herself. In it is a mistake to imagine that the patent of indulgences, which he used to purchase the allegiance of the people, is in the same manner of the case as the letters patent of indulgences, which were granted to St. John of Beverley, and which are now preserved in the Library of St. John's College, Cambridge. The greater part of them are written in Latin, some being in a different handwriting, and others in a more elegant. The following is one of them: "To all and every person who shall receive this letter of indulgence, I grant, on the condition of it, and on the contrary, exist in general the king's proroguing and declaring the peace of the land. The more unwillingly he wrote, in order to avoid the difficulties that would arise from being tied to the spirit of his predecessor. He was therefore naturally disposed to be severe, as the only way of saving his reputation against the accusations against him of the citizens. Having obtained her request, she carried them into her tent, ordered a整齐 to be set before them, and, after making them a present of money and clothes, dismissed them in safety. The king took possession of Calais, and immediately executed an act of rigour, more justifiable, because more necessary, than that which he had before refused. He was aware that his pretended title to the crown of France, every Frenchman regarded him as a mortal enemy: he therefore ordered all the inhabitants of Calais to evacuate the town, and he endeavoured to persuade all the English, being men of his nation, to remain in that city as long as he retained it. He made it the staple of wool, leather, tin, and lead; the four chief, if not the sole, commodities of the kingdom to the destruction of the most refined industry and manufactures. All the English were obliged to bring thither these goods: foreign merchants came to the same place in order to purchase them; and at a period when posts were not established, and when the communication between states was so imperfect, this institution, though it hurt the navigation of England, was probably of advantage to the kingdom. Through the mediation of the Pope's legate, Edward promised to make a truce with France; but, even during this cessation of arms, he had very nearly lost Calais, the sole fruit of all his boasted victories. The king had intrusted that place to Aimery de Pauze, an Italian, who was to have kept it, owing to his superior command, as the lifting of the siege, the man was utterly destitute of every principle of honour and fidelity. This man agreed to deliver up Calais for the sum of twenty thousand crowns; and Leoffrey de Charney engaged to supply the officers of the garrison in those quarters, and who knew, that if he succeeded in this service, he should not be disowned, ventured, without consulting his master, to conclude the bargain with him. Edward, alarmed by the news of this treachery by which Aimery's secretary, summoned the governor to London on other pretences; and having charged him with the guilt, promised him his life, but on condition that he would turn the garrison in the castle to the destruction of the town. The Italian easily agreed to this double treachery. A day was appointed for the admission of the French; and Edward, having prepared a force of about a thousand men, under Sir Walter Manny, got itself transported from London, carrying with him the Prince of Wales; and, without being suspected, arrived the evening before at Calais. He made a proper disposition for the reception of the enemy, and kept all his forces and the garrison under arms. On the appearance of the enemy, he gave a charge to his soldiers was admitted at the postern; and Aimery, receiving the stipulated sum, promised that with their assistance, he would immediately open the great gate to the troops, who were waiting to enter the town. In a short time the gates were opened, and the French entered the town. The garrison of the castle, which was a strong place, and had been fortified by the French, was immediately taken, and the town was immediately surrendered to the English. The French, though astonished at the event, behaved with valour: a fierce and bloody engagement ensued. As the morning broke, the king, who was not distinguished by his arms, and who fought as a private man under the standard of Sir Walter Manny, re-marked a French gentleman, called Eustace de Ribemont, who exerted himself with singular vigour and bravery; and he was seized with a desire of trying a single combat with him. He stept forth from his troop, and challenging Ribemont by name, (for he was known to him,) began a sharp and dangerous encounter. He was twice beaten to the ground by the valour of the Frenchman; twice recovered his horse; and both fought with equal force on both sides; the victory was long undecided; till Ribemont, perceiving himself to be left almost alone, called out to his antagonist, Sir knight, I yield myself self your pranser; and at the same time delivered his sword to the king. Most of the French being overpowered by numbers, and intimidated in their retreat, lost either their lives or their liberty.

The French officers who had fallen into the hands of the English were conducted into Calais; where Edward discovered the great stratagem with which they had had the honour to be engaged, and treated them with great regard and courtesy. They were admitted to supp with the Prince of Wales and the English nobility; and after supper, they were conducted through the city, and were allowed to treat familiarly with one or other of his prisoners. He even addressed himself to Charny, and avoided reproaching him, in too severe terms, with the treacherous attempt which he had made upon Calais during the truce; but he openly bestowed the highest encomiums on Ribaumont; called him the most valorous knight that he had ever been acquainted with; and confessed that he himself had at no time been so great a danger as when engaged in combat with him. He then took a string of pearls, which he wore about his own head, and throwing it over the head of Ribaumont, he said to him, "Sir Eustace, I bestow this present upon you as a testimony of my esteem for your bravery; and I desire you to wear it a year for my sake: I know you to be gay and amorous, and to take delight in the company of ladies and damsels; let them all know from what hand you had the present; you are not my prisoner: or a prisoner; and you are at liberty to-morrow to dispose of yourself as you think proper."

Nothing proves more evidently the vast superiority assumed by the English army above all the other orders of men during those ages, than the extreme difference which Edward made in his treatment of these French knights, and that of the six citizens of Calais, who had exerted more signal bravery in a cause more justifiable and more honourable.

CHAP. XVI.

EDWARD III.

The prudent conduct and great success of Edward, in this engagement, had excited a strong emulation and a military genius among the English nobility; and these turbulent barons, overawed by the crown, gave now a more useful direction to their ambition, and attached themselves to a prince who led them to the acquisition of riches and of glory. That the institution of the order of the Garter, in imitation of some orders of a like nature, religious as well as military, which had been established in different parts of Europe. The number received into this order consisted of twenty-five persons, besides the sovereign; and as it had never been enlarged, this body of distinction continues now as honourable as it was at its first institution, and is still a valuable, though a cheap present, which the prince can confer on his greatest subjects. A vulgar style prevails, but is not supported by any, and conducted as a court-ball; Edward, his mistress, commonly supposed to be the Countess of Salisbury, dropped her garter; and the king taking it up, observed some of the courtiers to smile, as if they thought that he had not obtained this favour merely by accident: upon which he called out, Honi soit qui mal y pense, Evil to him that thinks evil. But it was not only among those ancient warriors was magnified into a matter of great importance; he instituted the order of the Garter in memorial of this event, and gave these words as the motto of the order. The name was, indeed, unsuitable to the matters of the times; and it is, indeed, difficult by any other means to account, either for the seemingly unmeaning terms of the motto, or for the peculiar badge of the order, as having reference to any purpose, either of military use or ornament. But a sudden draft was thrown over this festivity and triumph of the court of England, by a destructive pestilence which ravaged that kingdom, as well as the | 1349. | 1349. | A. D. 1349.

The Constable of Eu, who had been taken prisoner by Edward at Caen, recovered his liberty, on the promise of delivering as his ransom the town of Guines, near Calais, of which he was superior lord; but as John was offended at this stipulation, which, if fulfilled, opened still further that frontage of the country; and he suspected the English must have formed for the use of the poor. The same author says, that there died above 80,000 persons of the plague in Normandy, which was in deplorable. de la Cerda was appointed constable in his place; and had a like fatal end: the King of Navarre ordered him to be assassinated; but such was the weakness of the crown, that this prince, instead of dreading punishment, would not even agree to ask pardon for his offence, but on condition that he should receive an accession of territory: and he had also John's second son put into his hands as a security for his person, when he came to court, and performed the act of mock penitence and humiliation before his sovereign.

The two French princes seemed entirely reconciled; but this reconciliation, to which John submitted from necessity, and Charles from policy, did not long continue; and the King of Navarre knew that he had reason to apprehend the most severe vengeance for the many crimes and treasons which he had already committed, and which he would have avenged himself with Geoffrey d'Harcourt, who had received his pardon from Philip de Valois, but persevered still in his factious disposition, he increased the number of his partisans in the party, to a frequent resort, where they were under the mediation of the Pope. John detected this correspondence; and to prevent the dangerous effects of it, he sent forces into Normandy, the chief seat of the King of Navarre's approach of invading England, and castles of the kingdom. But hearing that Edward had prepared an army to support his ally, he had the weakness to propose an accommodation with Charles, and even to give this truce, by which he removed himself from Berwick to the Moselle, as the purest of a feigned reconciliation, which rendered him still more dangerous. The King of Navarre, insolent from past impunity, and desperate from the dangers which he had already incurred, made himself master of the province of Dauphiné, and expressed his approbation of this event. He seduced, by his address, Charles, the King of France's eldest son, a youth of seventeen years of age, who was the first that bore the appellation of Dauphin, by the re-union of the province of Dauphiné to the crown. But this prince, being made master of the province which he had collected momentous, promised to make atonement for the offence by the sacrifice of his associates; and, in concert with his father, he invited the King of Navarre, and other noblemen of the party, to a frequent resort, where they were betrayed into the hands of John. Some of the most obnoxious were immediately led to execution; the King of Navarre was thrown into prison; but this stroke of severity in his own country did not operate as a falling douche in maintaining the royal authority. Philip of Navarre, brother to Charles, and Geoffrey d'Harcourt, put all the towns and castles belonging to that prince in a possession, and even proceeded to ravage the fortress of Ghent, arising from the imprisonment of the King of Navarre; and he sent Lancaster, at the head of a small army, to support the partisans of the Navarrese; and was also resolved, on this expedition; but finding that his constant adherence to the English had given his countrymen an unconquerable aversion to his title, and that he himself was declining at the height of his power, he finally submitted, into the king's hands his pretensions to the crown of Scotland, received in lieu of them an annual pension of 2000 pounds, with which he passed the remainder of his life in pious and retiring manners.

During these military operations, Edward received information of the increasing disorders in France, arising from the imprisonment of the King of Navarre; and he sent Lancaster, at the head of a small army, to support the partisans of the Navarrese; and was also resolved, on this expedition; but finding that his constant adherence to the English had given his countrymen an unconquerable aversion to his title, and that he himself was declining at the height of his power, he finally submitted, into the king's hands his pretensions to the crown of Scotland, received in lieu of them an annual pension of 2000 pounds, with which he passed the remainder of his life in pious and retiring manners.

The King of Navarre's incursion from Calais was of the same nature, and attended with the same issue. He broke into France, and even pitched his head of a superior army, on no account to run the hazard of a battle. The King of England's incursion from Calais was of the same nature, and attended with the same issue. He broke into France, and even pitched his head of a superior army, on no account to run the hazard of a battle.

proved insufficient to save him in this extremity, had the King of France known how to make use of his present advantages. His great superiority in numbers enabled him to threaten the enemy; and interesting all provisions, which were already become scarce in the English camp, to reduce this small army, without a blow, to the necessity of surrendering at discretion. But such was never the custom of the English nobility, and the Prince, much had their thoughts been bent on overraking the English as their sole object, that this idea never struck any of the commanders; and they immediately took measures against him, as a certain factory. While the French army was drawn up in order of battle, they were stopped by the appearance of the Cardinal of Perigord; who, having learned the approach of the two armies to each other, had intimated, by in throwing his delay. To prevent any further effusion of Christian blood. By John’s permission, he carried proposals to the Prince of Wales; and found him so sensible of the bad posture of his affairs, that an accommodation seemed not impracticable. Edward told him that he would agree to any terms consistent with his own honour and that of England; and he offered to purchase a retreat, by ceding all the conquests which he had made during this and the former campaign, and to the English crown. The Prince, not to spare the France during a course of seven years. But John, imagining that he had now got into his hands a sufficient pledge for the restitution of Calais, required that Edward should surrender himself, and presented him with a hundred of his attendants; and offered, on these terms, a safe retreat to the English army. The Prince rejected the proposal with disdain; and declared that whatever fortune might attend him, England should never be allowed to escape for want of his loss.
This resolute answer cut off all hopes of an accommodation; but as the day was already spent in negociating, the battle was delayed till the next morning.

The Prince of Wales had leisure during the night to strengthen, by new interrenchments, the post which he had before so judiciously chosen; and he contrived an ambush of 300 men at arms, and as many archers, whom he put under the command of the Captain de Bucchini, and ordered to make a circuit, that they might fall on the flank or rear of the French army during the engagement.
The whole of his army was commanded by the Earl of Warwick, the rear by theEarls of Salisbury and Suffolk, the main body by the prince himself. The Lords Chandos, Audley, and many other brave and experienced commanders, were at the head of different corps of his army.

John attempted his forces in three divisions, nearly equal: the first was commanded by the Duke of Orleans, the king’s brother; the second by the dauphin, attended by his two younger brothers; the third by the king himself, who had by his side Philip, his fourth son and favourite, then about fourteen years of age. There was no reaching the English army but through a narrow lane, covered on each side by hedges; and in order to open this passage, the musculards Andrenon and Clement were ordered to advance with a separate detachment of men at arms. While they marched along the lane, a body of English archers who lined the hedges, plied them on each side of their way, and by striking very near them, yet placed in perfect safety, they coolly took their aim against the enemy, and slaughtered them with impunity. The French detachment, much discouraged by the unequal combat, and diminished in their number, arrived at the end of the lane, where they met on the open ground the Prince of Wales himself, at the head of a chosen body, ready for their reception. They were disconcerted and overcome by the mode of the massacre; the dauphin was taken prisoner; and the remainder of the detachment, who were still in the lane, and exposed to the shot of the enemy, without being able to make resistance, recoiled
upon their own army, and put every thing into disorder. 1

In that critical moment, the Capitul de Bucchini unexpectedly appeared and attacked in flank the dauphin’s line, which fell into some confusion. Landas, Bodenam, and St. Vincent, who had been ordered by the Prince to remain with his brothers, had been commissed, too anxious for their charge or for their own safety, carried them off the field, and set the example of flight, which was followed by the other young nobles, and exchanged, without winning with a like panic, and imagining all was lost, thought no longer of fighting, but carried off his division by a retreat, which soon turned into a flight. Lord Chandos called out to him to renew the attack, and offered him the good which he had from his valor what his imprudence had betrayed; and the only resistance made that day was by his line of battle. The Prince of Wales felt with impunity on some German cavalry placed in the front, and commanded by the Counts of Salibruchene, Nydo, and Nost: a fierce battle ensued: one side were encouraged by the near prospect of so great a victory: the other were stimulated by the shame of quitting the field to an enemy so much superior in numbers. The Duke of Athens, Constable of France, falling in battle, that body of cavalry gave way, and left the king himself exposed to the whole fury of the enemy. The ranks were every moment stopt, and the Prince saw the danger of his side one after another; his son, scarce fourteen years of age, received a wound, while he was fighting valiantly in defence of his father: the king himself, spent with fatigue, and of the French army. He despatched the Earl of Warwick to bring him intelligence; and that nobleman came happily in time to save the life of the captive prince, which was exposed to greater danger than it had been during the heat of the action. The English were all inmotion, and the French had made their escape. The French, however, offered him by violence the homage of the whole army; the English Gascors claimed the honour of detaining the royal pris-ton: and some brutal soldiers, rather than yield the prize to their rivals, had threatened to put him to death. 2 Warwick overawed both parties, and approaching the Prince with great demonstrations of respect, offered to conduct him to the prince’s tent.

Here commences the real and truly admirable heroism of Edward: for victories are vulgar things in comparison of that moderation and humanity displayed by a young prince of twenty-seven years of age, not yet cooled from the fury of battle, and elated by extraordinary and as unexpected a success, as ever Zenon found in the march of the massacre; the dauphin was taken prisoner; and the remainder of the detachment, who were still in the lane, and exposed to the shot of the enemy, without being able to make resistance, recoiled
upon their own army, and put every thing into disorder. 1

that if he yielded the victory, it was at least gained by a prince of such consummate valour and humanity.

Edward ordered a repast to be prepared in his tent for the prisoner; and he himself served at the royal captive's table. If he had been of a haughty spirit, the sight of the king's back during the meal; constantly refused to take a place at table; and declared, that, being a subject, he was too well acquainted with the distance between his own rank and that of royal majesty, to assume such freedom. All his father's pretensions to the crown of France were now buried in oblivion: John, in captivity, received the honours of a king, which were refused to his father, and seated on the throne; his misfortunes, not his title, were respected; and the French prisoners, conquered by this elevation of mind, more than by their late discomfiture, burst into tears of admiration, which were approved, and mounted on a white steed, distinguished by its size and beauty, and by the richness of its furniture. The conqueror rode by his side in a manner fitted, and carried by a black palfrey. In this situation, more glorious than all the insolent parade of a Roman triumph, he passed through the streets of London, and presented the King of France to his father, who advanced to meet him, and received him with the same courtesy as if he had been a captive, that he might manifest the kindness that had voluntarily come to pay him a friendly visit. It is impossible, in reflecting on this noble conduct, not to perceive the advantages which resulted from the otherwise whimsical principles of John, who was always ready to make use of those rude manners, some superiority even over people of a more cultivated age and nation.

The King of France, besides the generous treatment which he met with in England, had the melancholy consolation of the wretched, to see companions in affliction. The King of Scots had been eleven years a captive in Edward's hands; and the good fortune of this latter monarch had reduced at once the two neighbouring potentates, with whom he was engaged in war, to be prisoners in his capital. But Edward, finding that the conquest of Scotland was nowise advanced by the captivity of its sovereign, and that the government, conducted by Robert Stuart, his nephew and heir, was still able to defend itself, consented to restore David Bruce to his liberty, for the ransom of 100,000 marks sterling; and that prince delivered the sons of all his principal nobility as hostages for the payment.

Meanwhile, the captivity of John, joined State of France. to the preceding disorders of the French government, had produced in that country a dissolution, almost as universal as it was bloody; a total destruction of the finest re- mains, the most horrible and destructive that had ever been experienced in any age or in any nation. The dauphin, now about eighteen years of age, naturally assumed the royal power during his father's captivity; but though endowed with an excellent capacity, even in such early years, he possessed neither experience nor authority sufficient to defend a state; the civil and military forces of his country were shaken by intestine faction. In order to obtain supply, he assembled the states of the kingdom: that assembly, instead of supporting his administration, were themselves divided; and both parties were plundered at the present opportunity to demand limitations of the prince's power, the punishment of past malversations, and the liberty of the King of Navarre. Marcel, provost of the oid judges, and first magistrate of Paris, was put at the head of the unarmed populace; and from the violence and temerity of his character, pushed them to commit the most criminal outrages against the royal authority. They detained the dauphin, who had no longer retained in his possession Robert de Clermont and John de Conflans, marchesals, the one of Normandy, the other of Burgundy; they threatened all the other munsters with a like fate; and when Charles, who was obliged to temporize and dissemble, made his escape from their hands, they levied against him, and openly erected the standard of rebellion. The other cities of the kingdom, in imitation of the capital, shook off the dauphin's authority; took the government into their own hands, and conducted the people between the disorder into every province. The nobles, whose inclinations led them to adhere to the crown, and were naturally disposed to check these tumults, had lost all their influence, and were, in some degree, the agents who, on account of the base desertion of their sovereign in the battle of Poictiers, were treated with universal contempt by the inferior orders. The troops, who, from the deficiency of pay, were no longer retained in the service, refused off all regard to their officers, sought the means of subsistence by plunder and robbery, and associating to them all the disorderly people, with whom that age abounded, formed numerous, and often dangerous, bands, which put the whole kingdom. They desolated the open country: burned and plundered the villages; and by cutting off all means of communication or subsistence, reduced even the inhabitants of the walled towns to the most extreme necessity. The peasants, formerly oppressed and now left unprotected by their masters, became desperate from their present misery; and rising every where in arms, carried to the last extremity those disorders which were derived from the sedition of the citizens and disbanded soldiers. The gentry, hated for their tyranny, were every where exposed to the violence of popular rage; and instead of meeting with the regard due to their past dignity, bore only, on that account, the object of more wanton insult to the mutinous peasants. They were hunted like wild beasts, and put to the sword without mercy: their castles were occupied, and all their property was carried away. Their wives and daughters were first ravished, then murdered: the savages proceeded so far as to impale some gentlemen, and roast them alive before a slow fire: a body of nine thousand of them broke into Meurs, whereas the wife of the dauphin, with above 300 ladies, had taken shelter: the most brutal treatment and most atrocious cruelty were justly dreaded by this helpless company: but the Capitul de Buche, though in the service of Edward, yet moved by generosity and by the gallantry of a true knight, flew to their rescue, and beat off the peasants with great slaughter. In other civil wars, the opposite factions, falling under the government of their several leaders, commonly preserve still the vestige of some rule and order: but here the wild state of nature seemed to be renewed: every man was thrown loose and independent of his fellows: and the populousness of the country, derived from the preceding police of civil society, served only to increase the horror and confusion of the scene.

Amidst these disorders, the King of Navarre made his escape from Paris, and fixed himself in the Louvre, where he could have no several states, the most horrible and destructive that had ever been experienced in any age or in any nation. increase the public distractions. He wanted the steadiness and prudence requisite for making his intrigues subservient to his ambition, and forming his numerous partisans into a regular faction. He revived his pretensions, somewhat obsolete, to the crown of France; but while he advanced this claim, he relied entirely on his alliance with the English, who were concerned in interest to desire that peace, and to invest the enemy to the state, served only by the friendship which they seemingly bore him, to render his cause the more odious. And in all his operations he acted more like a leader of banditti than one who aspired to be the government of a state, and was engaged, by his station, to endeavour the re-establishment of order in the community.

The eyes therefore of all the French, who wished to restore the king to the space and possession of the country, were turned towards the dauphin; and that young prince, though not remarkable for his military talents, possessed so much prudence and spirit, that he daily gained the ascendancy over all his enemies. Marred, the sedition of Provost of Paris, was slain while he was attempting to deliver the city to the king of Navarre and the English; and the capital immediately returned to its duty. The most considerable bodies of the insurgents were dispersed and put to the sword; some bands of military robbers underwent the same fate; and though many grievous disorders still remained, France began gradually to turn the tides of his tresses, and to form some plan for its defence and security.

During the confusion in the dauphin’s affairs, Edward seemed to have a favourable opportunity for pushing his combinations: but bounds and difficulties and discovered countries were turned towards the dauphin; and that young prince, though not remarkable for his military talents, possessed so much prudence and spirit, that he daily gained the ascendancy over all his enemies. were better for the king to accept by a peace what he had in an attempt to secure by hostilities, which, however hitherto successful, had been extremely expensive, and might prove very dangerous: and that Edward having acquired so much glory by his arms, the praise of modern times was as great as that of the ancients. The last may be nominal, and yet he could not so easily renounce an honour so much the greater, as it was durable, was united with that of prudence, and might be attended with the most real advantages. Peace of the peaceable is better than of more terms of peace; and it is proper that, in order to palliate this change of resolution, he should as soon as possible express an intention to renounce the last, which ancient historians represent as the cause of this sudden accommodation. The conferences between the English and French commissioners were carried on during a few days at Bayeux in the Castrum, and terminated by the 6th May. The 6th of May was at last concluded on the following conditions: It was stipulated that King John should be restored to his liberty, and should pay as his ransom three millions of crowns of gold, about 1,500,000 of which was to be discharged at different payments: that Edward should for ever renounce all claim to the crown of France, and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, Touraine, and Argoût, possessed by him at the death of his father, and to the provinces of Poitou, Anjou, Chinon, Touraine, Agenais, Périgord, the Limousin, Quercy, Rovegno, Angoumois, and other districts in that quarter, together with Calais, Guisnes, Moncontour, and the town of Falaise, the territory of the Principality of Orange, which was all that remained of France: that the King of Navarre should be restored to all his honours and possessions: that Edward should renounce his confederacy with the Flemings, John his connexions with the Oldenburg, and that the succession of the French crown to the families of Blois and Montfort, should be decided by arbiters appointed by the two kings; and if the controversies refused to submit to the award, the dispute should no longer be a ground of war between the kingdoms: and that forty hostages, such as should be agreed on, should be sent to England as a security for the execution of all these conditions.

In consequence of this treaty the King of England and Calais; whether Edward also soon after repaired: and there both princes solemnly ratified the treaty. John was sent to Boulogne; the king accompanied him a mile on his journey; and the two princes, purposing to divide all the privileges acquired by the treaty made, John to that part of the country which bordered on and was subject to the territories of the King of Navarre, Edward to the rest; the execution of this agreement was accomplished with a mediocrity and sincerity, of mutual amity. The good disposition of John made him fully sensible of the generous treatment which he had received in England, and obliging the princes, who were not all at the same time possessed of the same sentiments as their respective sovereigns: the King of Navarre was not of these, as he designed to throw off the yoke of his sovereign, and to enslave his country under foreign dominion. The French court were contented with the result of these transactions, and the treaty, as far as concerned them, was altogether advantageous to the nation. But it is to be remarked, that a third of the French king's ransom was yet unpayable when he broke out anew between the two crowns: his son chose rather to employ his revenue in embattling the English, than in enforcing the treaty made by his father.
Mountfort soon after got entire possession of that duchy. But the prudence of Charles broke the force of this blow: he submitted to the decision of fortune: he acknowledged the title of Mountfort, though a zealous partisan of England; and received the professed homage for his dominions. But the chief obstacle which the French king met with in the settlement of the state, proceeded from obscure enemies, whom their crimes alone rendered eminent, and their number dangerous.

On the conclusion of the treaty of Bretigny, the many military adventurers who had followed the standard of Edward, being dispersed into the several provinces, and possessed of few, if any, means, having no fixed object, or recompense of a course of life to which they were now accustomed, and by which alone they could gain a subsistence, they associated themselves with the banditti, who were already in so enmities of rape and violence; and under the names of the compagnies and compagnies, became a terror to all the peaceable inhabitants. Some English and Gascon gentlemen of character, particularly Sir Peter King of Castle, Hampered by his contumely Verte, and others, were not ashamed to take the command of these ruffians, whose numbers amounted, on the whole, to near 40,000, and who bore the appearance of regular armies, and were armed in a manner that could not be defeated by it, and betake themselves to peaceable or lawless professions.

As Charles was not able by power to reduce to his enervous a grievance, he was led by necessity, and by the turn of his character, to correct it by policy; and to contrive some method of discharging into foreign countries this dangerous and intestine evil.

The treaty was soon concluded. The high character of honour which that general possessed made every one trust to his promises: though the intended expedition was kept a secret, the companies implicitly enlisted under his standard; and they required no other condition before their engagement, than an assurance that they were not to be led against the Prince of Wales in Guenee. But that prince was so little averse to the enterprise, that he allowed some gentlemen of his retinue to enter into the service under du Guesclin.

Du Guesclin, having completed his levies, led the army first to Avignon, where the Pope then resided, and demanded of him an explanation for his soldiers, and the sum of 200,000 livres. The first was readily promised him; some more difficulty was made with regard to the second. "I believe that my fellows, moved by the generosity of the New King of Castle, whose subjects, instead of supporting their oppressors, were ready to join the enemy against him." Peter fled from his dominions, took shelter in Guenee, and craved the protection of the Prince of Wales, whom his father had interested with his present service of the French, by the title of the principality of Aquitaine. The prince seemed now to have entirely changed his sentiments with regard to the Spanish transactions; whether that he was moved by the generosity of the New King of Castle, or by the partnership of the New King of Castle and Wales.

His Majesty, at the earnest importunity of his father, he levied a great army, and set out upon his enterprise. He was accompanied by his eldest son, the younger, and perhaps his eldest cousin, in the room of the good prince of that name, who had died without any male issue, and whose daughter he espoused. Clandes also, who bore among the English the same character which du Guesclin had acquired among the French, commanded under him on this expedition.

The first blow which the Prince of Wales gave to Henry of Trastamara, was the recalling of all the compagnies from his service; and so much reverence did they bear to the name of Edward, that great numbers of them immediately withdrew from Spain, and enlisted under his banners. Henry, however, beloved by his new subjects, and supported by the King of Aragon, and others of his neighbours, was able to meet the enemy with an army of 100,000 men; forces three times more numerous than those which were commanded by Edward. Du Guesclin, seeing the enemy, offered him a suit to fight a decisive action, to cut off the Prince of Wales's provisions, and to avoid every engagement with a general, whose enterprises had hitherto been always conducted with prudence, and whose services the prince trusted too much to his numbers; and ventured to encounter the English prince at Najara. 3d April.
Histories of that age are commonly very copious in describing the shocks of armies in battle, the valour of the combatants, the slaughter and various successes of the day; but though small encounters in those times were often well disputed, military discipline was always too imperfect, and orders in great armies, and actions latterly deserve more the name of routs than of battles. Henry was chased off the field, with the loss of above 20,000 men: there perished only four knights and forty privates among the English.

Peter, who so well merited the infamous epithet which he bore, purposed to murder all his prisoners in cold blood; but was restrained from this barbarity by the remonstrances of the Pope, his allies and ambassadors, who, finding the young prince not submitted to the viceroy: Peter was restored to the throne; and Edward finished this perilous enterprise with his usual glory. But he had soon reason to repent his condescension with a man like Peter, abandoned to all sense of virtue and honour. The ungrateful tyrant refused the stipulated pay to the English forces; and Edward, finding his soldiers daily perish by sickness, and even his own health impaired by the climate, was obliged, without receiving any satisfaction on this head, to return into Guienne.

The barbaries exercised by Peter over his helpless subjects, whom he now regarded as vanquished rebels, revived all the old resentment and old animosities. It appeared, in the return of Henry of Tramastare, together with du Gueselin, and some forces levied anew in France, the tyrant was again deterred and was taken prisoner. His brother, however, seeing that it should be impossible for him to live, made a covenant with his own hand; and was placed on the throne of Castile, which he transmitted to his posterity. The Duke of Lancaster, who espoused in second marriage the eldest daughter of Peter, inherited only the empty title of that sovereignty, and, by claiming the successions, increased the animosity of the new King of Castile against England.

But the prejudice which the affairs of France had given to Prince Edward received from this splendid, though irruptive expedition, ended not with it. He had involved himself so much in debt, by his prepayments and the pay of his troops, that he found it necessary, on his return, to impose on his principality a new tax, to which some of the nobility consented with extreme reluctance, and to which others absolutely refused to submit. This incident revived the animosity which the inhabitants bore to the English, and which all the ambitious qualities of the Prince of Wales were able to mitigate or assuage. They complained that they were considered as a conquered people, that their privileges were disregarded, that all trust was given to the English alone, and that they were exposed, during their stay there, to the malice and ill-nature of the English; and that the extreme reluctance which most of them had expressed to receive the new yoke, was likely to be long remembered against them. They cast, therefore, their eyes towards their ancient sovereign, whose prejudice, they found, had now brought the affairs of his kingdom into excellent order; and the Counts of Armagnac, Conming, and Perigord, the Lord d'Albert, with other nobles, went to Paris, and were encouraged to carry their complaints to Claires, as to their lord paramount, against these oppressions of the English government.

In the treaty of Bretigny, it had been stipulated, that the two kings should mutually cede to each other the territories claimed to the crown of France, and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, and Anjou; John, of the homage and fealty due for Guienne, and the other provinces ceded to the English. But the lands of Anjou, which were ceded to Edward de Balan, who was taken prisoner at Calais, it was found necessary, as Edward was not yet in possession of all the territories, that the mutual renunciations should for some time be deferred; and it was agreed, that the parties meanwhile should make no use of their respective claims against each other. Though the failure in exchanging these renunciations had still proceeded from France, Edward appears to have taken no umbrage at it; both because this clause seemed to give him entire security, and because some preceding apology had probably been made to him for each delay. It was, however, on this pretence, though directly contrary to treaty, that Charles resolved to ground his claim, if still considered as of superior lord of those provinces, and of receiving the appeals of his sub-vassals.

But as views of policy, more than those of justice, enter into the deliberations of princes; and as the events which removed from the English, the pride of their triumphs, the severe terms imposed by the treaty of peace, seemed to render every prudent means of revenge honourable against them; Charles was determined to take this measure, less by the renderings of his civilians and lawyers, than by the present situation of the two monarchies. He considered the declining years of Edward, the languishing state of the Prince of Wales's health, the affection which the inhabitants of all those provinces bore to their ancient master, and their distance from England, their vicinity to France, the extreme animosity expressed by his own subjects against these invaders, and their ardent thirst of vengeance; and he judged that the없는 변수를 제공하는 자료 속에서, 이상적 형태의 작업을 수행하는 것에 어려움이 없다. 판점, 그 예로는 복잡한 시스템에서의 문제 해결을 수행하는 것에 어려움이 없거나, 이상적 형태의 작업을 수행하는 것에 어려움이 없다. barked for Bourdeaux with another army, but was so long detained by contrary winds, that he was obliged to lay aside the enterprise. Sir Robert Knolles, at the head of 30,000 men, marched out of Calais, and continued his ravages to the gates of Paris, without being able to provoke the enemy to an engagement: he proceeded in his march to the provinces of Maine and Anjou, which he laid waste; but part of his army being there defeated by the conduct of du Guesci, who was now created Constable of France, and who seems to have been the first uncommon instance of general that had yet appeared in Europe, the rest were scattered and dispersed, and the small remnants of the English forces, instead of reaching Guene, took shelter in Briere, and the king, who had endeavored to make all France the place of their destination. Edward, from the necessity of his affairs, was at last obliged to conclude a truce with the enemy after almost all his ancient possessions in France had been ravished from him, except Bourdeaux and Bayonne, and all his conquests, except Calais.

The decline of the king's life was exposed to many mortifications, and corresponded not to the splendid and magnificent character to which it had filled the beginning and the body of it. Besides losing the loss of his foreign dominions, and being baffled in every attempt to defend them, he felt the decay of his authority at home, and experienced, from the shortness of some parlamentary representatives, the great insufficiency of the people, and the influence of present fortune over all their judgments. This prince, who during the vigour of his age had been chiefly occupied in the pursuits of war, and who, by immensity of his possessions, was capable per ilude himself in pleasure; and being now a wiser, he attached himself to a lady of sense and spirit, one Alice Pierce, who acquired a great ascendency, and, by her influence, gave such general disgust, that, in order to satisfy the parliament, he was obliged to remove her from court. The indolence, also, naturally attending old age and infirmities, had made him, in a great degree, resign the administration into the hands of his son, the Duke of Lancaster, who, as he was far from being popular, weakened extremely the affection which the English bore to the person and government of the king. Men curtailed his jealousies very far against the government, and as they saw, with much justice, the death of the Prince of Wales every day approaching, they apprehended lest the succession of his son Richard, now a minor, should be defeated by the intrigues of Lancaster, and that he would reduce the power of the king. But the king, in order to satisfy both the people and the prince on this head, declared, in parliament, his grandson heir and successor to the crown; and thereby cut off all the hopes of the Duke of Lancaster, if he ever had the temerity to entertain any.

The Prince of Wales, after a lingering illness, died in the forty-sixth year of his age; and left a character illustrious for every eminent virtue, and from his earliest youth, till the hour he expired, unstained by any blemish. His valour and military talents formed the smallest part of his merit; his generosity, humanity, affability, moderation, gained him that; as they saw, with much justice, the death of the Duke of Milan, and he was qualified to throw a lustre, not only on that age to which he lived, and which noise infested him with its vices, but on the most shining period of ancient or modern history. The king survived about a year without being sensible, though too late, of the irreparable loss which they had sustained.

The English were apt to consider, with peculiar fondness, the history of Edward III. and to esteem his reign, as it was one of the longest, the most glorious also, that occurs in the annals of their nation. The ascendant which they then began to acquire over France, their rival and supposed national enemy, makes them cast their eyes on this period with great complacency, and sanctifies every measure which Edward embraced for that end. But the domestic government of this prince is really more admirable than his foreign victories; and England enjoyed, by the prudence and vigour of his conduct, the advantages of perpetual peace, and tranquility than she had been blessed with in any former period, or than she experienced for many ages after. He gained the affections of the great, yet curbed their bunglers; he made them feel their prince, the magnanimity of daring, or even being inclined, to murmur at it: his affable and obliging behaviour, his munificence and generosity, made them submit with pleasure to his dominion; his valour and conduct made them successful in most of their enterprises; and their unquiet spirits, directed against a public enemy, had no leisure to breed those disturbances to which they were naturally so much inclined, and which the frame of the government seemed so much to authorize. This was the chief benefit which resulted from Edward's victories and conquests. His foreign wars were, in other respects, neither founded in justice, nor directed to any salutary purpose. His attempts against the King of Scotland were of no great moment; and although the first, of his grandfather's claim of superiority over that kingdom, were both unreasonable and ungenerous; and he allowed himself to be too easily seduced, by the glaring prospect of French conquest, to make a war against them, which was practicable, and which, if attained, might really have been of lasting utility to his country and his successors. The success which he met with in France, though chiefly owing to the great and magnificent talents, was unexpected. His attempts against the King of France were of much moment, and were from the very nature of things, not from any unforeseen accidents, was found, even during his lifetime, to have procured him no solid advantages. But the glory of a conquest over the king of France, which the English made, and which, after the event, has been lamented. His prime ambition was to be considered as a monarch of the first rank, and to be the arbiter of the fates of nations: so violent that the fruitless desolation of so fine a part of Europe as France, is totally disregarded by us, and is never considered as a blemish in the character or conduct of the prince. And indeed, from the unfortunate state of human nature, it will commonly happen, that a sovereign of genius, such as Edward, who usually finds every thing easy in his domestic government, will turn himself towards military enterprises, where alone he meets with success: and there he has full exercise for his industry and capacity.

Edward had a numerous posterity by his Queen, Philippa of Hainault. His eldest son was the beroe Edward, usually called the Black Prince, and was created Earl of Chester before he was twelve years old. And Edward, in the beginning of his reign, was first married to the Most Noble Edward, queen, by whom she had a child. By the marriage of the Prince of Wales she had a son, Richard, who alone survived his father.

The second son of Edward (for we pass over such as died in their childhood) was Lancie, Duke of Clarence, who was first married to Elizabeth de Burgh, daughter and heir of the Earl of Ulster, by whom he left one daughter, married to Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March. Lancie was the father of the Duke of York, and he was the first of that illustrious family. Lancie's son, Edward, was the eldest son of the Duke of Milan, and died in Italy soon after the consummation of his nuptials, without leaving any posterity by that princess. Of all the family, he resembled most his father, especially in the external form of his person, which was replete. Edward's third son was John of Gaunt, so called from the place of his birth: he was created Duke of Lancaster; and from him sprang that branch which afterwards possessed the crown of England. The first marriage of Gaunt, commonly called Edward the Black Prince, his son, was to the most unfortunate of his nieces, and his daughter, married to Edmund, created Earl of Cambridge by his father, and Duke of York by his nephew. The fifth son was Thomas, who received the title of Earl of Buckingham from his father, and that of Duke of Gloucester from his ne-
In order to prevent confusion, we shall always distinguish these two powers by the titles of York and Gloucester, even before they were advanced to them.

There were also several princesses born to Edward by Philippa; to wit, Isabella, Joan, Mary, and Margaret, who, it is supposed, in the matter of their appointment into the peerage, were chiefly waited on in their visitation, and had never been presented to the peers. There were also two others, none of whom were ever presented to the peers.

It was remarked by an elegant historian,6 that conquerors, though usually the bane of human kind, proved often, in those feudal times, the most powerful and necessary protection, and were most in need of supplies from their people; and not being able to compel them by force to submit to the necessary impositions, they were obliged to make them some compensation by equitable laws and popular concessions. This remark is, in some measure, though imperfectly, justified by the history of Edward III. He took no steps of moment without consulting his parliament, and obtaining their approbation, which he afterwards pleased as a reason for supporting his measures.7

The parliament, therefore, rose into greater consideration during his reign, and acquired more regular authority, than in any former time; and even the House of Commons, which, during the minority, was naturally depressed by the greater power of the crown and barons, began to appear of some weight in the constitution. In the later years of Edward, the king's minority, which had been widely supposed in particular, was totally Luttrell, who fell a sacrifice to the authority of the Commons;7 and they even obliged the king to banish his mistress by their remonstrances. Some attention was also paid to the election of their members; and lawyers, in particular, who were at that time men of character somewhat inferior, were totally excluded the House during several parliaments.8

Of the many popular laws enacted by any prince, was the statute which passed in the twenty-fifth of this reign,6 which limited the cases of high treason, before vague and uncertain, to three principal heads, conspiring the death of the king, levying war against him, and adhering to his enemies; and the judges were, if any other cases should occur, from inflicting the penalty of treason without an application to parliament. The bounds of treason were indeed so much limited by this statute, which still remains in force, without any alteration, that the lawyers were obliged to enlarge them, and to explain a conspiracy for levying war against the king, to be equivalent to a conspiracy against his life; and this intention was so clearly declared by the same statute, that the case, been tacitly acquiesced in. It was also ordained, that a parliament should be held once a year, or oftener, if need be: a law, which, like many others, was never observed, and lost authority by disregard.

Edward granted above twenty parliamentary confirmations of the Great Charter; and these concessions are commonly appealed to as proofs of his great indulgence to the people, and his tender regard for their liberties. But the contrary presumption is more natural. If the maxims of Edward's reign had not been in general somewhat arbitrary, and if the Great Charter had not been frequently violated, the parliament would never have applied for these frequent confirmations, which could and must have been put to a deed regularly observed, and which could serve to no other purpose than to prevent the contrary proceedings from turning into a rule, and acquiring authority. It was understood by the nation during those ages, that a statute which had been enacted some years, instead of acquiring, was imagined to lose force by time, and needed to be often renewed by recent statutes of the same sense and tenor. Hence, likewise, that general clause so frequent in old acts of parliament, that the statutes enacted by the king's progetors should be observed;9 a precaution which, if we do not consider the circumstances of the times, might appear absurd and ridiculous. The frequent confirmations, in general terms, of the privileges of the church, proceeded from the same cause.

It is a clause in one of Edward's statutes, that no man, of what estate or condition soever, shall be put out of land, tenement, or house, without the consent of the great men of the same land. This privilege was sufficiently secured by a clause of the Great Charter, which had received a general confirmation in the first chapter of the same statute. Why then is the clause so anxiously, and as we may think, so superfluously repeated? Plainly, because there had been some late infringements of it, which gave umbrage to the Commons.

But there is no article in which the laws are more frequently repeated during this reign, almost in the same terms, than that of purveyance, which the parliament always calls an outrageous and intolerable grievance, and the source of infinite damage to the people.10 The parliament tried to abolish this prerogative altogether, by prohibiting any one from taking goods without the consent of the owners,11 and by changing the heinous name of purveyors, which had been so often abused, nor put to death, without being brought in answer by due process of the law.12 This privilege was sufficiently secured by a clause of the Great Charter, which had received a general confirmation in the first chapter of the same statute. Why then is the clause so anxiously, and as we may think, so superfluously repeated? Plainly, because there had been some late infringements of it, which gave umbrage to the Commons.

The magnificient castle of Windsor was built by Edward III. and his method of conducting the work may serve as a specimen of the condition of the people in that age. Instead of engaging workmen by contracts and wages, he assessed every county in England to send him the same number of workmen, clothiers, tailors, or any other art, and give them wages, at what rate he pleased, to the owners of the goods which he laid hold of. The kingdom also abounded so little in commodities, and the interior communication was so imperfect, that, having the moneyers been strictly protected by law, they could easily have exacted any price from the king; especially in his frequent progresses when he came to distant and poor places, where the court did not usually reside, and where a regular plan for supplying it could not be easily established. Not only the king, but several great lords, insisted upon this right of purveyance.

the king greater supplies than had ever been obtained by any of his predecessors, his great undertakings, and the necessity of his affairs, obliged him to levy still more; and after his splendid success against France had added wealth to his kingdom, those arbitrary impositions became almost annual and perpetual. Cotton's Abrégément of the Records affords numerous instances of this kind in the first year of his reign, in the thirteenth year, in the fourteenth, in the twenty-sixth, in the twenty-seventh, in the twenty-fifth, in the thirty-eighth, in the fiftieth, and in the fifty-first. The king openly avowed and maintained this power of levying taxes at pleasure. At one time he replied to the remonstrance made by the Commons against these arbitrary impositions; he refused compliance. In the subsequent year they desired that the king might remove this arbitrary imposition, but his answer was, that he would levy no taxes without necessity, for the defence of the realm, and where he reasonably might use that authority. This incident passed a few days before his death. It was in a manner the last word to his people. It would seem that the famous charter or statute of Edward I. de talloquo non concedendo, though never repealed, was supposed to have already lost, by age, and in the last hours of the king, the power which it was intended to give to the commons by this act. The Commons did not possess the power of naming the tax which was to be levied, and the king had the power of revocating the statute against the arbitrary practices of the court from becoming an established part of the constitution. In so much better condition were the privileges of the people, even during the arbitrary reigns of Edward I., the previous and the succeeding ones, particularly those of the Tudors, where no tyranny or abuse of power ever met with any check or opposition, or so much as a remonstrance, from parliament.

In this reign we find, according to the sentiments of an ingenious and learned author, the first strongly marked, and probably contested, distinction between a proclamation by the king and his privy council, and a law which had received the assent of the Lords and Commons. It is easy to imagine a prince of so much sense and spirit as Edward, would be no slave to the court of Rome. Though the old tribute was paid during some years of his minority, he afterwards withheld it; and when the Pope, in 1309, sent a bull to cite him to court in default of payment, he laid the matter before his parliament. That assembly unanimously declared, that King John could not, without a national consent, subject his kingdom to a foreign power: and that they were therefore determined to support their sovereign against this unjust pretension.

During this reign, the statute of provisors was enacted, rendering it penal to procure any presents to be benefficed from the court of Rome, and securing the rights of all patrons and electors, which had been extremely encroached on by the Pope. By a subsequent statute, every person was outlawed who carried any cause by appeal to the court of Rome.

The laity, at this time, seem to have been extremely prejudiced against the papal power, and even somewhat against the clergy, because of the connections with the Roman pointiff. The parliament pretended that the usurpations of the Pope were the cause of all the plagues, injuries, famine, and poverty of the realm; were more destractive to it than all the wars; and were the reason why it contained not a third of the inhabitants and commodities which it formerly possessed: that the taxes levied by him exceeded five times those which were paid to the king: that every thing was velai in that sinful city of Rome; and that even the patrons in England had thence learned to practise simony without shame or remorse. At another time they petition the king to employ no churchman in any office of state to be in his council in terms of expelling by force the papal authority, and thereby providing a remedy against oppressions, which they neither could nor would any longer endure. Men who talked in such a manner were not far from the truth: but Edward did not think proper to second all this zeal; though he passed the statute of provisors, he took little care of its execution; and the parliament made frequent complaints of his negligence on this head. The king, in content with the delivering such of the Romish ecclesiastics as possessed revenues in England, to depend entirely upon him by means of that statute.

As to the police of the kingdom during this period, it was certainly better than during times of faction, civil war, and disorder, to which England was so often exposed; yet were there several vicissitudes in the constitution, the bad consequences of which, all the power and vigilance of the king could not avert. The nobles were in their confederacies with those of their own order, and by supporting and defending their retainers in every misquity,; were the chief abettors of robbers, murderers, and ruffians of all kinds; and in their absolute and unbridled power, the nobility were brought to give their promise in parliament, that they would not allow, retain, or support any felon or breaker of the law; yet this engagement, which we may suspect was not seen exacted, from which the king was never regarded by them. The Commons made continual complaints of the multitude of robbers, murderers, rapists, and other disorders, which, they say, were become numberless in every county, and brought, and which the Commons always ascribe to the protection that the criminals received from the great. The King of Cyprus, who paid a visit to England in this reign, was robbed and stripped on the highway, and his subsequent one, which was brought to him, was never exacted by the king.

Commerce and industry were certainly at a very low ebb during this period, The bad policy of the country alone affords a sufficient reason. The only exports were wool, wine, Manufactures, and woolen manufactured goods, of which wool was by far the most considerable. "Nayghton has asserted, that 100,000 sacks of wool were annually exported, and sold at twenty pounds a sack; a sack being valued at four hundred marks. But he has added, that the English have never contributed to this dissolution of law, by his facility in granting pardons to felons from the solicitation of the courtiers. Laws were made to retrace this prerogative, and remonstrances of the Commons were presented against the abuse of it; but to no purpose. The gratifying of a powerful nobleman continued still to be of more importance than the protection of the people. The king also granted many franchises, which interrupted the course of justice and the execution of the laws, to those who could influence the king's court.

ment to foreign weavers, and by enacting a law which prohibited every one from wearing any cloth but of English fabric. The parliament prohibited the exportation of woollen goods, which was not so well judged, especially while the exportation of unwrought wool was so much allowed and encouraged. A like injudicious law was made for the prohibition of manufactured iron, &c. 1
It appears from a record in the Exchequer, that in 1354, the exports of England amounted to 294,184 pounds seventeen shillings and twopence; the imports to 38,970 pounds, one shilling. This was a great balance, considering that it arose wholly from the exportation of raw wool and other rough materials. The import was chiefly linen and fine cloth, and some of these goods seem to have been extremely drained at this time by Edward's foreign expeditions and foreign subsidies, which probably was the reason why the exports so much exceed the imports.

The first toll we read of in England for mending the highways was that for repairing the road between St. Gile's and Temple-bar. 2

In the first of Richard II. the parliament complained extremely of the decay of shipping during the preceding year, and assented that one thousand formerly mentioned ships and vessels than were then to be found in the whole kingdom. This calamity they ascribe to the arbitrary seizure of ships by Edward for the service of his frequent expeditions. 3 The parliament, after the passage of Richard's complaint, 4 and we likewise find it made in the forty-sixth of Edward III. So false is the common opinion, that this reign was favourable to commerce. There was not one of this king directed to the mayor and sheriffs of London, to take up all ships of forty ton and upwards, to be converted into ships of war. 5

The parliament attempted the impracticable scheme of renewal. The parliament prohibited the exporting of this commodity, 6 and it was immediately invented that it was to repair the road between St. Gile's and Temple-bar.

nor till the middle of the subsequent, that they sailed to the Mediterranean.

Luxury was complained of in that age, as well as in others of more refinement; and attempts were made by parliament to restrain it, particularly on the head of apparel, where surely it is the most obviously innocent and inofsensive. No man under a certain fine was allowed to wear gold, silver, or silk in clothes: servants also were prohibited from eating flesh-meat or fish above once a day. 7
By another law it was ordained, that no one should be allowed, either by the king, or by the queen, to wear more than one suit, or to wear a suit in each course, and not above two courses: and it is likewise expressly declared, that saved meat to count as one of these dishes. 8 It was easy to foresee that such ridiculous laws must prove ineffectual, and could never be executed.

The use of the French language in pleadings and public deeds was abolished. 8 It may appear strange that the nation should so long have worn this badge of Conquest:
but the king and nobility seem never to have become thoroughly English, or to have forgotten their French extraction, till Edward's wars with France gave them an antipathy to that nation. Yet still it was long before the use of the English tongue came into fashion. The first English paper which we meet with in Rymers was in the year 1386, during the reign of Richard II. 9 There are Spanish papers in that collection of more ancient date: 10 and the use of the Latin and French still continued.

We may judge of the ignorance of the Saxons at this epoch by a story told by Robert of Aylesbury. Pope Clement VI. having, in 1344, created Lewis of Spain Prince of the Fortunate islands, meaning the Canaries, then newly discovered; the English ambassador at Rome, and the returns were seized with an alarm that Lewis had been created King of England; and they immediately hurried home, in order to convey this important intelligence. Yet such an error, as of the year 1344, when the Chronicle, informs us there were then 30,000 students in the university of Oxford alone. What was the occupation of all these young men? To learn very bad Latin, and still worse logic.

In 1364 the Commons petitioned, that in consideration of the preceding peticlence, such persons as possessed manors holding of the king in chief, and had let different leases without obtaining licences, might continue to exercise the same powers, till the country were more become populous. 9 The Commons were sensible that this security of possession was a good means for rendering the king dom prosperous and flourishing; yet durst not apply all

CHAPTER XVII.

RICHARD II.

A. D. 1377.

Government during his accession—The parliament which was summoned so soon after the king's accession, was both elected and assembled in tranquillity; and the great change, from a sovereign of consummate wisdom and experience, to one of eleven years of age, was not immediately felt by the people. The habits of order and obedience which the barons had been taught during the long reign of Edward, still influenced them; and the authority of the king's three uncles, the Dukes of Lancaster, York, and Gloucester, sufficed to repress, for a time, the turbulent spirit to which that order, in a weak reign, was so often subject. The dangerous ambition too of these princes themselves was checked by the plan and undeniable title of Richard, by the declaration of it made in parliament, and by the affectionate regard which the people bore to the memory of his father, and which was naturally transferred to the young sovereign upon the throne. The different characters also of these three princes rendered them a counterpoise to each other; and it was natural to expect, that any dangerous designs which might be formed by one brother, would meet with no less inconvenience from the others. Lancaster, whose age and experience, and authority under the late king, gave him the ascendant among them, though his integrity seemed not proof against great temptations, was neither of an exalted spirit, nor of a popular character. York was indolent, inactive, and of slender capacity. Gloucester was turbulent, bold, and popular; but being the youngest of the family, was restrained by the power and authority of his elder brothers. There appeared, therefore, no circumstance in the domestic situation of England which might endanger the public peace, or give any immediate apprehensions to the lovers of their country.

But as Edward, though he had fixed the succession to the crown, had taken no care to establish a plan of government during the minority of his grandson, it behoved the parliament to supply this defect; and the House of Commons distinguished themselves by taking the lead on this subject. The House, which had been rising to consider the whole course of the late reign, naturally received an accession of power during the minority; and as it was now becoming a scene of business, the ministers, or at worst some of them, for the first time, might preserve order in their debates, and maintain those forms which are requisite in all numerous assemblies. Peter de la Mare was the man pitched on; the same person that had been imprisoned, and detained in custody by the late king, for his freedom of speech in attacking the ministers and the ministers of that prince. But though this election discovered a spirit of liberty in the Commons, and was followed by further attacks both on these ministers and on the king himself, the king was too loud in the assertion of his great inferiority, to assume at first any immediate share in the administration of government, or the care of the king's person. They were content to apply by petition to the Lords for the redress of these grievances, to appoint a council of nine, who might direct the public business, and to choose men of virtuous life and conversation, who might inspect the conduct and education of the young prince. These councils, as they laboured more especially, ventured to proceed a step further in their applications. They presented a petition, in which they prayed the king to check the prevailing custom among the barons, of forming illegal combinations with each other, and supporting such barons as men of inferior rank, in the violations of law and justice. They received from the throne a general and an obliging answer to this petition: but another part of their application was fully met in the immediate calling into the king's minority, by Parliament, which seemed to require the concurrence of the Commons, as well as that of the Upper House, in the nomination, was not complied with: but Lords alone assumed the election, and chose those officers: the Commons tacitly acquiesced in the choice; and thought that, for the present, they themselves had proceeded a sufficient length, if they but advanced their pretentions, though rejected, of interposing in these more important matters of state.

On this footing then the government stood. The administration was conducted entirely in the king's name: no regency was expressly appointed; the nine counsellors and the great officers, named by the peers, did their duty, each in his respective department; and the whole system was for some years kept together by the secret authority of the king's uncle, especially of the Duke of Lancaster, who was himself the first leader of the commons.

The parliament was dissolved, after the Commons had represented the necessity of their being re-assembled once every year, as appointed by law; and after having elected two cavils or dissensions in the king's household, the produce of the fifteenth and tenths, which they had voted to the crown. In the other parliaments called during the minority, the Commons still discover a strong spirit of freedom, and a sense of their own authority, which, without breaching any disturbance, tended to secure their independence and that of the people.

Edward had left his grandson involved in many dangerous wars. The pretensions of the Duke of Lancaster to the crown of Castile made that kingdom still persevere in hostilities against England. Scotland, whose throne was now filled by Robert Stewart, nephew to David Bruce, and the first prince of that family, maintained such close connection with France, that they were engaged with one crown almost inevitably produced hostilities with the other. The French monarch, whose prudent conduct acquired him the surname of wise, as he had already baffled all the experience and wisdom of his predecessor, was no longer a dangerous enemy to a minor king: but his genius, which was not naturally enterprising, led him not, at present, to give any disturbance to his neighbours: he laboured, besides, under many difficulties at home, which it was necessary for him to surmount before he could think of making conquests in a foreign country. England was master of Calais, Bourdeaux, and Boulogne; and lately acquired possession of Cherbourg from the ransom of the King of Navarre, and of Brest from that of the Duke of Brittany; and having thus an easy entrance into France from every quarter, was, even in its present situation, to have done much for himself, were it not for the fact that Charles could remove the English from these important posts, be died in the flower of his age, and left his kingdom to a minor son, who bore the name of Charles VI.

A. D. 1370.

The first imposition which was care- ried on in a manner somewhat languid, and produced no enterprise of great lustre and renown. Sir Hugh Calverley, governor of Calais, making an incursion into Picardy with a detachment of the garrison, set fire to Boulogne.\(^4\) The Duke of Lancaster conducted an arms into Brittany, but returned without being able to perform any thing memorable. In a subsequent year the Duke of Gloucester marched out of Calais with a body of 2000 cavalry, and 8000 infantry; and scurped not, with his small army, to enter into the heart of France, and to continue his ravages through Picardy, Champagne, the Bre, the Beauvais, the Oinosus, the Or- landois, till he had burning his allies in the province of Brit- tany.\(^5\) The Duke of Burgundy, at the head of a more considerable army, came within sight of him; but the French were so overawed by the former successes of the English, that they desisted from the project to venture a pitched battle with the troops of that nation. As the Duke of Brittany, soon after the arrival of these succours, formed an accommodation with the court of England, this enterprise proved in the end unsuccessful, and made no durable impression upon the enemy.

The expenses of these armaments, and the usual want of economy attending a minority, much exhausted the English treasury, and obliged the parliament, besides meeting all the extraordinary expenses above mentioned, to grant a new and unusual tax of three groats on every person, male and female, above fifteen years of age; and they ordained that, in levying this tax, the opulent should relieve the poor by an equitable compensation. This imposition produced a mutiny, which was singular in its circumstances. All history abounds with examples where the great tyranny over the meaner sort; but here the lowest populace rose against their rulers, committed the most cruel ravages upon them, and took vengeance for all former oppressions.

A. D. 1380.

The faint dart of the arts and of good government in that age excited the minds of the people of different states of Europe, to wish for a better condition, and to mould upon those models, which the laws, enacted by the haughty nobility and gentry, had so long imposed upon them. The commotions of the people in Flanders, the mutiny of the peasants in France, were the natural effects of this growing spirit of independence; and the report of these events being brought into England, where personal slavery, as we learn from Froissart, was more general than in any other country in Europe, had prepared the minds of the multitudes for an insurrection. One John Ball also, a sediscton preacher, who affected low popularity, went about the country, and incited on his audience the principles of the first origin of all unequal laws, and one common stock, their equal right to liberty and to all the goods of nature, the tyranny of artificial distinctions, and the abuses which had arisen from the degradation of the more considerable part of the nation, and toranscend their slaves in insolent and insolent rules.\(^6\) These doctrines, so agreeable to the populace, and so conformable to the ideas of primitive equality which are engraven in the hearts of all men, were greedily received by the multitude; and scattered the sparks of that sedition, which the present tax raised into a conflagration.\(^7\)

\(^9\) There were two verses at that time in the mouths of all the common people: in case of precide, was quibled but regard with some degree of approbation:
along Smithfield, very slantly guarded, met with Wat Tyler, at the head of these nobles, and entered into a conference with him. Tyler, having ordered his companions to retire till he should give them a signal, after which they were to murder all the company except the king himself, whom they were to detain prisoner, feared not to come into the midst of the royal retinue. He there behaved himself, as always, with the utmost respect and politeness; the Mayor of London, not able to bear his insolence, drew his sword, and struck him so violent a blow as brought him to the ground, where he was instantly dispatched by others of the Londoners. The men who had risen, seeing their leader fall, prepared themselves for revenge; and thus the whole company, with the king himself, had undoubtedly perished on the spot, had it not been for an extraordinary presence of mind which Richard discovered on the occasion. He ordered his company to stop; he advanced alone towards the enraged multitude; and accosting them with an affable and unperturbed countenance, he asked them, "What is the meaning of this disorder, my good people? Are you angry that ye have lost your leader? I am your king: I will be your leader." The populace, overawed by his presence, implicitly followed him; he led them into the fields, to prevent any disorder which might have arisen by their continuing in the city: being, then, joined by Sir Robert Knollis, and a body of well-armed veteran soldiers, who had been secretly drawn together, he strictly prohibited that officer from falling on the nobles, and such other of those who had been insulted and murdered upon them, and he peaceably dismissed them with some charters which had been granted to their followers. Soon after, the nobility and gentry, hearing of the king's danger, in which they perceived a reproach to London with their neglect and reticence: and Richard took the field at the head of an army 40,000 strong. It then behoved all the rebels to submit: the charters of enfranchisement and pardon were revoked by parliament; the low people were reduced to submission by prudent councils before; and several of the ringleaders were severely punished for the late disorders. Some were even executed without process or form of law. It was pretended that the intentions of the majority had been to seize the king's person, to carry him through England at their head, to murder all the nobility, gentry, and lawyers, and even all the bishops and priests, except the mendicant friars; to despatch afterwards the king himself, and having thus reduced all to a level, to order the kingdom at their pleasure. It is not impossible, but many of them, in the delirium of their first success, might have formed such projects: but of all their sanguinary schemes, those of transferring the popular franchise, and in time, raising a body of 30,000 men expected to be the salvation of England, were greatest. A youth of sixteen, (which was at this time the king's age,) who had discovered so much courage, presence of mind, and address, and had so dexterously eluded the vigilance of this tumult, raised great expectations in the nation; and it was natural to hope, that he would, in the course of his life, equal the glories which he had so uniformly attended his father and his grandfather in all their undertakings. But in proportion as Richard advanced in years, these hopes vanished; and his want of capacity, at least of solid judgment, appeared in every enterprise which he attempted. The Scots, sensible of their own deficiency in cavalry, had been for some time occupied in the reconquest of Charles VI.; and John de Vienne, Admiral of France, had been sent over with a body of 1500 men at arms, to support them in their invasions against the English. The danger was now deemed by the king's uncle somewhat serious; and a requisition of 50,000 men was levied: and they marched into Scotland, with Richard himself at their head. The Scots did not pretend to make resistance against so great a force: they abandoned without scruple their own dominions to the enemy, and crossed into England; and when de Vienne expressed his surprise at this plan of operations, they told him, that all their crew was driven into the forests and fastnesses; that their houses and other goods were of small value; and that they well knew how to compensate any losses which they might sustain in that respect, by making an incursion into England. Accordingly, when Richard entered Scotland by Berwick and Dunbar, on the east coast of the country, where the French were attended by the French, entered the borders of England by the west, and carrying their ravages through Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Lancashire, collected a rich booty, and burnt and molested almost every town and village. Richard meanwhile advanced towards Edinburgh, and destroyed in his way all the towns and villages on each side of him: he reduced that city to ashes: he treated in the same manner, Perth, Dundee, and other places in the low country; but when he was advised to direct his march towards the west coast, to await the return of the enemy, and to take revenge on them for their devastations, his impatience to return to England, and enjoy his usual pleasures and amusements, overcame every consideration; and he led back his army without effecting any thing by all these mighty preparations. The Scots, soon after, finding the heavy bodies of French cavalry very useless in that desolate kind of war, by which they reduced the bounds of their country, treated their allies so ill, that the French returned home, much disgusted with the country, and with the manners of its inhabitants. And the English, though they regretted the want of safety and leisure of their king, saw themselves for the future secured against any dangerous invasion from that quarter.

But it was so material an interest of the French to be possessed of the sea-port towns of the hands of the enemy, that they resolved to attempt it by some other expedient, and found no means so likely as an invasion of England itself. They collected a great fleet and army at Sluise; for the Flemings were now in alliance with the English; and being in this condition, several of the chief commanders of the English fleet and army were engaged in this enterprise: the English were kept in alarm; great preparations were made for the reception of the invaders; and though the dispersion of the French ships by a storm, and their being in many of them by the English, before the embarkation of the troops, freed the kingdom from the present danger, the king and council were fully sensible that this perilous situation might every moment return upon them. There were two circumstances, chiefly, which engaged the French at this time to think of such attempts. The one was the absence of the Duke of Lancaster, who had carried into Spain the flower of the English army, and was in possession of all the titles and claims to the crown of Castile, which he engaged in this enterprise; and so much promising success, he was finally disappointed: the other was, the violent dissensions and disorders which had taken place in the English government. The subjection in which Richard was held by his uncles, particularly by the Duke of Gloucester, a prince of ambition and genius, though it was not unsuitable to his years and slender capacity, was a extremely disagreeable to his violent temper; and he had at once attempted to shake off the yoke imposed upon him. Robert de Vere, Earl of Oxford, a young man of a noble family, of an agreeable figure, but of dissolute manners, had acquired an entire ascendancy over him, and governed him with an absolute authority. The king set so little bounds to his affections, that he first created his favourite Marquis of Dublin, a title before the highest in the land, to the Duke of Ireland; and transferred to him by patent, which was confirmed in parliament, the entire sovereignty for life of that island. He gave him in marriage his cousin-german, the daughter of Ingelram de Courcy, Earl of Bedford; but soon after he permitted him to marry the daughter of an English family, of an exceptionable character, and to marry a foreigner, a Bohemian, with whom he had become enamoured. These public declarations of attachment turned the attention of the whole nation, and disturbed the peace of the kingdom passed through his hands: access to the king could only be obtained by his mediation; and Richard seemed to take no pleasure in royal authority, but so far as it enabled him to lead with favours and titles and dignities this object of his affections.

Discontent of the barons.

The jealousy of power immediately produced an animosity between the munition and his creatures on the one hand, and the princes of the blood and chief nobility on the other; and the usual complaints against his excesses of cruelty and rapacity were soon renewed and greedily received, in every part of the kingdom.

Mowbray Earl of Nottingham, the Mareschal, Fitz-Alan Earl of Arundel, Fiery Earl of Northumberland, Montague, and other captains of the army, whose hands were all connected with each other, and with the princes, by friendship or alliance, and still more by their common antipathy to those who had eclipsed them in the king’s favour and confidence. No longer kept in awe by the personal character of the prince, they frowned to submit to his ministers: and the method which they took to redress the grievance complained of, well suited the violence of the age and proved the desperate extremity to which every opposition was sure to be instantly carried.

Michael de la Pole, the present chancellor, and lately created Earl of Suffolk, was the son of an eminent merchant; but had risen by his abilities and valour during the reign of Edward II., and was preferred to the seat of that monarch, and was esteemed the person of greatest experience and capacity among those who were attached to the Duke of Ireland and the king’s secret council. The late removal of such an intimate friend of Commons at his devotion, impelled them to exercise that power, which they seem first to have assumed against Lord Latimer, during the declining years of the late king; and an impeachment against the chancellor was carried up by them to the House of Peers, which was no less at his devotion. The king foresaw the tempest preparing against him and his ministers. After attempting to rouse the Londoners to his defence, he withdrew from parliament, and retired with his court to Elyham. The parliament sent a deputation, inviting him to return, and threatening that, if he persisted in absenting himself, they would immediately dissolve, and leave the nation, though at that time in imminent danger of a French invasion, without any support or supply for its defence. At the same time, a member was encouraged to call for the record containing the parliamentary deposition of Edward II.; a plain intimation of the fate which Richard, if he continued refractory, had reason to expect from them. The king, finding himself unable to resist, was content to stipulate that, except finishing the present impeachment, and removing the cause of the late attack, no attack should be made upon any other of his ministers; and on that condition he returned to the parliament.

Nothing can prove more fully the ins sufficiency of Suffolk, than the frivolities of the crimes which his enemies, in the present plenteitude of their power, thought proper to object against him. It was alleged that being chancellor, and obliged by his oath to consult the king’s profit, he had purchased lands of the crown below their true value: that he had exchanged with the king a perpetual annuity of 400 marks a year, which he inherited from his father, and which was assigned upon the customs of the port of Hull, for lands of an equal income; that having obtained for his son from the king a patent of marriage with a Frenchwoman, he was possessed by a Frenchman, an enemy, and a schematist, and a new prior being at the same time named by the Pope, he had refused to admit this person, whose title was not legal, till he made a composition with his son, and agreed to pay him a hundred pounds a year from the income of the benefice; that he had purchased from one Tudeman, of Lambourch, an old and forefeited annuity of fifty pounds a year upon the crown, and had engaged the king to admit that debt and that, when Lord of Suffolk, he had obtained a grant of five hundred pounds a year, to support the dignity of that title.

Even the proof of these articles, frivolous as they are, was found very sufficient upon the trial: it appeared that Suffolk had made to the crown while he was chancellor, and that all his bargains of that kind were made before he was advanced to that dignity. It is almost needless to add, that he was condemned notwithstanding the false of Suffolk was approved of by the office.

Gloucester and his associates observed their stipulation with the king, and attacked no more of his ministers: but they immediately attacked himself and his royal dignity, and framed a commission after the model of which had been attempted almost in every reign since that of Richard I., and which had always been attended with extreme confusion. By this commission, which was ratified by parliament, a council of four persons was appointed, all of Gloucester’s faction, except one, Archbishop of York: the sovereign power was transferred to these men for a twelvemonth: the king, who had now reached the twenty-first year of his age, was in reality deposed; the power of the royal person was suspended; though the term of the commission was limited, it was easy to foresee that the intentions of the party were to render it perpetual, and that power would with great difficulty be wrested from those who held the chief hands which were once committed. Richard, however, was obliged to submit: he signed the commission which violence had extorted from him; he took an oath never to infringe it; and though at the end of the session he publicly entered a protest, that the prerogatives of the crown, notwithstanding his late concession, should still be deemed entire and unimpaired, the new commissioners, without regarding this declaration, proceeded to the exercise of their authority.

The king, thus dispossessed of royal power, A.D. 1297, was soon sensible of the contempt into which civil commotions had fallen. His favourites and ministers, who were as yet allowed to remain about his person, failed not to aggravate the injury, which, without any detriment on his part, had been offered to him. And his eager temper was of itself sufficiently inclined to seek the revenge, both of recovering his authority, and of revenge, on those who had invaded it. As the House of Commons appeared now of weight in the constitution, he secretly tried some expedients for procuring a favourabe election; he sent for the returning officers, and engaging them at that time both the returning officers, and magistrates of great power in the counties, had naturally considerable influence in elections. But as most of them had been appointed by his uncles, either during his minority, or during the course of the present commission, he found them, in general, adverse to his enterprise. The sentiments and inclinations of the judges were more favourable to him. He met at Nottingham Sir Robert Tressilian, chief justice of the King’s Bench, Sir Robert Belknap, chief justice of the Common Pleas, Sir John Carew, chief barg of the Exchequer, Holt, Fulthorpe, and Bourg, inferior justices, and Lockton, serjeant-at-law; and he proposed to them some terms. He showed them the laws, with the influence of his authority, or of reason, made no scruple of answering in the way he was desired. They declared that the late commission was derogatory to the royalty and prerogative of the king; that those who procured it, or advised the king to consent to it, were punishable with death; that those who necessitated and compelled him were guilty of treason; that those were equally criminal who should perseverance in maintaining it; that the king had the right of dissolving parliaments at pleasure; that the parliament, while it sits, must first proceed upon the king's business; and that this assembly cannot, without his consent, impeach any of his ministers and judges. Every one of these points stands on its own rights; but the latter two, with regard to law and the royal prerogative, all these determinations, except the two last, appear justifiable: and as the great privileges of the Commons, particularly that of impeaching the king and his ministers, and supporting their proceedings in law, are not the object of the present statement, there are not plausible reasons to justify these opinions of the judges. They signed therefore their answer to the king's queries before the Archbishops of York and Dublin, the Bishops of Durham, Chichester, and Bangor, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and two other counselors of inferior quality.

The Duke of Gloucester and his adherents soon got intelligence of this secret consultation, and were naturally very much alarmed at it. They saw the king's intentions; and they determined to prevent the execution of them. As soon as he came to London, which they knew was very disposed to them, they secretly assembled their forces, and appeared in arms at Haringey park, near Highgate, with a power which Richard and his ministers were not able to resist. They sent him a message by the Archbishops of Canterbury, and the Lords Lovel, Cobham, and Devonshire, informing him that it was necessary to prevent his being reduced by their pernicious counsel, and were tractors both to him and to the kingdom, should be delivered up to them. A few days after they appeared in his presence, armed and in arms, with armed forces; and they accused, by name, the Archbishops of York, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, Sir Robert Tresilian, and Sir Nicholas Brembre, as public and dangerous enemies to the realm, and the subjects of the kingdom. They were all before the king, and freely offered to maintain the truth of their charge by duel. The persons accused, and all the other obstreperous ministers, had withdrawn or had concealed themselves.

The Duke of Ireland fled to Cheshire, and levied some forces, with which he advanced to relieve the king from the violence of the nobles. Gloucester encountered him in Oxfordshire with much superior forces, routed hastily dispersed his followers, and obliged him to fly into the Low Countries, where he died in exile a few years after.

A.D. 1388. The lords then appeared at London with an army of forty thousand men; and having obliged the king to summon a parliament, which were entirely at their devotion, they held full power, by observing a few legal forms, to take vengeance on all their enemies.

Population of the period.

Five great peers, men whose combined influence and abilities were able at any time to shake the king's government, the throne, the Duke of Gloucester, the king's uncle; the Earl of Derby, son of the Duke of Lancaster; the Earl of Arundel; the Earl of Warwick; and the Earl of Nottingham, Mareschal of England, entered before the parliament an accusation or appeal, as it was called, against the five counsellors whom they had already accused before the king. The parliament, who ought to have been judges, were not ashamed to impose an oath on all their members, by which they bound themselves to live and die with the appellees, and to defend them against all opposition with their lives and fortunes.

The other proceedings were well suited to the violence and iniquity of the times. A charge consisting of thirty-nine articles, was delivered in by the appellees; and, as none of the accused counsellors, except Sir Nicholas Brembre, was in custody, the rest were cited to appear; and upon their absenting themselves, the House of Peers, after a very short interval, without hearing a witness, without examining a fact, or deliberating on one point of law, declared that the actions and opinions of these counsellors with regard to law and the royal prerogative, all these determinations, except the two last, appear justifiable; and as the great privileges of the Commons, particularly that of impeaching the king and his associates, and that the king's person was afterwards detained in custody by rebels, many of the articles will appear, not only to imply no crime in the Duke of Ireland, and his adherents, but supported, which were laudable, and which they were bound by their allegiance to perform. The few articles impeaching the conduct of these ministers before that commission, which subverted the constitution, and annihilated all justice and legal action, were delivered in by the commons, and after crossing the king's favour, keeping his barons at a distance from him, obtaining unreasonable grants for themselves or their creatures, and dissipating the public treasure by useless expenditure, by any criminal and particular illegal act, either of any statute; and their administration may therefore be concluded to have been so far incompetent and ineffective. All the disorders indeed seemed to proceed from the character of those who had refused to follow the king in his own course, and the few who had ever adhered to him, and had attended his master from the earliest infancy of that prince, and had ever remained extremely attached to him: yet all these considerations could not save him from falling a victim to Gloucester's vengeance. This execution, more than all the others, made a deep impression on the mind of Richard: his queen too, (for he was already married to the sister of the Emperor Wenceslaus, King of Bohemia,) interested herself in behalf of Harley; she remained three hours on her knees before the Duke of Gloucester, pleading for that gentleman's life; but though she was became extremely popular by her amiable qualities, which had acquired her the appellation of the good Queen Anne, her petition was sternly rejected by the incorruptible tyrant.

The parliament concluded this violent scene, by a declaration that none of the articles, decided on these trials to be treason, should ever afterwards be drawn into precedent by the judges, who were still to consider the statutes and the practice of the House of Lords as the only rule of decisions. The House of Lords seem not, at that time, to have known or acknowledged the principle, that they themselves were bound, in their judicial capacity, to follow the rules which they, in conjunction with the king and Commons, had established in their legislature. 1 It was also enacted, that every one should swear to the perpetual maintenance and support of the forfeitures and attainted, and of all the other acts passed during this parliament. The Archbishop of Canterbury added the penalty of excommunication, as a further security to these violent transactions.

A. D. 1320.

It might naturally be expected, that the king, being reduced to such slavery by the combination of the princes and chief nobility, and having appeared so unable to defend his servants from the cruel effects of their resentment, would long remain in subjective exile; yet he continued in his power without the most violent struggles and convulsions: but the event proved contrary. In less than a twelvemonth, Richard, who was in his twenty-third year, declared in council, that he had been appointed by the king of Castile, and feudal overlord, to govern by his own authority his kingdom and household, to resolve to exercise his right of sovereignty; and when no one ventured to contradict so reasonable an intention, he deprived Fitz-Alan, Archbishop of Canterbury, of the dignity of chancellor, and bestowed that high office on William of Wickham, Bishop of Winchester; the Bishop of Hereford was displaced from the other offices which had been the personal property of the king; and, even the Duke of Gloucester and the Earl of Warwick were removed for a time from the council; and no opposition was made to these great changes. The history of this reign is imperfect, and little else is depended on; except where it is supported by public records: and it is not easy for us to assign the reason of this unexpected event. Perhaps some secret anxieties, naturally to be expected in the situation, had crept in among the great men, and had endeavoured to betray the king into the same errors. Perhaps the violence of their former proceedings had lost them the affections of the people, who soon repented of any cruel extremities to which they were carried by their leaders. Henry III. was now come to the full possession of the authority which he had resumed. He seemed to be entirely reconciled to his uncle and the other great men, of whom he had so much reason to complain: he never attempted to recall from banishment the Duke of Ireland, whom he found so obnoxious to them: he confirmed, by proclamation, the general pardon which the parliament had passed for all offences: and he courted the affections of the people, by voluntarily remitting some subsidies which had been granted him; a remarkable and almost singular instance of such generosity.

After this composure of domestic differences, and this restoration of the government to its natural state, there passes an interval of eight years, which affords not many remarkable events. The Duke of Lancaster returned from Spain; having resigned to his rival all pretensions to the crown of Castile, upon payment of a large sum of money, and having married his daughter, Philippa, to the King of Portugal. The authority of this prince served to cool the terribleness of that of the Duke of Gloucester, and secured the power of Richard, who paid great court to his eldest uncle, by whom he had never been offended, and whom he found more moderate in his temper than the voutier.

He made a cession to him for life of the lutchy of Guineo, 2 which the inclinations and changeable humour of the Gascons had restored to the English government; but as they remonstrated loudly against this deed, it was finally, with the Duke's consent, nullified. Richard suspended an incident, which produced a disension between Lancaster and his two brothers. After the death of the Spanish princess, he espoused Catherine Swinford, daughter of a private knight of Hainault, by whose death, he and Gloucester thought the dignity of their family much injured: but the king gratified his uncle, by passing in parliament a charter of legitimation to the children whom that lady had born him both marriage, and by creating the eldest Earl of Somerset.

The wars, meanwhile, which Richard bad inherited with his crown, still continued; though interrupted by frequent truces, according to the practice of that age, and conducted with little vigour, by reason of the weakness of all parties. The French war was scarcely heard of; the tranquillity of the northern borders was only interrupted by one inroad of the Scots, which proceeded more from the rivalry between the two great powers than from any national quarrel; a fierce battle or skirmish was fought at Otterborne, in which young Piercy, surnamed Bapogue, from his impetuous valour, was taken prisoner, and Piercy's eldest son, who was his heir, and John of Lancaster, was killed. 3 Some insurrections of the Irish obliged the king to make an expedition into that country, which he reduced to obedience; and he recovered, in some degree, by this enterprise, his character of conqueror, which had suffered a little by the inactivity of his reign. A. D. 1325.

At last, the English and French courts began to think in earnest of a lasting peace; but found it so difficult to adjust their differences of opinion, that they were content to establish a truce of twenty-five years. 4 Hereford and Cherbourg were restored, the former to the Duke of Brittany, the latter to the King of Navarre: both parties were left in possession of all the other places which they held at the time of concluding the truce: and to render the amity between the two crowns more durable, Richard, who was now a widower, was allied to Isabella, the daughter of Charles. 5 This princess was only seven years of age; but the king of Navarre, who had married her in order that he might fortify himself by this alliance against the enterprises of his uncles, and the incurable turbulence as well as inconstancy of his barons.

The administration of the king, though it was not, in this interval, sullied by any unpopular act, except the seizing of the charter of London, which was soon after restored, tended not much to corroborate his authority; and his personal character brought him into contempt, even while his public government appeared, in a good measure, unexceptionable. Indolent, profuse, addicted to low pleasures; he spent his whole time in feasting and pollity, and disrupted, in idle show, or in bounties to favourites of no reputation, that revenue which the people expected to see employed in enterprises directed to public honour and advantage. He forgot his rank by admiring all men to his familiarity; and he was not sensible that their acquaintance with the qualities of his mind was not able to impress them with the respect which he neglected to preserve from his birth and station. The Earls of Kent and Huntington, his half-brothers, were

1 In general, the parliament in these days never paid a proper regard to Edward's nature of treason. Though one of the most extraordinary laws for the subject that has ever been enacted. In the 17th of the King, the great business of the day was the trial and execution of the Bishops of Hereford and Lincoln, and some others among them, for alleged high treason: and the plea of the crown was nothing but the letter of a statute, by which the judges were not allowed to try their own causes. It is true, the statute is the subject of the question, but, on the other side, there was a great deal of reasoning that the parliament may judge of its own cause. Wherein, on the one hand, Tiberius, the emperor, was found guilty of treason, and on the other, they argued two texts, the one to the sheriff of York, and the other to the mayor of London, who was the executor of the law. For the sheriffs of the three towns were the executors of the law. And it is true, that the sense of the town of York was very strong against the king's French, on the mouth of January then coming. And the house of commons were altogether for the king, and on the last meeting in the end, they sent a petition with the key to excommunication; and all such as should receive him after the proclaimation, J. Cotton, p. 544. It is to be observed, that this extraordinary act was passed in a time of tranquillity. Though the advice of Edward III. was to persuade the parliament to declare any war which the king should undertake, as a war of justice, and not as a war of ambition, yet it is not to be supposed that this power was received in the House of Lords, or that it was granted without some discretion. At least, if such be the meaning of the statute, it may be observed that men were at this time very ignorant of the first principles of law and his chief confidants; and favourites; and though he never devoted himself to them with so profuse an affection as that with which he had formerly been attached to the Duke of Ireland, it was easy for men to see, that every grace passed through their hands, and that they formed an essential part of his government. The small regard which the public bore to his person, disposed them to murmur against his administration, and to receive, with greedy ears, every complaint which the discontented on either side suggested to their fancy.

A.D. 1397. Gloucester saw that this dissolution conduct gave him; and finding that both resentment and jealousy on the Duke of York's part, and the prudent step of his nephew, had prevented him from acquiring any ascendancy over that prince, he determined to cultivate his popularity with the nation, and to revenge himself on those who eclipsed him in favour and authority. He seldom appeared at court or in council; he never declared his opinion but in order to disapprove of the measures embraced by the king and his favourites; and he courted the friendship of every man whom disposition or private resentment had rendered an enemy to the administration. The long truce with France was unpopular with the English, who breathed nothing but war against that hostile nation; and Gloucester took care to encourage and popularise York's ideas, which tracked that spirit throughout the resentments which attended the English arms during the later years of Edward, he made a musing comparison between the glories of that reign and the inactivity of the present, and he lamented the fact that the nation had been deprived of so much from his father's and his grandfather's distinguished. The military men were inflamed with a desire of war, when they heard him talk of the signal victories formerly obtained, and of the easy prey which might be made of French riches by the superior valour of the English: the populace readily embraced the same sentiments; and all men exclaimed that this prince, whose conduct had been so much neglected, was the English honour, and alone able to raise the nation to its former power and splendour. His great abilities, his popular manners, his princely extraction, his immense riches, his high office of constable; all these advantages, not a little assisted by his want of court-favour, gave him a mighty authority in the kingdom, and rendered him formidable to Richard and his ministers.

From this a contemporary writer, and a very impartial, but what was ultimately preferred by his want of exactness in material facts, ascribes to the Duke of Gloucester more desperate views, and such as were totally incompatible with the government and domestic tranquillity of the kingdom. According to that historian, his nephew, Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, whom Richard had declared his successor, to give him immediate possession of the throne, by the deposition of a prince so unworthy of power and authority; and when Mortimer had declined the project, he resolved to make a partition of the kingdom between himself, his two brothers, and the Earl of Arundel; and entirely to dispossess Richard of the crown. The king, it is said, being informed of these designs, saw that either his own ruin, or that of Gloucester, was inevitable; and he resolved, by a hasty blow, to prevent the execution of such destructive projects. This is certain, that Gloucester, by his own confession, had but one appeal to speak contemptuously of the king's person and government; had deliberated concerning the lawfulness of throwing off allegiance to him; and had even borne part in a secret conference, where his deposition was proposed, and talked of, and determined: but it is reasonable to think, that his schemes were not so far advanced as to make him resolve on putting them immediately in execution. The danger, probably, was still too distant to render a desperate remedy entirely unnecessary to the security of government. But the public opinion we may form of the mind of Richard, from Gloucester's conspiracies, his aversion to the French truce and alliance was public and avowed; and that court, which had now a great influence over the king, pushed him to overrule his own safety in the choice of so judicious a design of his uncle. The resentment against his former acts of violence revived; the sense of his refractory and uncompliant behaviour was still recent; and a man, whose ambition rendered him incapable of any such premeditated, and who had murdered all the faithful servants of the king, was thought capable, on a favourable opportunity, of renewing the same criminal enterprises. The king's precipitate temper admitted of no deliberation; he ordered Gloucester to be unexpectedly arrested; to be hurled on board a ship which was lying in the river; and to be carried to Calais, where alone, by reason of his numerous partisans, he could safely be detained in custody. The Earls of Arundel and Warwick were seized at the same time: the malcontents, so suddenly deprived of their leaders, were astonished and overawed; and the concurrence of the Dukes of York and Lancaster, which preceded, with the Earls of Derby and Rutland, the old foes of these princes, beseized them of all possibility of resistance. A parliament was immediately summoned at Westminster; and the king doubted not to find his will in the will of the people, very compliant with his will. This House, had, in a former parliament, given him very sensible proofs of their attachment; and the present suppression of Gloucester's party made him still more assured of a favourable election. As a further expedient for that purpose, he is also said to have employed the influence of the sheriffs; a practice which, though not unusual, gave umbrage, but which the established authority of a parliament, once this premeditated and more familiar to the nation. Accordingly the parliament passed whatever acts the king was pleased to dictate to them: they annulled for ever the commission which usurped upon the royal authority; and they declared it treasonable to attempt, in any future period, the revival of any such similar commission; they abrogated all the acts which attainted the king's ministers, and which that parliament wise passed them, and the whole nation, had sworn to maintain; a general pardon then granted to be invalid, as extorted by force, and never ratified by the free consent of the king. Though Richard, after he resumed the government, and lay no claim to the kingdom, he was permitted to propose in parliament, confirmed that general indemnity; this circumstance seemed not, in their eyes, to merit any considerations. Even a particular pardon, granted six years after to the Earl of Arundel, was annulled by parliament, on the evidence that it had been procured by surprise, and that the king was not then fully apprised of the degree of guilt incurred by that nothman.

The Commons then preferred an impeachment against Fis-Alan, Archbishop of Canterbury, and brother to Arundel, and accused him for his concurrence in procuring the illegal commission, and in attaining the king's ministers. The principal accusation, had already been published in the ecclesiastical privileges, the king was satisfied with a sentence, which banished him the kingdom, and sequestered his temporalities. An appeal or accusation was presented against the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earls of the state of the nation were voted: In which, among other things, the House recommended the king to the king; and for that purpose declared that the court should not be so much frequented as formerly by bishops and lords. The king was afterwards prevailed on. John Wick- Rickhill, who brought it over from Calais, was tried on that account, and acquitted; but his acquittal, notwithstanding his innocence, may even appear favourable to the accusation. In the same year Cotesworth was hanged.

From the main points in the article: By the preceding passage the Commons had shown a disposition very contrary to the king; for that party, before the Commons declared their views, had been supported by the king, and the latter's policy, which did not correspond with the Commons, was only sustained by the former. of Arundel and Warwick, by the Earls of Rutland, Kent, Huntingdon, Somerset, Salisbury, and Nottingham, together with the Lords Spencer and Scrope, and they were accused of the same crimes which had been imputed to the archbishops, as well as of their appearance against the king, in a hostile manner, at Haringay park. The Earl of Arundel, who was brought to the bar, wisely confined all his defence to the pleading of both the general and particular pardon of the king; but he was condemned and executed. The Earl of Warwick, who was also convicted of high treason, was, on account of his submissive behaviour, pardoned as to his life, but doomed to perpetual banishment in the isle of Man. No new trial was granted against his adherents; but the king proved his intention in the destruction of their heads, by a warrant to the fiscal to proceed with the indicted persons; and he was conducted to the place of execution, and there hanged. The only crimes, for which they were condemned, were the old attempts against the crown, which seemed to be obliterated, both by the distance of time and by repeated pardons. The reasons of this method of proceeding it is difficult to conjecture. The recent conspi- racies of Gloucester seem certain from his own confession: but, perhaps, the king and his ministry had not at that time in his hands many satisfactory proofs of their reality; perhaps, it was difficult to convict Arundel and Warwick of any participation in them; perhaps, an inquiry into these conspiracies would have involved in the guilt some of those great lords who object to the crown, and, consequently, whom it was necessary to cover from all imputation; or, perhaps, the king, according to the genius of the age, was indifferent about maintaining even the appearance of law and equity, when the end was to extirpate the persons and heads of that party, a misunderstanding broke out among those noblemen who had joined in the prosecution; and the king wanted either authority sufficient to appease it, or foresight to prevent it. The Duke of Hereford appeared in court accused of the Duke of Norfolk in having spoken to him, in private, many slanderous words of the king, and of having imputed to that prince an intention of subverting and destroying many of his principal subjects. But the king employed the public prosecutor to prove this as a negligence or delusion, and offered to prove his own innocence by duel. The challenge was accepted; the time and place of combat were appointed; and as the event of this important trial by arms might require the interposition of legislative authority, the parliament thought it more suitable to delegate their power to a committee, than to prolong the session beyond the usual time which custom and general convenience had prescribed to it.

The Duke of Hereford was certainly very little delicate in the point of honour, when he revealed a private conversation to the run of the person who had intrusted him; and we may infer that he was as well disposed to the Duke of Norfolk's denials, than the other's averments. But Norfolk had in these transactions betrayed an equal neglect of honour, which brings him entirely on a level with his antagonist. Though he had publicly joined with the Duke of Gloucester and his party in all the former acts of violence against the king; and his name stands among the appellants who accused the Duke of Ireland and the other ministers: yet was he not ashamed publicly to impute his former associates for the very crimes which he had concurred with them in committing; and his name increases the list of those appellants who brought them to a trial. Such were the principles and practices of those ancient knights and barons during the prevalence of the aristocratical government, and the reign of chivalry.

The lists for this decision of truth and right were appointed at Coventry before the king: all the nobility of England bands together; and, as was the case of one duke or the other: the whole nation was held in suspense with regard to the event: but when the two champions appeared in the field, accorded for the combat, the king interposed, to prevent both the present effusion of such noble blood, and the future consequences of quarrel. By the advice and authority of the parliamentary commissioners he stopped the duel; and to show his im timacy, he ordered, by the same authority, both the combatants to leave the kingdom;

He was connected with the Duke of Gloucester, a principal nobility of the realm; and as the injury done him by the king might in its consequences affect all of them, he easily brought them, by a sense of common interest, to take part in his resentment. The people, who must have an object they could love or revere, and who were even disgusted bishop of Canterbury, and the young Earl of Arundel, for the purpose of that, he landed at Havre on the

and was immediately joined by the Earl of Northumber land and Westmorland, two of the most potent barons in England. Here he took a solemn oath, that he had no other purpose in this invasion, than to recover the dukedom of Lancaster, unjustly detained from him; and he invited all his friends in England, and all lovers of their country, to second him in this reasonable and moderate pretension.

Every place was in commotion; the malcontents in all quarters flew to arms; London discovered the strongest symptoms of its disposition to mutiny and rebellion; and

Henry's army, increasing on every day's march, soon amounted to the number of 60,000 combatants.

The Duke, therefore, very readily a message from Henry, who entreated him not to oppose a loyal and humble petition in the recovery of his legal patrimony; and the guardian even declared publicly that he would second his nephew in so reasonable a request. His army embarked with consolations the same voyage; and the Duke of Lancaster, reinforced by them, was now entirely independent. He hastened to Bristol, in which some of the king's ministers had thrown themselves; and soon obliged that place to surrender, he proceeded to the popular cities, and without giving them a trial, ordered the Earl of Waltheof, Sir John Bussey, and Sir Henry Green, whom he there took prisoners, to be led to immediate execution.

The king, recovering intelligence of this invasion and insurrection, hastened from France and landed at

Milford Haven with a body of 20,000 men; but even this army, so much inferior to the enemy, was either overawed by the general combination of the kingdom, or seized with the same partial policy which had alienated his people. He seized, till he found that he had not above 6000 men who followed his standard. It appeared, therefore, neces sary to retire secretly from this small body, which served to the Duke, after his departure, as a means of delivering the island of Anglesey, where he proposed to embark either for Ireland or France, and there await the favourable oppor

but the duke prudently de ferring a trial, and landed at Dover, he could not fail to proceed to those extremities. For this purpose, he issued writs of election in the king's name, and appointed the immediate meeting of a parliament at Westminster.

Such of the peers as were most devoted to the king, were either fled or imprisoned; and no opponents, even among the barons, dared to appear against Henry, amidst that scene of outrage and violence, which commonly attends revolutions, especially so in England during those tumultuous ages. It is also easy to imagine, that a House of Commons, elected during this universal ferment, and thus triumph of the Lancastrian party, would be extremely attached to that cause, and ready to act against every suggestion, which, whether it could have a remote tendency to settling their affairs, being as of little weight to stem the torrent, was always carried along with it, and served only to increase the violence, which the public interest required it should endeavour to control. The conduct of Henry, therefore, may, we may observe, that a law, in the 13 Edw. I, had been enacted against the peers for any change having afterwards appeared from experience, the Commons, in and inquisitorial, and violent, than usual, or were only laid hold of and exaggerated by the faction to which the weakness of his reign had given birth, we are not able, at this distance, to determine with certainty. There is, however, one circumstance in which his conduct is visibly different from that of his grandfather: he is not accused of having imposed one arbitrary tax, without consent of parliament, during his whole reign; scarcely a year passed Edward the reign in which the Commons did not make complaints with regard to this dangerous exaction of authority. But perhaps the ascendant which Edward had acquired over the people, together with his great prudence, enabled him to make a use very advantageous to his subjects of this and other rare prerogatives: and reduced them a smaller grievance to his hands, than a less absolute authority in those of his grandson. This is a point which it would be rash for us to decide positively on either side; but it is certain, that a charge, drawn up by the Duke of Lancaster, and assented to by a parliament situated in those circumstances, forms no manner of presumption with regard to the unusual irregularity or violence of the king's conduct in this particular.

When the charge against Richard was presented to the parliament, though it was liable almost in every article to objections, it was not canvased, nor examined, nor disapproved in either of the two sessions that were held universal approbation. One man alone, the Bishop of Carlisle, had the courage, amidst this general disloyalty and violence, to appear in defence of his unhappy master, and to plead his cause against all the power of the presiding party. That such commendable virtuous prelate may seem to favour too much the doctrine of passive obedience, and to make too large a sacrifice of the rights of mankind, he was naturally pushed into that extreme by his admiration of the present government; its authority and constitution, in many of its circumstances, was fully supported by authority of parliament, and was but a copy of the violence which the princes and barons themselves, during their former triumph, had exercised against him and his party. The detestation of Lancaster's estate, was properly speaking, a revocation, by parliamentary authority, of a grace which the king himself had formerly granted him. The murder of Gloucester (the secret execution, however merited, of that prince no more sanctified a private deed, formed not any precedent, and implied not any usurped or arbitrary power of the crown, which could justly give magnitude to the people. It really proceeded, not from the king's manner of acting different from that of his ambition; and proved, that instead of being dangerous to the constitution, he possessed not even the authority necessary for the execution of the laws.

Concerning the second accusation, as it mostly consists of general facts, was framed by Richard's inverte enemies, and was never allowed to be answered by him or his friends, it is more difficult to form a judgment. The greater part of these grievances, imputed to Richard, seems to be the exertion of arbitrary prerogatives; such as the dispensing power, levying purveyances, employing the marshal's power to extort sums, granting protections from law; all of which are prerogatives, and on which when once declined, or, from his, had not himself imposed any arbitrary taxes; even the former two, in Richard's time, were, in a certain manner, the result of the present state; and that these two, after that they were imposed illegally, or by arbitrary will.

We learn from Cotes, p. 609, that Becket, by his chancellor, told the Commons, that they gave formerly power to him, and namely the power to change them with others, and afterwards, to which he was bound to make no change; and that it was granted that they dealt freely with the commons, and not to make laws for the future; which was a very proper thing, and which he desired that the Commons should know. It is certain, that Richard, by his chancellor, obtained a charter to lease the law, and that he was not granted any arbitrary taxes; even the latter, after that they were imposed illegally, or by arbitrary will.

But while Richard was furnishing the means of change having afterwards appeared from experience, the Commons, in the twentieth of this king, applied by petition that the sheriffs might be continued; though that petition had not been enacted into a statute, by reason of other disagreeing placards, which attended it. See Litt., p. 732. It was certainly a very moderate exercise of the dispensing power in the king to continue for some time the sheriffs, which were not acceptable to his subjects, and had been applied for by one House of parliament; yet it is made an act of change against him by the present parliament. See art. 98. It is styled, speaking of a period early in Richard's reign, that it was by the authority of the privy council, and by a mandamus to that effect; that the king, by the advice of the privy council, had made an order in order to alter the salaries of the sheriffs; and that the commission had been ordained in parliament. If Richard, therefore exercised the dispensing power, and a mandamus to that effect, he was a party to the change, and indeed of all his predecessors from the time of Henry I, inclusively.

on the throne: and the people had an opportunity, by their legal obedience to him, of making atonement for the violence which they had committed against his predecessor. That a descendant of Lionel Duke of Clarence, the elder brother of the late Duke of Lancaster, had been declared in his will to succeed to the crown if the aged king had left children, and that their title, however it might be overpowered by present force and faction, could never be obliterated from the minds of the people. That if the turbulent dispositions of the town had not restrained the word of the established throne of so good a prince as Richard; what bloody commotions must ensue, when the same cause was united to the motive of restoring the legal and undoubted heir to his succession! That new governments, intended to be established, would stand on no principle; and would scarcely retain any pretence by which it could challenge the obedience of men of sense and virtue. That the claim of Lineal descent was so gross as scarcely to deserve the most ignorant of the populace; conquest could never be pleaded by a rebel against his sovereign: the consent of the people had no authority in a monarchy not derived from consent, but established by hereditary right; and however the nation might be justified in deposing the misguided Richard, it could never have any reason for setting aside his lawful heir and successor, who was plainly innocent. And that the Duke of Lancaster would give them back the whole of the legal monarchical which might be expected from his future government, if he added to the crime of his past rebellion, the guilt of excluding the family, which, both by right of blood, and by declaration of his predecessor, had, in case of Richard's demise or voluntary resignation, been received as the undoubted heirs of the monarchy. All the circumstances of this event, compared to those which attended the last revolution, shew the great difference between a great and civilized nation, deliberately vindicating its established privileges, and a turbulent and barbarous anarchy, plunging headlong from their own destruction. All the scenes of another. All the events of 1269, and 1740, the noble freedom of the Bishop of Carlisle, instead of being applauded, was not so much as tolerated: he was immediately arrested by order of the Duke of Lancaster, and sent a prisoner to the Tower. Not for the debate was attempted: thirty-three long articles of charge were, in one meeting, voted against Richard; and voted unanimously by the same peers and prelates who, a little before, had voluntarily and unanimously authorized those very acts of violence which they now complained. That prince was deposed by the suffrages of both Houses; and the throne being now vacant, the Duke of Lancaster stepped forth, and having crossed himself on the forehead and arms, and called upon the name of Christ, he pronounced these words, which we shall give in the original language, because of their singularity:

In the name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I Henry of Lancaster challenge this revoc of England, and the crown, with all the members, and the appurtenances; as I am descendit by right line of the blood, coming fro the gude king Henry therc, and throg that right that God of his grace hath sent me, with help of kyng, and of my frindes to recver it; the whiche revoc was in poeet to be ondowe by defavt of governacne, and ondouyng of the gude laces.

In order to understand this speech, it must be observed, that there was a silly story, received among some of the lowest vulgar, that Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, son of Henry the 3d, was really the elder brother of Edward 1; but that by reason of some deformity in his person, he had been posthumously in the succession, and his younger brother imposed on the nation in his stead. As the present Duke of Lancaster inherited from Edmund by his mother, this genealogy made him the true heir of the monarchy; and it is therefore insinuated in Henry's speech: but the absurdity was too gross to be openly avowed either by him or by the parliament. The case is the same with regard to his right of conquest: he was a body was exposed in public, and that on marks of violence were observed upon it. He died in the thirty-fourth year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign. He left no posterity, either legitimate or illegitimate.

All the writers who have transmitted to us the history of Richard, lived during the reigns of Lancastrian princes; and candour requires, that we should not give entire credit to the reproaches which they have thrown upon his memory. But, after making all proper allowances, he still appears to have been a weak prince, and unfit for government, less for want of natural parts and capacity, than of solid judgment and a good education. He was violent in his temper; profuse in his expenditures; prone to indolence; and addicted to the pleasures of dissipation. The manners, indeed, of the age were the chief source of such violence: laws, which were feebly executed in peaceable times, lost all their authority during public convulsions: both parties were alike guilty: or if any difference did exist, it was that the people sought to establish the authority of the crown, being more legally, was commonly carried, when it prevailed, to less desperate extremities than was that of the aristocracy.

On comparing the conduct and events of this reign with those of the preceding, we shall find equal reason to admire Edward, and to blame Richard; but the circumstance of opposition, surely, will not lie in the strict regard paid by the former to national privileges, and the neglect of them by the latter. On the contrary, the prince of small abilities, as he felt his want of power, seems to have been more moderate in this respect than the other. Every parliament assembled during the reign of Edward, remonstrated against the ecclesiastical antiquities and innovations of his successors or others: we hear not any complaints of that kind during the reign of Richard, till the assembling of his last parliament, which was summoned by his inveterate enemies, which was composed of men who were in the interest of the doctrine of the reformed church, and at the time of the most furious convulsions, and whose testimony must therefore have, on that account, much less authority with every equitable judge. Both these princes experienced the encroachments of the great upon their authority. Edward, reduced to necessities, was obliged to make an express bargain with his parliament, and sell some of his prerogatives for present supply; but as they were acquainted with his genius and capacity, they ventured not to demand any exorbitant concessions, or such as were incompatible with regal and sovereign power: the weakness of Richard tempted the parliament to extort a commission, which, in a manner, determined the prince, and transferred the sceptre into the hands of the nobility. The events of these encroachments were also suitable to the character of each. Edward had no sooner gotten the supply, than he departed from the engagement which had induced the parliament to grant it; he openly told his people, that he had but dissolved

3 Introductory to his history of the reigns of Edward's Abolishment, p. 106. shows a strange prejudice against the church and churchmen. The Commons afterwards repented of this, and the parliament, and making their apology, threatened some good words against the king's person, so he housed, in all his course, twenty men in his bedchamber, seven in the chamber, and twenty others were ready to put, and nothing appeared against the Commons, and that it should shortly de-

6 It is the maxim of the school, in order to prove a man's guilt, his innocence must be shown. He was led at a distance from the court, his insolence increased, and his proof imperfect; but in these respects the publick, and the majority of the sacred college were Frenchmen, this circumstance naturally biased the judgment of the Frenchmen, and the sentence of the court against the English clergy could not be accounted for from that cause.

8 J. Dymond, p. 606. "He treated all with a mixture of severity and humanity; his corrections were, in the latter part of this reign, in the bosom of his subjects, and his last was most tenderly felt in the bosom of his subjects, and his last was most tenderly felt ected him before his tribunal; but the reformer had now acquired powerful protectors, who screened him from the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The Duke of Lancaster, who then governed the kingdom, encouraged the principles of Wickliffe; and he made no scruple, as well as Lord Percy, the Mareschal, to appear openly in court with him, in order to give him countenance upon his trial: he even insisted that Wickliffe should sit in the bishop's presence, while his principality was enlarged. Countess-冈terex, under the insult: the Londoners, thinking their prelate affronted, attacked the duke and mareschal, who escaped from their hands with some difficulty. And the populace, soon after, broke into the houses of bishops that had adhered to the prelates, and plundered their goods. The Bishop of London had the merit of appeasing their fury and resentment.

The Duke of Lancaster, however, still continued his protection to Wickliffe during the minority of Richard; and the principles of that reformer had so far propagated themselves, that, when the Pope sent to Oxford a new bull against these doctrines, the university deliberated for some time, whether they should receive the bull; and they never took any vigorous measures in consequence of the papal orders. Even the populace of London were at length brought to entertain favourable sentiments of this reformer: when the Papal bull was received at Lambeth, they broke into the assembly, and so overawed the prelates, who found both the people and the court against them, that they dismissed him without any further censure.

The clergy, we may well believe, were more willing in particular to meet the Prebendaries than to publish heresy, which struck at all their credit, possessions, and authority. But there was hitherto no law in England by which the secular arm was authorized to support orthodoxy; and the ecclesiastics were forced to supply the defect by extraordinary and unwarrantable artifices. In the year 1381, there was an act passed, requiring sheriffs to apprehend the preachers of heresy and their abettors; but this statute had, before the year 1385, expired. The prelates, and by them the monks, had the formality of an enactment without the consent of the Commons. In the subsequent session, the lower House complained of the fraud; affirmed that they had no intention to bind the realm, but only to prosecute the prelates further than their ancestors had done before them; and required that the pretended statute should be repealed; which was done accordingly. But it is remarkable, that, notwithstanding this vigilance of the Commons, the clergy had so much art and influence, that the repeal was superseded; and this act, which never had any legal authority, remains to this day upon the statute book: though the clergy still thought proper to keep it in reserve, and not proceed to the immediate execution of it.

But, besides this defect of power in the church, which saved Wickliffe, that reformer himself, notwithstanding his enthusiasm, seems not to have been actuated by the spirit of martyrdom; and, in all subsequent trials before the prelates, he so explained away his doctrine by tortured meanings, as to render it quite innocent and inoffensive. Most of his followers imitated his cautious disposition, and saved themselves either by recantations or explanations. He died of a pulse, in the year 1385, at his retory at Lutterworth, in the county of Leicester; and the clergy, mortified that he should have escaped their vengeance, took care, besides accusing the people of his sedition, to last his latest distress, with a visible judgment of heaven upon him for his multiplied heresies and impurities.

The prelates, however, of Wickliffe's opinion still continued in England; some monkish writers represent one-half of the kingdom as infected by those principles: they were carried over to Bohemia by some youth of that nation, who studied at Oxford; but though the age seemed strongly disposed to receive them, they were not yet fully ripe for this great revolution; and the finishing blow to ecclesiastical power was reserved to a period of more curious literature, literature, and inclination for novelty.

Meanwhile the English parliament continued to check the clergy and the court of Rome by more sober and more legal expedients. They enacted anew the statute of prœtorum, and affixed higher penalties to the transmission of it, which, in some instances, was even made capital. The court of Rome had fallen upon a new device, which increased their authority over the prelates: the Pope, who found that the expedient of arbitrarily depriving them was too violent, introduced a more gentle one; the non-薪liciting of such as they were too obnoxious to poorer sees, and even to nominal sees, in partibus infidelium. It was thus that the Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of Durham and Rochester, had the king's consent to the making a new dispensation to the church, which was treated after the prevale of Gloucester's faction: the Bishop of Carlisle met with the same fate after the accession of Henry IV. For the Pope always joined with the prevailing powers when they did not thwart his pretensions. The parliament, in the reign of Richard, enacted a law against this abuse: and the king made a general remonstrance to the court of Rome, against all those usurpations which he calls horribles causes of that court.

It was usual for the church that they might elude the mortmain act, to make their territories leave hands in trust to certain persons, under whose name the clergy enjoyed the benefit of the bequest; the parliament also stopped this practice. But a new expedient was resorted to, by which the Commons prayed, that remedy might be had against such religious persons as cause their vassals to marry free women irreconcilable, whereby the estate comes to those religious hands by collateral succession, which was a new development of the law of primogeniture.

The papacy was, at this time, somewhat weakened by a scism, which lasted during forty years, and gave great scandal to the devout partisans of the holy see. After the Pope had reigned many years at Avignon, Gregory XI. was persuaded to give way to a recommendation of his, by which happened in 1380, the Romans, resolve to fix, for the future, the seat of the papacy to Italy, besieged the cardinals in the conclave, and compelled them, though they were not yet elected to the see, to accept the position into that high dignity. The French cardinals, as soon as they recovered their liberty, fled from Rome, and protesting against the forced election, chose Robert, son of the Count of Genoa, to whom the name of Clement V. was given, and resided at Avignon. All the kingdoms of Christendom, according to their several interests and inclinations, were divided between these two pontiffs. The court of France adhered to the latter, and was followed by the King of Castle, and the King of Scotland: England, of course, was thrown into the other party, and declared for Urban. Thus the appallance of Clementines and Urbanists distressed Europe for several years; and each party blamed the other for the schism, which was afterwards esteemed a signal advantage of Christ. But this circumstance, though it weakned the papal authority, had not so great an effect as might naturally be expected. Though any king could easily at first make his kingdom embrace the party of one Pope or the other, or even keep it some time in suspense between them, he could not so easily transfer his obedience at pleasure: the people attached themselves to their own party, as to a religious opinion; and conceived an extreme abhorrence to the opposite party, whom they regarded as little better than Saracens or infidels. Crusades were ever undertaken in this quarrell; and the zealous Bishop of Norwich, in particular, was so heated, that he erected himself into Flanders against the Clementines; but after losing a great part of his followers, he returned with disgrace into England. Each Pope, sensible, from this prevailing spirit among the people, that the kingdom which once embraced his cause would always adhere to him, boldly maintained all the pretensions of his see, and stood not much more in awe of the temporal sovereigns, than if his authority had not been endangered by a rival.

We come now to the very beginning of this reign: * Whereas divers persons of small garrison of land or other possessions, do make great retinue of people, as well of esquires as of others, in many parts of the realm, giving to them hats and other livery of one suit by year, taking again towards them the value of the same livery, or percase the double value, by such covenant and assurance that every of them shall maintain other in all quarrels, be they reasonable or unreasonable, to the great maintenance and oppression of the people, &c.

This preamble contains a true picture of the state of the kingdom. The laws had been so feebly executed, even during the long, active, and vigilant reign of Edward III. that no subject could . . . themselves, under the patronage of some great baron, for their mutual defense. They were public badges, by which their confederacy was distinguished.

These supported each other in all quarrels, inequities, extortions, murders, robberies, and other crimes. Their chief was more their sovereign than the king himself; and their own band was more connected with them than their country. Hence the perpetual turbulence, disorders, factions, and civil wars of those times; hence the small regard paid to a character or the opinion of the public: hence the large discretionary prerogatives of the crown, and the danger which might have ensued from the too great limitation of them. If the king had possessed no arbitrary powers, while all the nobles assumed and exercised them, there must have ensued an absolute anarchy in the state.

One great mischief attending these confederacies, was the frequent pillage and pursuit of the king parsons for the most enormous crimes. The parliament often endeavoured, in the last reign, to deprive the prince of this prerogative; but in the present, they were content with an abridgment of it. They enacted, that pardon for rapes or for murder from malice prepense should be held unjust, unless done were particularly specified in it. 1 There were also some other circumstances required for passing any pardon of this kind; an excellent law, but ill observed, like most laws that thwart the manners of the people, and the prevailing customs of the times.

It is easy to observe, from these voluntary associations among the people, that the whole force of the feudal system was in a manner divided from that of the people; for which English had nearly returned, in that particular, to the same situation in which they stood before the Norman conquest. It was, indeed, impossible that that system could long subsist under the perpetual revolutions to which landed property is everywhere subject. When the great feudal baronies were first erected, the lord lived in opulence in the midst of his vassals: he was in a situation to protect and cherish and defend them: the quality of patron naturally united itself to that of landlord and protected the persons of authority mutually supported each other. But when, by the various divisions and mixtures of property, a man's superiors came to live at a distance from him, and could no longer give him shelter or countenance; the tie gradually became more fictitious than real; new connections from viciny or other causes were formed; protection was sought by voluntary services and attachment; the appearance of valour, spirit, abilities, in any great man, extended his interest very far; and if the sovereign were deficient in these qualities, he was no less, if not more, exposed to the usurpations of the aristocracy, than even during the vigour of the feudal system.

The greatest novelty introduced into the civil government during this reign was the creation of peers by patent. Lord Beauchamp of Holte was the first peer that was advanced to the House of Lords in this manner. The practice of giving benedictions is also first mentioned in the present reign. This prince lived in a more magnificent manner than perhaps any of his predecessors or successors. His household consisted of 10,000 persons; he had 300 in his kitchen; and all the other offices were furnished in proportion. 2 It must be remarked, that this enormous train had tables supplied them at the king's expense, according to the former from the king. Such prodigality cost probably the source of many exactions by purveyors, and was one chief reason of the public discontents.

bury and Lord Lumley, for raising an insurrection, and for seizing the king's person at Windsor; but the treachery of Rutland gave him warning of the danger. He suddenly withdrew to London; and the conspirators, who came to Windsor with a body of 360 horse, found that they had missed this blow, on which all their plans of raising their followers in the several counties which were the seat of their interest. But the adherents of the king were hot in the pursuit, and every where opposed themselves to their progress: and he and his party withdrew to the castle of Carisbrooke, at the citizens, and were next day beheaded without further ceremony, according to the custom of the times. The citizens of Bristol treated Spencer and Lumley in the same manner. The Earl of Huntingdon, Sir Thomas Blount, and Sir Benedict Sely, who were also taken prisoners, suffered death with many others of the conspirators, by orders from Henry. And when the quarters of these unhappy men were brought to London, no less than eighteen bishops and thirty-two minor abbots joined the populace, and met them with the most indecent marks of joy and exultation.

But the spectacle the most shocking to every one who regarded with the least element of human pity, was that remained. The Earl of Rutland appeared, carrying on a pole the head of Lord Spencer, his brother-in-law, which he presented in triumph to Henry, as a testimony of his loyalty to the commonwealth, whom he had seen after Duke of York by the death of his father, and first prince of the blood, had been instrumental in the murder of his uncle, the Duke of Gloucester; he had then deserted Richard, by whom he was trusted, had conquered against the life of Henry, to whom he had sworn allegiance; had betrayed his associates, whom he had seduced into this enterprise; and now displayed, in the face of the world, these badges of his multiplied dishonour.

The insurrection of these conspirators might seem to give security to his throne, the animosities which remain after such bloody scenes, are always dangerous to royal authority; and he therefore determined not to increase, by any hazardous enterprise, those numerous enemies with whom he was every where environed. While a subject, he was believed to have strongly imbued all the principles of his father, the Duke of Lancaster, and to have adopted the principles which the Lollards inspired against the abuses of the established church; but, finding himself possessed of the throne by so preposterous a title, he thought superstition a necessary implement of public authority; and in order to every expedient to pay court to the clergy. There were but few no penal laws enacted against heresy; an indulgence which had proceeded, not from a spirit of toleration in the Romish church, but from the ignorance and simplicity of the people, which had rendered them unfit either for starting or receiving any new or curious doctrines, and which needed not to be restrained by rigorous penalties. But when the learning and genius of Wycliffe had once broken, in some measure, the fetters of prejudice, the ecclesiastics called aloud for the punishment of his disciples; and the king, who was very little scrupulous in his conduct, was easily induced to sacrifice his principles to his interest, and to acquire the favour of the church by that most effectual method, the gratifying of their vengeance against opponents. He engaged the parliament to pass a law for that purpose: it was enacted, that when any heretic, who relapsed, or refused to abjure his opinions, was delivered over to the secular arm by the bishop or his scriveners, he should be committed to the flames by the civil magistrate before the whole people. This weapon did not long remain unemployed in the hands of one: William Sauer, rector of St. Osmund's in London, had been convicted of heresy by the convocation of Canterbury; his sentence was ratified by the House of Peers; the king issued his writ for the execution of the unhappy man stoned for his erroneous opinions by the penalty of fire. This is the first instance of that kind in England; and thus one horror more was added to those dismal scenes which at that time were already too familiar to the state.

But the utmost precaution and prudence of Henry could not shield him from those numerous inquests which assailed him from every quarter. The confessions of Richard of York once made that court exert its activity to recover his authority, or revenge his death; but though the confessions in England tempered the French to engage in some enterprise by which they might do him honour and revenge the death of their king, which they experienced at home obliged them quickly to accommodate matters; and Charles, content with recovering his daughter from Henry's hands, laid aside his preparations, and renewed the truce between the kingdoms. The attack of Guise was also an inviting attempt, which the present faculties that prevailed among the French obliged them to neglect. The Guiscards, attachent to the memory of Richard, who was born among them, refused to swear allegiance to a prince that had dethroned and murdered him; and the appearance of a French army on their frontiers would probably have tempted them to change masters. But the Earl of Worcester, arriving with some of the most indigent of Henry's family, who offered to suffer the fate of Henry, and overcame their opponents. Religion too was here found a cement with their union with England. The Guiscards had been engaged, by Richard's authority, to acknowledge the union of the kings of France and England; and it was believed that, if they submitted to France, it would be necessary for them to pay obedience to the Pope of Avignon, whom they had been taught to detest as a schismatic. Their principles on this head were too fast rooted to admit of any sudden or violent alteration.

The revolution in England proved like- wise the occasion of an insurrection in Wales. Owen Glendour, or Gwilym, descended from Glendour's ancestors of that country, who had become notorious on account of his attachment to Richard; and Reginald Lord Gray of Ruthyn, who was closely connect- ed with the new king, and who enjoyed a great fortune in the marches of Wales, thought the opportunity favourable for oppressing his neighbour, and taking possession of his estate. Glendour, provoked at the injustice, and still more at the indignity, recovered possession by the sword. Henry sent assistance to Gray; the Welch took part with him, and he appeared a powerful leader of the people, which, after being thus exalted, Glendour long sustained by his valour and activity, aided by the natural strength of the country, and the untamed spirit of its inhabitants.

As the predominance of this movement was promiscuously on all the English, he invested the estate of the Earl of March; and Sir Edmond Mortimer, uncle to that nobleman, led out the retainers of the family, and gave battle to the Welch chief; his troops were routed, and he was taken prisoner; at the same time, the earl himself, who had been allowed to retire to his castle of Wigmore, and who though a mere boy took the field with his followers, fell also into Glendour's hands, and was carried by him into Wales. As Henry dreaded and hated all the family of March, he allowed the earl to remain in captivity; and though that young nobleman was nearly allied to the Fiennes, to whose assistance he himself had hitherto counted, he refused to the Earl of hereditary permission in trust of his ransom with Glendour.

The uncertainty in which Henry's affairs stood during a long time with France, as well as the confusions incident to all great changes in government, prevented him from making incursions into England, and Henry, desirous of taking revenge upon them, but afraid of rendering his new government unpopular by requiring great supplies from his subjects, summoned a parliament at Westminster, to the Commons, and, laid before them the state of his affairs. The military part of the feudal constition was now much decayed: there remained only so much of that false as affected the civil rights and properties of men; and the peers were too weak, but voluntarily to attend the king in an expedition against Scotland, each of them at the head of a certain number of his retainers.

Henry conducted this army to Edinburgh, of which he easily made himself master, and he there summoned Robert III. to do homage to him for his crown. But finding that the Scots would neither submit nor give him battle, he returned in three weeks, after making this useless bravo: and he disbanded his army.

A.D. 1403.

The Earl of Shrewsbury, Earl of Douglas, at the head of 12,000 men, and attended by many of the principal nobility of Scotland, made an irruption into England, and committed devastations on the northern counties. On his return home, he was overtaken by the Piercyes at Homeldon, on the borders of England, and a fierce battle ensued, where the Scots were totally routed. Douglas himself was taken prisoner, as was Morrice, Earl of Fife, son of the Duke of Albany, and nephew of the Scottish king, with the Earls of Angus, Murray, and Orkney, and many others of the gentry and nobility. When Henry received intelligence of this victory, he sent the Earl of Northumberland orders not to ransom his prisoners, which that nobleman regarded as his right by the laws of war received in that age. The king intended to detain them, that he might be able, by their means, to make an advantageous peace with Scotland. But his policy he gave a fresh disgust to the family of Piercy.

The obligations which Henry had owed to Northumberland were of a kind the most likely to produce ingratitude on the one side, and discontent on the other. The sovereign naturally became jealous of that power which had advanced him to the throne; and the subject was not easily satisfied in the returns which he thought so great a prince should make. Though Henry, on his accession, had bestowed the office of constable on Northumberland for life, and conferred other gifts on that family, these favours were regarded as due; the officer and many other requests were deemed an injury. The impenitent spirit of Harry Piercy, and the factious disposition of the Earl of Worcester, younger brother of Northumberland, inflamed the discontent of that nobleman: and the precipitate title of Henry seemed to leave no doubt that the prince had at first established. He entered into a correspondence with Glendouer. He gave liberty to the Earl of Douglas, and made an alliance with that martial chieftain. Before that movement, and soon after, Northumberland was seized with a sudden illness at Berwick; and young Piercy, taking the command of the troops, marched towards Shrewsbury, in order to join his forces with those of Glendouer. The king had happily a small army on foot, with which he had intended to act against the Scots; and, knowing the importance of celerity in all civil wars, he instantly hurried down that he might give battle to the rebels. He approached Piercy near Shrewsbury, but the latter was joined by Glendouer; and the policy of one leader, and impotence of the other, made them hasten to a general engagement.

The evening before the battle, Piercy sent a manifest to Henry, in which he returned his thanks for that almsgiving that delighted his heart, and charged him to bear his guilt, when on landing at Ravenspur he had sworn upon the Gospels, before the Earl of Northumberland, that he had no other intention than to recover the duchy of Lancaster, and that he would ever remain a faithful subject to King Richard. He aggravated his guilt in first denouncing, then murdering that prince, and in usurping on the title of the house of Mortimer, to whom, both by lineal succession, and by declarations of parliament, the throne, when vacant by Richard's demise, did of right belong. He complained of his cruel policy in allowing the young Earl of March, whom he ought to regard as his sovereign, to remain a captive in the hands of his enemies, and in even refusing to all his prayers permission to treat of his ransom. He charged him again with perjury in loading the nation with heavy taxes, after having sworn that, without the utmost necessity, he would never levy any impositions upon the people. Indeed, he had repeatedly employed in procuring favourable elections into parliament; arts which he himself had before imputed as a crime to Richard, and which he had made one chief reason of that prince's arraignment and deposition. This manifesto was well calculated to inflame the quarrel between the parties: the bravery of the two leaders promised an obstinate engagement: and the equality of the armies, being each about 12,000 men, a number which was unmanageable by the commanders, gave reason to expect a great effusion of blood on both sides, and a very doubtful issue to the combat.

We shall scarcely find any battle in those ages where the shock was more terrible and more constant. Henry exposed his person in the thickest of the fight: his gallant son, whose military achievements were afterwards so renowned, and who here performed a signal service for his father, was wounded on his father's footstep, and even a wound, which he received in the face with an arrow, could not oblige him to quit the field. Piercy supported that fame in which he had acquired in many a bloody combat. Douglas, his ancient enemy, and now his friend, still appeared his rival, amidst the horror and confusion of the day. This nobleman performed feats of valour which are almost incredible: he seemed determined that the king should that day fall by his arm: he sought him all over the field of battle: and as Henry, either to elude the attacks of the enemy upon his person, or to encourage his own men by the belief of his presence everywhere, had accorded several captains in the royal garb, the sword of Douglas rendered this honour fatal to many. But while the armies were contending in this furious manner, the death of Piercy, by an unknown hand, decided the victory, and the royals prevailed. There are said to have fallen that day, on both sides, near two thousand three hundred gentlemen; but the persons of greatest distinction were on the king's side: the Earl of Stafford, Sir Hugh Shirley, Sir Nicholas Gauze, Sir Hugh Murtun, Sir John Maister, Sir John Caverly. About six thousand private men perished, of whom two-thirds were of Piercy's army. The Earls of Worcester and Douglas were taken prisoners. The former was pressed to ransom: the latter was treated with the courtesy due to his rank and merit.

The Earl of Northumberland, having recovered from his sickness, had levied a fresh army, and was on his march to join his son; but being opposed by the Earl of Westmoreland, and hearing of the defeat at Shrewsbury, he dismissed his forces, and came with a small retinue to the king at York. He pretended that his sole intention in arming was to mediate between the parties: Henry thought proper to accept of the apology, and even granted his pardon for his offence: all the other rebels were treated with equal lenity; and, except the Earl of Worcester and Sir Richard Vernon, who were regarded as the chief actors in the plot, no person was punished. This generous enterprise seems to have perished by the hands of the executioners.

But Northumberland, though he had been so much trusted, and that he was too powerful to be cordially given by a prince, whose situation gave him such reasonable grounds of jealousy. It was the effect either of Henry's vigilance or good fortune, or of the narrow graces of his enemies, that no proper concert was ever formed among them.
them; they rose in rebellion one after another; and thereby afforded him an opportunity of suppressing many of those insurrections, which, had they been united, might have proved fatal to his authority. The Earl of Nottingham, son of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Archbishop of York, brother to the Earl of Wiltshire, whom Henry, when Duke of Lancaster, had beheaded at Bristol, though they had remained quiet while Percy was in the field, still harboured in their breast a violent hatred against the enemy of their families, and they determined, in conjunction with the Earl of Northumberland, to seek revenge against him. They betook themselves to arms that powerful nobleman was prepared to join them; and publishing a manifesto, in which they reproached Henry with having sacrificed the lives of many of the late king, they required that the right line should be restored, and all public grievances be redressed. The Earl of Northumberland, whose power lay in the neighbourhood, approached them with an inferior force at Shipton, near York; and, being afraid to hazard an action, he attempted to subdue them by a stratagem, which nothing but the greatest folly and simplicity on their part could have rendered successful. He designed a conference with the archbishop and earl between the armies: he heard their grievances with great patience: he begged them to propose the remedies: he approved of every expedient he suggested; and neither trusted them to their demands: he also engaged that Henry should give them entire satisfaction; and when he saw them pleased with the facility of his concessions, he observed to them, that since amity was now in effect, restored between them, he could not rely on their fidelity, which otherwise would prove an insupportable burden to the country. The archbishop and the Earl of Nottingham immediately gave directions to that purpose: their troops disbanded upon the field; but Northumberland, who had secretly issued contrary orders to his army, seized the two rebels without resistance, and carried them to the king, who was advancing with hasty marches to suppress them. The trial and punishment of an archbishop might have proved a troublesome and dangerous undertaking, had Henry proceeded regularly, and allowed time for an opposition to form itself against that unusual measure; but the execution alone could not render it safe and prudent. Finding that Sir William Gascoigne, the chief justice, made some scruple of acting on this occasion, he appointed Sir William Fulthorpe for judge; who, without any indictment, trial, or defence, pronounced his sentence upon the death of which he presently executed. This was the first instance in England of a capital punishment inflicted on a bishop; whence the clergy of that rank might learn that their crimes, however small, were likely to pass without impunity. The Earl of Nottingham was condemned and executed in the same summary manner: but though many other persons of condition, such as Lord Falconberg, Sir Ralph Hastings, Sir John Colville, were engaged in this rebellion, no others seem to have fallen victims to Henry's severity.

The Earl of Northumberland, on receiving this intelligence, fled into Scotland, together with Lord Bardolf; and the king, without opposition, reduced all the castles and fortresses belonging to these noblemen. He then turned his arms against Glendour, over whom his son, the Prince of Wales, had obtained some advantages; but the progress of his troops was stopped by the enemy, who, with greater numbers, had formed means of defending himself in his fastnesses, and of eluding, though not resisting, all the force of England. The Duke of Burgundy, in a subsequent season, the Earl of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf, impatient of their exile, entered the north in hopes of raising the people to arms; but found the country in such a posture as rendered all their attempts unsuccessful. 6. In a subsequent season, the Earl of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf, impatient of their exile, entered the north in hopes of raising the people to arms; but found the country in such a posture as rendered all their attempts unsuccessful. Sir Thomas Redack, in the course of securing his fastnesses, attacked the invaders at Bramham, and gained a victory in which both Northumberland and Bardolf were slain. This prosperous event, joined to the death of Glendour, which happened soon after, fired Henry from all his domestic enemies; and this prince, who had mounted the throne by such unjustifiable means, and held it by such an exceptable title, had yet by his valour, prudence, and address, accustomed the people to the yoke, and had obtained a greater ascendancy over his haughty barons than the late king himself. The attempt supported by these active qualities, was ever able to confer. The same time, fortune gave Henry an advantage over that neighbour, who, by his situation, was most enabled to disturb his government. Robert, 1st Earl of Northumberland, of the house of Scrots, was a prince, though of slender capacity, extremely honest and moifensive in his conduct: but Scotland, at that time, was still less fortified than England for enduring, or even suffering, the levies of that character. The Duke of Burgundy, Robert's brother, a prince of more qualities, at least of a more boisterous and violent disposition, had assumed the government of the state; and, not satisfied with present authority, he entered into the criminal purpose of extirpating his brother's children, and of acquiring the crown to his own family. He threw into prison David, his eldest nephew, who there perished by hunger; James alone, the younger brother of David, he appointed to the throne of Scotland, and the crown; and King Robert, sensible of his son's danger, embarked him on board a ship, with a view of sending him to France, and restraining him to the protection of that friendly power. Unfortunately for the English Prince James, a boy about nine years of age, was sent to London; and though there subsisted at that time a truce between the kingdoms, Henry refused to restore the young prince to his liberty. Robert, worn out with cares and insults, groaned under their force, and feared which, on the other hand, might have proved an insupportable burden to the country. The archbishop and the Earl of Nottingham immediately gave directions to that purpose: their troops disbanded upon the field; but Northumberland, who had secretly issued contrary orders to his army, seized the two rebels without resistance, and carried them to the king, who was advancing with hasty marches to suppress them. mentary are somewhat more memorable, and more worthy of our attention. During the two last reigns the elections of the Commons had appeared a circumstance of government not to be neglected; and Richard was even accused of placing unanswerable members in his pockets, in order to procure a seat in that House. This practice formed one considerable article of charge against him in his deposition; yet Henry scrupled not to try in his footsteps, and to encourage the same arbitraries by the example of the king. Lord was his answer, with such due influence, and even a sheriff was punished for an iniquitous return which he had made; but laws were commonly at that time, very ill executed; and the liberties of the people, such as they were, were on a sure foundation; and the laws and elections. Though the House of Commons was little able to withstand the violent currents which perpetually ran between the monarchy and the aristocracy, and though that House might easily be brought, at a particular time, to make the most unwarrantable concessions to either; the general institutions of the state still remained invaible; the interests of the several members continued on the same footing; the sword was in the hands of the subject; and the government, though thrown into temporary disorder, soon settled itself on its ancient foundations.

During the greater part of this reign, the king was obliged to court popularity; and the House of Commons, seeing the elections to be more in favor of the king, which had not usually been exercised by his predecessors. In the first year of Henry, they procured a law, that no judge, in concurring with any iniquitous measure, should be excused by the interest of the king, and, even the danger of his own life from the menaces of the sovereign. In the second year, they insisted on maintaining the practice of not granting any supply before they received an answer to their petitions; which was a tactful manner of bargaining with the prince. In the fifth year, they desired the king to remove from his household four persons who had displeased them, among whom was his own cousin, and he refused it. A law was passed that no offence which these men had committed, yet in order to gratify them, complied with their request. In the sixth year they voted the king supplies, but appointed treasurers of their own, to see the money disbursed for the purposes intended, and required them to deliver in their accounts to the House. In the eighth year they proposed, for the regulation of the government and household, thirty important articles, which were all agreed to; and the king was obliged to appoint treasurers of council, all the judges, and all the officers of the household, to swear to the observance of them. The abridge of the records marks the unusual liberties taken by the speaker and the House. During the latter years, the Commons were but a temporary advantage, arising from the present situation. In a subsequent parliament, when the speaker made his customary application to the throne for liberty of speech, the king, having now overcome all his domestic difficulties, plainly told him, that he would have no novelties introduced, and would enjoy his prerogatives. But on the whole, the limitations of the government seem to have been more sensibly felt, and more carefully maintained, by Henry, than by any of his predecessors.

During this reign, when the House of Commons were, at any time, brought to make unwary concessions to the crown, they would never yield without the representation of them. Henry, though he entertained a perpetual and well-grounded jealousy of the family of Mortimer, allowed not their name to be once mentioned in parliament. He was even at this time one of the principal counselors of the Earl of March king, he never attempted to procure, what would not have been refuse him, an express declaration against the claims of that nobleman; because he knew that, in a free present, the king did not have no authority, and would only serve to revivify the memory of Mortimer's title in the minds of the people. He proceeded in his purpose after a more artful and covert manner. He procured a settlement of the crown on himself and his heirs-male, thereby tacitly excluding the females, and transferring the Salic law into the English government. He thought, that though the house of Plantagenet had at first derived their title from a female, this was a remote and uncertain title, compared with one title by the people; and if he could once acconunt them to the practice of excluding women, the title of the Earl of March would gradually be forgotten and neglected by them. But, in every attempt. During the king contests with Fauvo, the injuries against the law which had been so much exclaimed against by the nation, that a contrary principle had taken deep root in the minds of men; and it was now become impossible to enfranchise it. The same House of Commons therefore, in a subsequent session, apprehensive that they had overturned the foundations of the English government, and that they had opened the door to more civil wars than might ensue even from the irregular elevation of the house of Lancaster, applied with such earnestness for a new settlement of the crown, that Henry yielded to their request, and agreed to the succession of the princes of his family. A certain proof, that nobody was in his heart satisfied with the king's title to the crown, or knew on what principle to rest it.

But though the Commons, during this reign, showed a laudable zeal for liberty in their transactions with the crown, their efforts against the church were still more extraordinary, and, indeed, were proposed to him by the clergy, of which he had become so general in a little more than a century afterwards. I know that of the credit these passages rests entirely on one ancient historian; but that historian was not a cleric, and it was not the interests of his order to preserve the memory of such transactions, much more to force precedents, which posterity might, some time, be tempted to imitate. This is a truth so evident, that the most likely way of accounting for the silence of the records on this head, is by supposing, that the authority of some churchmen was so great as to procure a miracle, with regard to these circumstances, which the indication of one of that order has happily preserved to us.

In the sixth of Henry, the Commons, who had been required to grant supplies, proposed in plain terms to the king, that he should seize all the temperatures of the church, and employ them as a perpetual fund to avert the exigencies of the state. They insisted that the clergy possessed a third of the lands of the kingdom; that they contributed nothing to the public burthen; and that their revenues tended only to disqualify them from performing their ministerial functions with proper zeal and attention. When this address was presented, the Archbishop of Canterbury, who then attended the king, objected that the clergy were not in past times, but that their vessels and tenants in all cases of necessity; while, at the same time, they themselves, who stood at home, were employed night and day in offering up their prayer for the king's happiness and prosperity of the state. The speaker smiled, and answered, without reserve, that he thought the prayers of the church but a very slender supply. The archbishop, however, prevailed in the dispute; the king discouraged the application of the Commons; and the Lords rejected the bill which the Lower House had framed for stripping the church of her revenues.

The Commons were not discouraged by this repulse; in the eleventh of the king they renewed to the charge with more zeal than ever they had ventured before. Their anxiety was the ecclesiastical revenues, which, by their account, amounted to 483,500 marks a year, and consisted 18,400 ploughs of land. They proposed to divide this property among fifteen new hospitals, and among one hundred hospitals; besides 20,000 pounds a year, which the king might take for his own use: and they insisted, that the clerical functions would be better performed at present, by 45,000 marks a year, than by seven marks a piece of yearly stipend. This application was accompanied with an address for mitigating the statutes enacted against the Lollards, which shows from what source the address came. The king gave the Com-

The many jealousies to which Henry IV.'s situation of late had been exposed, had so much heightened his temper, that he had entertained unreasonable suspicions with regard to the fidelity of his eldest son; and, during the latter years of his life, he had excluded that prince from all share in public business, and was even displeased to see him at the head of armies, where his martial talents, though useful to the support of government, acquired him a renown, which, he thought, might form dangerous amusements for him. Henry was twice married; by his first wife, Mary de Bohun, daughter and co-heir of the Earl of Hereford, he had four sons; Henry, his successor in the throne; Thomas, Duke of Exeter; John, Duke of Cambridge; and Philip, Duke of Gloucester; and two daughters, Blanche and Philippa, the former married to the Duke of Bavaria, the latter to the King of Denmark. The many jealousies to which Henry IV.'s situation of late has been exposed, had so much heightened his temper, that he had entertained unreasonable suspicions with regard to the fidelity of his eldest son; and, during the latter years of his life, he had excluded that prince from all share in public business, and was even displeased to see him at the head of armies, where his martial talents, though useful to the support of government, acquired him a renown, which, he thought, might form dangerous amusements for him. The active spirit of young Henry, restrained from its proper exercise, broke out into extravagances of every kind; and the riot of pleasure, the frolic of debauchery, the outrage of wine, filled the vacancies of a mind, better adapted to the pursuits of ambition and the cares of government. This course of life threw him among companions, whose disorders, if accompanied with spirit and humour, he indulged and seconded; and he was detected in many sallies, which, to severer eyes, appeared to tally unworthily of his rank and station. There even remains a tradition, that, when heated with liquor and jollity, he scurried not to accompany his notions associates in attacking the passengers on the street, was continually employed in despising them of their goods; and he found an amusement in the incidents which the terror and regret of those defenceless people produced on such occasions. This extreme of dissoluteness proved equally disagreable to his father, and the eager application to business which had at first gained him occasion of jealousy; and he saw, in his son's behaviour, the same neglect of decency, the same attachment to low company, which had degraded the personal character of Richard, and which, more than all his errors in government, had tended to overturn his throne. But the nation, in general, considered the young prince with more indulgence; and observed so many grains of generosity, spirit, and magnanimity in his conduct, which, it is said, were haunted, render him an object of our pity, even when seated upon the throne. But it must be owned, that his prudence and vigilance foresawt, in maintaining his power, were admirable: his command of temper, irresistible: his courage, both military and political, without blemish: and he possessed many qualities which fitted him for his high station, and which rendered his usurpation of it, though pernicious in after-times, rather salutary during his own reign, to the English nation.

Henry was twice married; by his first wife, Mary de Bohun, daughter and co-heir of the Earl of Hereford, he had four sons; Henry, his successor in the throne; Thomas, Duke of Exeter; John, Duke of Cambridge; and Philip, Duke of Gloucester; and two daughters, Blanche and Philippa, the former married to the Duke of Bavaria, the latter to the King of Denmark. His second wife, Jane, whom he married after he was king, and who was daughter of the King of Navarre, and widow of the Duke of Brittany, brought him no issue.

By an act of the fifth of this reign, it is made felony to cut out any person's tongue, or put out his hand, and Henry, in a rage, the act says, were very frequent. This savage spirit of revenge denotes a barbarous people; though, perhaps, it was increased by the prevailing factions and commotions.

Commerce was very little understood in this reign, as in all the preceding. In particular, a great jealousy prevailed against merchant strangers; and many restraints were, by law, imposed upon them; namely, that they should lay out in English manufactures or commodities all the money acquired by the sale of their goods; that they should not buy or sell with one another; and that all their goods should be disposed of three months after importation. This last clause was found so inconvenient, that it was soon after repealed by parliament.

It appears that this king's household amounted to the yearly sum of 19,500l. money of that age.

Guicciardini tells us, that the Flemings, in this century, learned from Italy all the refinements in arts, which they taught the rest of Europe. The progress, however, of the arts was still very slow and backward in England.
Geseigne, mindful of the character which he then bore, and the majesty of the sovereign and of the laws, which he sustained, ordered the prince to be carried to prison for his rude behaviour. The spectators were agreeably disappointed when they saw the heir of the crown submit peaceably to the sentence, make reparation for his error by acknowledging it, and check his impetuous nature in the midst of its extravagant career.

His reformation. many others of a like nature, rendered the prospect of the future reign nowise disagreeable to the nation, and increased the joy which the death of so unpopular a prince as the late king naturally occasioned. Those who had opposed the sentiments of the minister in those for which he had been actuated, acknowledged his amends. He had put an end to those prepossessions entertained in his favour. He called together his former companions, acquainted them with his intended reformation, exhorted them to imitate his example, but strictly inhibited them, till they had given proofs of their sincerity in this particular, from appearing any more in his presence; and he thus dismissed them with liberal presents. The wise ministers of his father, who had checked his rest, found that they had unknowingly been paying the highest court to him; and were received with all the marks of favour and confidence. The chief justice himself, who trembled to approach the throne for the flames for which he was reproached for his past conduct, and was exhortcd to persevere in the same rigorous and impartial execution of the laws. The surprise of those who expected an opposite behaviour, augmented their satisfaction; and the character of the new prince appeared brighter than if it had never been shaded by any errors.

But Henry was anxious not only to repair his own misconduct, but also to make amends for those iniquities into which policy or the necessity of affairs had betrayed his father. He expressed the deepest sorrow for the fate of the unhappy Richard, did justice to the memory of that unfortunate prince, even performed his funeral obsequies; and, in his address to the body of the king, gave occasion to all those who had distinguished themselves by their loyalty and attachment towards him. Instead of continuing the restraints which the jealousy of his father had imposed on the Earl of March, he received that young nobleman with singular courtesy and favour; and by this unexampled so gained on the gentle and unambitious nature of his minister, that he remained ever after sincerely attached to him, and gave him no disturbance in his future government. The family of Arundel, who had been his intimate friends, were now promoted to a high station in the state; and by the means of the birthright and honours. The king seemed ambitious to bury all party distinctions in oblivion; the instruments of the preceding reign, who had been advanced from their blind test, were of such number pardoned that the_Paramount authority of those who had queued place every where to men of more honourable characters: virtue seemed now to have an open career, in which it might exert itself: the exhortations, as well as example, of the prince gave it encouragement: there was not one who was unanimous in their attachment to Henry; and the defects of his title were forgotten amidst the personal regard which was universally paid to him.

There remained among the people only one party distinction, which was derived from religious differences, and which, as it is of a peculiar, and commonly a very obstinate nature, the popularity of Henry was not able to overcome. The Lollards were every day increasing; they were restive to their established hierarch, gave an alarm to Henry; who, either from a sincere attachment to the ancient religion, or from the fear of misadventures, to which the established hierarchy was exposed, when they were all numbered together, or from the watchfulness with which the prince attended all important changes, was determined to execute the laws against such bold innovators. The head of this sect was Sir John Oldcastle, (Lord Cobham,) a nobleman who had distinguished himself by his valour and his military talents, and had, on many occasions, acquired the esteem both of the late and of the present king. His high character and his zeal for the new sect pointed him out to Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, as the proper victim of ecclesiastical severity; whose punishment would strike a terror into the whole people, and teach them that they must expect no mercy under the present administration. He applied to the primate for the execution; Lord Cobham; but the generous nature of the prince was averse to such sanguinary methods of conversion. He represented to the primate, that reason and conviction were the best expedients for supporting truth; that all gentle means ought first be tried; that he would not consent to the execution of men from error; and that he himself would endeavour, by a conversation with Cobham, to reconcile him to the catholic faith. But he found that nobleman obstinate in his opinions, and determined not to sacrifice truths of so intimate moment to his compliancy for sovereigns.

Henry's principles of toleration, or rather his love of the practice, could carry him no further; and he then gave full rents to ecclesiastical severity against the inflexible heresarch. The prince induced Cobham; and, with the assistance of his three suffragans, the Bishops of London, Wenchester, and St. David's, condemned him to the most sanguinary opinions. Cobham, who was confined in the Tower, made his last day appointed for his execution. The bold spirit of the man, provoked by persecution and stimulated by zeal, was urged to attempt the most criminal enterprises; and his unlimited audacity seemed to defy the power of the most well merited the attention of the civil magistrate. He formed in his retreat very violent designs against his enemies; and despatching emissaries to all quarters, appointed a general rendezvous of the party, in order to seize the person of the king at Eltham, and put their persecutors to the sword. Henry, apprized of A. D. 1414. their intention, removed to Westminster; but changed the place of rendezvous to the field near St. Giles's: the king, having shut the gates of the city, to prevent any reinforcement to the Lollards from that quarter, came into the field in the night time, seized such of the conspirators as appeared, and afterwards had hold of the several parties who were basing to the place appointed. It appeared that a few only were in the secret of the conspiracy; the rest implicitly followed their leaders: but upon the trial of the persons brought to court, the treasonable designs of the sect were rendered certain, both from evidence, and from the confession of the criminals themselves. Some were executed; the greater part of them remitted; Cobham himself, after he had made his escape by flight, was not brought Lord Cobham. to justice till four years after, when he was hanged as a traitor; and his body was burnt on the gibbet, in execution of the sentence pronounced against him as a heretic. This criminal design, which was perhaps somewhat aggravated by the clergy, brought discredit upon the party, and checked the progress of that sect, which had embraced the speculative doctrines of Wycliffe, and at the same time aspired to a reformation of ecclesiastical abuses.

These two points were the great objects of the Lollards; but the bulk of the nation was not affected in the same degree as the day increased; and so obvious a reformation had discovered to the people the advantages of a reformation in discipline; but the age was not yet so far advanced as to be seized with the spirit of controversy. This, however, the Lollards endeavored to propagate throughout the kingdom. The very notion of heresy alarmed the generality of the people; innovation in fundamental principles was insupportable; the spirit of contradiction not as yet a sufficient counterpoise to authority; and even many, who were the greatest friends to the reformation of abuses, were anxious to express their detestation of the speculative tenets of the Wickliffsites, which they feared threw disgrace on so good a cause. This turn of thought appears evidently in the proceedings of the parliament which was summoned immediately after the death of Cnoblas's conspiracy. That assembly was procured by the king, and his brother the Duke of Burgundy, was cast against the new bishops. They enacted, that whoever was convicted of Lollardy before the ordinary, besides suffering capital punishment, according to the laws formerly established, should also forfeit his lands and goods to the king; and that the archbishop, bishop, chancellor, treasurer, justices of the two banco, sheriffs, justices of the peace, and all the chief magistrates in every city and borough, should take an oath to use their utmost endeavours to procure for the king, in this very parliament, when the king demanded supply, renewed the offer formerly pressed upon his father, and nominated to seize all the ecclesiastical revenues, and convert them to the use of the king. They were also to provide, that the king could give the king no bridle which was equivalent: they only agreed to confer on him all the priories alien, which depended on capital abbots in Normandy, and had been bestowed on them by letters which were renewed united to England: and Chekele, the Archbishop of Canterbury, endeavoured to divert the blow, by giving occupation to the king, and by persuading him to undertake a war against France, in order to recover his lost rights, and to help to the king.

It was the dying injunction of the late king to his son, not to allow the English to remain long in peace, which was apt to breed intestine commotions; but to employ them in some foreign expedition, wherein the princes might acquire honour; the nobility, in sharing his dangers, might attach themselves to his person; and all the restless spirits might find occupation for their inquietude. The natural disposition of the English people was sufficiently inclined to follow their king, and the civil disorders of France, which had been prolonged beyond those of England, opened a full career to his ambition.

A.D. 1414. The death of Charles V., which followed the death of Edward III., and the youth of his son, Charles VI., put the two kingdoms for some time in a similar situation; and it was not to be apprehended, that either of the two powers would be able to make much advantage of the weakness of the other. The jealousies also between Charles's three uncles, the Dukes of Anjou, Berry, and Burgundy, had distracted the affairs of France rather more than those between the Dukes of Lancaster, York, and Gloucester, Richard's three uncles, disordered those of England; and had carried off the attention of the French nation from any vigorous enterprise against foreign states. But in proportion as Charles advanced in years, and his faction his uncle's party, the Dukes of Anjou and Burgundy, deceased; and the king himself, assuming the reins of government, discovered symptoms of genius and spirit, which revived the drooping hopes of his country people. This promising state of affairs was not of long duration: the unhappy prince fell suddenly into a fit of frenzy, which rendered him incapable of exercising his authority; and though he recovered from this disorder, he was so subject to relapses, that his judgment was gradually but sensibly impaired, and no steady plan of government could be pursued by him. The administration of affairs was disputed between his brother, Lewis, Duke of Orleans, and his cousin-german, John, Duke of Burgundy: the propinquity to the crown pleased in favour of the former: the latter, who, in right of his mother, had inherited the county of Flanders, which he annexed to his father's extensive dominions, derived a hostile from his superior power. The people were divided between these contending princes; and the king, now resuming, now dropping his authority, kept the victory undecided, and prevented any regular settlement of the state by the final prevalence of one party.

At length, the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, seeming to move by the cries of the nation, and by the interposition of common friends, agreed to bury all past quarrels in oblivion, and to enter into this unity; they swore before the altar the sincerity of their friendship; the priest administered the sacrament to both of them; they gave to each other every pledge which could be deemed sacred among men; but all this solemn preparation was only a cover for the basest treachery, which was deliberately premeditated by the Duke of Burgundy. He was the first to urge on the king, and to set on; he endeavoured for some time to conceal the part which he took in the crime; but being detected, he embraced a resolution still more criminal and more dangerous to society, by the art of ambition determined to this moment of Paris, he announced to the baronage of the duke's advocate in defence of assassination, which he termed tyrannicide; and that assembly, partly induced by the avowal of guilt, partly overawed by power, pronounced no sentence of condemnation against this detestable doctrine. The same question was afterwards agitated before the council of Constance; and it was with difficulty that a feasible decision, in out of the dispute, was procured from these fathers of the church, the ministers of peace and of religion. But the mischievous effects of that tenet, had they been before anywise doubtful, appeared sufficiently from the present incidents. The commission of this crime, which destroyed all trust and security, rendered the war implacable between the French parties, and cut off every means of peace and accommodation.

The princes of the blood combining with the young Duke of Orleans, and his brother the Duke of Burgundy; and the unhappy king, seized sometimes by one party, sometimes by the other, transferred alternately to each of them the appearance of legal authority, and the possession of civil government. The princes' predictions: assassinations were everywhere committed from the animosity of the several leaders; or what was equally terrible, executions were ordered, without any legal trial; and no man was safe, or free to go about his business, the kingdom was distinguished into two parties, the Burgundians and the Armagnacs; so the adherents of the young Duke of Orleans were called, from the Count of Armagnac, father of the latter; that prince, by which pretended, the same as a perpetual scene of blood and violence; the king and royal family were often detained captive in the hands of the populace; those faithful ministers were butchers or imprisoned before their face; and it was dangerous for any man, amidst such enraged factions, to be distinguished by a strict obedience to the principles of propriety and honour.

During this scene of general violence, there rose into some consideration a body of men, which usually makes no figure in public transactions, even during the most peaceful times; and that was the university of Paris, whose only object was the furtherance of the sciences; and which was frequently offered, in the multiplied disputes between the parties. The schism, by which the church was at that time divided, and which occasioned frequent controversies in the universities, had added the professors to an unusual degree of importance; and this connexion between literature and superstition had bestowed on the former a weight, to which reason and knowledge are not, of themselves, anywise entitled among men. But there was still a certain sort of society whose sentiments were much more decisive at Paris, the fraternity of butchers, who, under the direction of their ringleaders, had declared for the Duke of Burgundy, and committed the most violent outrages against the opposite party. To counterbalance their power, the Armagnacs made interest with the fraternity of carpenters; the populace ranged themselves on one side or the other; and the fate of the capital depended on the prevalence of one party.

The advantage which might be made of these confusions, was easily perceived in England; and, according to the maxims which usually prevail among nations, it was determined in the hope of the favourable opportunity, the late king, who was courted by both the French parties, fomented the quarrel, by alternately sending assistance to each; but the present sovereign, impelled by the vigour of youth, and the ardour of ambition, determined to throw his advantages to a greater length, and to carry violent war into that distracted kingdom. But while he was making preparations for this end, he tried to effect his purpose by negotiation; and he sent over ambassadors to Paris, offering a perpetual peace and alliance; but demanding Catharine, the French king's daughter in marriage, two millions of crowns for her portion, and six hundred thousand as the reversion of King John's ransom, and the immediate possession and full sovereignty of Normandy, and of all the other provinces which the French king, his father, or his grandfather, had possessed in his time. Philip Augustus; together with the superiority of Brittany and Flanders. Such exorbitant demands show that he was sensible of the present miserable condition of France; and the terms offered by the French court, though much inferior to the other, were certainly not dishonourable. They were willing to give him the princess in marriage, to pay him eight hundred thousand crowns, to resign the entire sovereignty of Guinée, and to annex to that province the country of Perigord, V豪 tense, Angoumois, and other territories. As Henry rejected these conditions, and scarcely hoped that his own demands would be complied with, he never intermitted a moment his preparations for war; and having assembled a great fleet and army at Southampton, having invited all the nobility and military men of the kingdom to attend him by the hopes of glory and of conquest, he came to the sea, and took part in the operations on his expeditions. But while Henry was meditating considerable on his neighbours, he unexpectedly found himself in danger from a conspiracy at home, which was happily detected in its infancy. The Earl of Cambridge, second son of the late Duke of York, was the leader of the conspirators, and March, had zealously embraced the interests of that family; and had held some conferences with Lord Spero of Mas- sham, and Sir Thomas Grey of Heton, about the means of driving the English army away from their camps, and entering on no further enterprise, and was obliged to think of returning into England. He had dismissed his trans- ports, which could not anchor in an open road upon the enemy's coasts; and he lay under a necessity of marching by land to Custer, and there to face the army of safety. A numerous French army of 14,000 men at arms, and 40,000 foot, was by this time assembled in Normandy under the Constable d' Albret; a force which, if prudently conducted, was sufficient either to trample down the Eng- lish in the open field, or to harass and reduce to nothing their small army, before they could finish so long and difficult a march. Henry, therefore, cautiously offered to sacrifice his contempt of the gallant age of Calais; but this proposal being rejected, he determined to make his way by valour and conduct through all the opposition of the enemy. That he might not discourage his army by the appearance of flight, or expose them to those hazards which naturally attend precipitate marches, he made slow and deliberate journeys, till he reached the Somme, which he purposed to pass at the ford of Bm- quetouge, the same place where Edward, in a like situa- tion, had before escaped from Philip de Valois. But he found the ford rendered impassable by the precaution of the French general, and guarded by a strong body on the opposite bank; and he was obliged to march higher up the river, in order to reach for Calais; his army, however, was more than four miles distant from the coast; and the enemy, which was competent to prevent his landing a party to oppose every attempt; his provisions were cut off; his soldiers languished with sickness and fatigue; and his affairs seemed to be reduced to a desperate situation; if he was not so dexterous or so fortunate as to seize by surprise a passage near St. Quintin, which had not been sufficiently guarded; and he safely carried over his army, he then bent his march northwards, and by the Battle of Azincour, and his immense victory, (which is now celebrated as the greatest in history,) he acquired a name of immortality. After his death, the French, in order to give it a great advantage in the world, and have that the prince, who had the misfortune to perish in that battle, was more illustrious than any of his ancestors, have of old maintained that Henry of France, when a child, had been rescued from the jaws of death; and that his soldiers had, by their heroic conduct, made a complete victory over the French army, which had disembarked at Harlebur; and that they laboured under every discouragement and necessity. The enemy was four times more numerous; was headed by the dauphin and all the princes of the blood; and was plentifully supplied with provisions of every kind. Henry's situation was exactly similar to that of Edward at Crecy, and he had the same fortune at Poitiers, and the menaces of these great events, inspiring the English with courage, made them hope for a like deliverance from their present difficulties. The king likewise observed the same prudence that the prince had been followed by these great commanders: he drew up his army on a narrow ground between two woods, which guarded each flank, and he patiently expected in that posture the attack of the enemy.

Thus, before the attack, the kings took advantage of the situation. But the immeasurable vour of the nobility, and a vain confidence in superior numbers, brought on this fatal action, which proved the source of infinite calamities to their country. The French formed on horseback and in their men-at-arms, crowded in their ranks, advanced upon the English archers, who had fixed paleslades in their front to break the impression of the enemy, and who secretly flung them, from behind that defence, with a shower of arrows and comatoes. The French commanded by some rain which had lately fallen, proved another obstacle to the force of the French cavalry: the wounded men and horses discomposed their ranks; the number of the dead and the wretched were thrown from recovering any order; the whole army was a scene of confusion, terror, and dismay: and Henry, perceiving his advantage, ordered the English archers, who were light and flexible, to advance upon the enemy, and seize the moment of victory. They fell with their battle-axes upon the French, who, in their present posture, were incapable either of flying or of making defence: theylewed them down without resistance. And being wounded by the men at arms, who also rushed on against the enemy, they covered the field with the killed, wounded, dismounted, and overthrown. After all appearance of opposition was over, the English had reduced the French pressers; and having advanced with uninterrupted success to the open plain, they saw the remains of the French rear guard, which still maintained the appearance of a line of battle. At the same time, they heard an alarm from behind: some gentlemen of Picardy, having collected about 600 peasants, had fallen upon the English baggage, and were doing execution on the unarmed followers of the camp, who fled before them. Henry, seeing the enemy of his honor, ordered some gentlemen to apprèhend them from his prisoners; and he thought it necessary to issue general orders for putting them to death; but on discovering the truth, he stopped the slaughter, and was still able to save a great number. No battle was ever more fatal to France, by the number of princes and usuality slain or taken prisoners. Among the former were the constable himself, the Count of Nevers, and the Duke of Brabant, brothers to the Duke of Burgundy, the Count of Vaudemont, brother to the Duke of Lorraine, the Duke of Alençon, the Duke of Barre, the Count of Urk. The most eminent prisoners were the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Counts d'Eu, Vende, and Richmond, and the Mareschal de Bourgogne. An Archibishop of Sens also was slain in this battle. The killed are computed, on the whole, to have amounted to ten thousand men; and as the slaughter chiefly upon the cavalry, it is pretended that of these, eight thousand were gentlemen. Henry was master of 14,000 prisoners. The person of chief note, who fell among the English, was the Duke of York, who perished fighting by the feet of an enemy and an outcast worse than the rest. He was succeeded in his honours and fortune by his nephew, son of the Earl of Cambridge, executed in the beginning of the year. All the English who were slain escaped very few; though some writers, with greater probability, make the number more considerable.

The three great battles of Crecy, Poitiers, and Azincourt, bear a singular resemblance to each other in their most considerable circumstances. In all of them, there appears the same temerity in the English princes, who, without a respite of moments, merely appealed to the art of plunder, venturing so far into the enemy's country as to leave themselves no retreat; and unless saved by the utmost imprudence in the French commanders, were, from their very number, far to be expected. But allowance being made for this temerity, which, according to the irregular plans of war followed in those ages, seems to have been, in some measure, unavoidable; these advantages afforded them more or less advantage, with the enemies; and it was not till after an interval of two years that any body of English troops appeared in France.

The poverty of all the European princes, and the small resources of the French kings, did not allow to the enemy the usual interruptions in their hostilities; and though the maxims of war were in general destructive, their military operations were mere incursions, which, without any settled plan, either severe or useful, were attended with the least lustre, however, attending the victory of Azincourt, procured some supplies from the English parliament, though still unequal to the expenses of a campaign. They granted Henry an annual pension, under the name of the seven-eighths of his income, for life, the duties of tonnage and poundage, and the subsides on the exportation of wool and leather. This concession is more considerable than that which had been granted to Richard II., by his last parliament, and which was afterwards, on his deposition, made as great an article of charge against him.

But during this interruption of hostilities State of France. from England, France was exposed to all the ills of civil war; and the several parties became day every day more enraged against each other. The Duke of Burgundy, confident that the French ministers and generals were entirely discredited by the misfortune at Azincourt, and that the French army amounted to no system to retain himself in possession of the government, as well as of the person of the king. But his partisans in that city were overthrown by the count, and kept in a state of dissatisfaction, and he was deprived of his forces, which he immediately disbanded in the Low Countries. He was soon after invited to A.D. 1417. make a new attempt, by some violent guarrs which broke out in the royal family. The queen, Isabella, daughter of the Duke of Bavaria, who had been hitherto an inveterate enemy to the Burgundian faction, had received a great injury from the other party, which the implacable spirit of that princess was never to forgive. The public necessities obliged the Count of Armaignac (created constable of France, in the place of d'Albret) to some the great treasures which Isabella had amassed: and when she expressed her displeasure at this injury, he promised to give her a sufficiently large indemnity. And thus did the success of the king some jealousies concerning her conduct, and pushed him to seize and put to the torture, and afterwards throw into the Seine, Blous-bourbon, her favourite, whom he accused of her death, and had her body exposed on the gallow. She herself was sent to Tours, and confined under a guard; and, after suffering those multiplied insults, she no longer scrupled to enter into a correspondence with the Duke of Burgundy, and all the family of his children were brought to the utmost of disgrace, and the person of sixteen, was entirely governed by the faction of Armaignac, she extended her animosity to him, and sought his destruction with the most unrelenting hatred. She had soon an opportunity of rendering her unnatural project effectual. The Duke of Burgundy, in concert with her, entered France at the head of a great army: he made himself master of Amiens, Abbeville, Douai, Montreuil, and other towns in Picardy; Senlis, Rheims, Chalons, Troye, and Auxerre, declared themselves of his party. He got possession of Beauvois and Pontoise, and of many other towns in the Montfliers, towns in the neighbourhood of Paris; and, pursuing further his progress towards the west, he seized Etampes, Chartres, and other fortresses; and was at last able to defy the king, to take Troye, and openly declared against those ministers who, she said, detained her husband in captivity.

Meanwhile the partisans of Burgundy raised a commotion in Flanders, which always inclined to that faction. Lille-Adam, one of the duke's captains, was received into the city in the night-time, and headed the insurrection of the people, which in a moment became so tumultuous that nothing could oppose it. The person of the king was seized: the dauphin made an escape with difficulty; but great numbers of the faction of Armagnac were immediately butchered: the count himself, and many persons of note, were thrown into prison: murders were daily committed. The dauphin, with the count of Armagnac and the populace not satiated with their fury, and deeming the course of public justice too dilatory, broke into the prisons, and put to death the Count of Armagnac, and all the leading persons in that faction. While France was in such furious commotion, and was so ill prepared to resist a foreign enemy, Henry, having collected some treasure, and levied an army in Normandy at the head of twenty-five thousand men; and met with no considerable opposition from any quarter. He made himself master of Falaise; Evreux and Caen submitted to him; the dauphin, and Henry, having subdued all the lower Normandy, and having received a reinforcement of fifteen thousand men from England, formed the siege of Rouen, which was defended by a garrison of four thousand men, seconded by the inhabitants, to the number of twelve thousand. The Cardinal de Ursins here attempted to incline him towards peace, and to moderate his pretensions. But the king replied to him in such terms, as showed that he was far from sensible of all his present advantage: "Do you not see," said he, "that God has led me hither as by the hand! France has no sovereign: I have just pretensions to that kingdom: every thing is here in the utmost confusion: no power can dispute with me the right of succession. There is no more probable proof, that the Beug, who disposes of empires, has determined to put the crown of France upon my head?"

But though Henry had opened his mind to this scheme of ambition, he had the appearance of legal authority; and to the dauphin on the other, who, being the undoubted heir of the monarch, was adhered to by every one that paid any regard to the true interests of their country. The court of Burgundy now persisted on a continual negociation with his brother, and endeavoured to obtain more secure, though less considerable, advantages. He made, at the same time, offers of peace to both parties; to the queen and Duke of Burgundy on the one hand, who, having possession of the king's person, carried the appearance of legal authority; and to the dauphin on the other, who, being the undoubted heir of the monarch, was adhered to by every one that paid any regard to the true interests of their country. The court of Burgundy now persisted on a continual negociation with his brother, and endeavoured to obtain more secure, though less considerable, advantages. of Burgundy, profited extremely by the distractions of France, and was daily making a considerable progress in Normandy. He had taken Honen after an obstinate siege, 1 he had made himself master of Pontoise and Gisors: he even threatened Paris, and by the terror of his arms, had obliged the court to remove to Troye: and in the midst of his successes, he was agreeably surprised to find his enemies, instead of combing against him for their mu-nual defence, determined to run against each other, and to return him the instrument of their vengeance upon each other.
A league was immediately concluded at Arras between him and the Duke of Burgundy. This prince, without stipulating for himself except the possession of his father's murder, and the marriage of the Duke of Bedford with his sister, was willing to sacrifice the kingdom to Henry's ambition; and he agreed to every demand made by that monarch. In order to finish this astonishing treaty, which was to transfer the crown of France to a stranger, Henry went to Troye, ac-accompanied by his brothers, the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester; and was there clothed by the Duke of Burgundy.
The imbecility into which Charles had fallen, made him incapable of seeing any thing but through the eyes of those who attended him; as they, on their part, saw every thing through the medium of their passions. The treaty, being already stipulated for, and the terms of the Duke's marriage drawn, and signed, and ratified; Henry's will seemed to be a law throughout the whole negotiation: nothing was attempted but to his advantages.

Treaty of Troye.
that Henry should espouse the Princess Catharine: that King Charles, during his life-time, should enjoy the title and dignity of king of France: that Henry should be declared and acknowledged heir of the monarchy, and be intreusted with the present administration of the government: that that kingdom should pass to his heirs general; that France and England should for ever be united under one king; but should still retain their several usages, customs, and privileges; that the princesses, vassals, and communities of France should swear, that they would both adhere to the future succession of Henry, and pay him present obedience as regent: that this prince should unite his arms to those of King Charles and the Duke of Burgundy, in order to subdue the adherents of Charles the pretended dauphin: and that these three princes should make no peace or truce with him but by common consent and agreement. 2

Such was the tenor of this famous treaty; a treaty which,
as nothing but the most violent anxiety could dictate 3, so nothing but the power of the sword could carry into execution. And therefore it is not surprising to say what had it taken effect, would have proved more pernicious to England or to France. It must have reduced the former kingdom to the rank of a province: it would have entirely destroyed the distinction of the latter, which have brought on the destruction of every descendant of the royal family;
as the houses of Orleans, Anjou, Alencon, Brittany, Bourbon, and of Burgundy itself, whose titles were preferable to that of the English princes, would, on that account, have been exposed to perpetual jealousy and persecution from the sovereign. There was even a palpable deficiency in Henry's claim which no art could palliate. For besides the insuperable objections to which Edward IIId.'s pretensions were exposed, he was not heir to the monarch if female succession were admitted, the right had devolved on the house of Mortimer: allowing that Richard II.
was a tyrant, and that Henry IVth's merits in depositing himself upon his son, to be the lawful heir of England, to justify that nation in placing him on the throne; Richard had nowise offended France, and his rival had merited nothing of that kingdom: it could not possibly be pretended that the former had been entitled to the crown of France; and that a prince who by any means got possession of the latter, was, without further question, entitled to the former. So that, on the whole, it must be allowed that Henry's claim to France was, if possible, still more unassailable than the title by which his father had mounted the throne of England.

But though all these considerations were overthrown, amidst the hurry of passion by which the courts of France and Burgundy were actuated, they would necessarily revive during times of more tranquillity; and it behoved Henry in his present advantages, and allow men no lesson for reason or reflection. In a few days after, Marriage of carried his father-in-law to Paris, and put himself in possession of that capital, which he obtained from the parliament and the three estates a ratification of the treaty of Troye; he supported the Duke of Burgundy in procuring a sentence against the murderers of his father; and he immediate!ly took possession of arms, with success, against the adherents of the dauphin, who, as soon as he heard of the treaty of Troye, took on him the style and authority of regent, and appealed to God and his sword for the maintenance of his title.

The first place that Henry subdued was Sens, which opened its gates after a slight resistance. With the same facility he made himself master of Montereau. The deference of Melun was more obstinate; Barbasson, the governors, held out for the space of two thousand of the besiegers; and it was famished alone which obliged him to capitulate. Henry stipulated to spare the lives of all the garrison, except such as were accomplices in the murder of his father. But when some were suspected to be of the number, his punishment was demanded by Philip: but the king had the generosity to intercede for them, and to prevent his execution.3

The next article providing superiority of men and money, obliged Henry to go over to England; and he left the Duke of Exeter, his uncle, governor of Paris during his absence. The authority which naturally attends success procured from the English parliament a subsidy of a fifteenth; but if we may judge by the scantiness of the supply, the nation was nowise surmised on their king's victories; and in proportion as the prospect of their union with France became nearer, the more they opened their eyes, and to see the dangerous consequences with which that event must necessarily be attended. It was fortunate for Henry, that he had other resources besides pecuniary supplies from his native subjects. The provinces which he had already conquered maintained his troops; and the hopes of further advantages allured to his standard all men of ambitious spirits in England, who desired to signalize them-encountered at Bauge: the English were defeated; the duke himself was slain by Sir Allan Swinton, a Scotch knight, who commanded a company of men at arms: and the Earls of Somerset, Dorset, and Huntingdon, were taken prisoners. 8 This was the first act that turned the tide of success against the English; and the Ilimiament that he might both attach the Scotch to his service, and reward the valour and conduct of the Earl of Buchan, honoured that nobleman with the office of constable.

He next applied himself to his devotions, and ordered his chaplain to recite the seven penitential psalms. When that passage of the fifty-first psalm was read, build thou the walls of Jerusalem, he interrupted the chaplain, and declared his secret resolution after he had fully subdued France, to conduct a crusade against the infidels, and recover possession of the Holy Land. 9 So ingeniously are men in deceived themselves, that Henry forgot, in those moments, all the good and just ambition; and no less comfort from this late and feeble resolve, which, as the mode of these enterprises was now past, he certainly would never have carried into execution. He expired in the thirty-fourth year of his age, and the tenth of his reign.

This prince possessed many eminent and character of virtues: and if we give indulgence to am Druck.

The exterior figure of this great prince, as well as his deportment, was engaging. His stature was somewhat above the middle size; his countenance beautiful; his limbs genteel and slender, but full of vigour; and he excelled in all parts of his actions; not only by his birth, but by his conversation, his character, and the success of his enterprises. He was of a great and brave spirit; and his speeches were so full of spirit and eloquence, that his very words were the voice of the king. To speak in short, he was a prince in whom all the virtues of a king were concentrated.

This is a true character of Henry V., the most illustrious of all the kings of France, who was, indeed, a king in every particular; not only by his authority, but by his personal conduct, which was so perfect that it made him a model for his subjects. He was a prince of the most upright and just principles; and his government was so just and equitable, that it was esteemed a model of excellence. His subjects were happy under hisrule, and his kingdom was prosperous and flourishing.

But I am digressing from my subject. I shall now proceed to a more particular description of the life and reign of Henry V., and the remarkable events that occurred during that period.

He was succeeded by his son, John, who was a dissolute and profligate prince, and soon after his accession, the French people rose in rebellion against him. He was compelled to resign the crown, and theEnglish,under the command of the Duke of Bedford, took possession of Paris. The Duke of Bedford, who was a brave and valiant general, marched into the city with a large army, and proceeded to Cádiz, where he was joined by a fleet of English ships. The English fleet was dissatisfied with their general, and mutinyed; but they were subdued by force of arms, and the Duke of Bedford was appointed their commander.

The Duke of Bedford, with a large army, proceeded to the relief of the city of Paris, which was besieged by the French. The French were defeated, and the Duke of Bedford took possession of the city. He then returned to England, and was received with great the glory of Henry, when it had nearly reached the summit, was stopped short by the hand of nature, and all his mighty projects vanished into smoke. He was seized with a fever, a malady which the King was not prepared to encounter. He was at last sensible that his distemper was mortal, and that his end was approaching. He sent for his brother the Duke of Bedford, the Earl of Warwick, and a few noblemen more, whom he had honoured with his friendship, and he delivered to them, in great tranquility, his last will with regard to the government of his kingdom and family. He entreated them to continue, towards his infant son, the same fidelity and attachment which they had always professed to himself during his life-time, and which had been cemented by so many mutual good offices. He expressed his indifference on the approach of death; and, though he regretted that he must leave unfinished what he had attempted, he declared his confident that the final acquisition of France would be the effect of their prudence and valour. He left the regency of that kingdom to his elder brother the Duke of Bedford; that of England to his second son, the Duke of Bedford; and the care of his son's person to the Earl of Warwick. He recommended to all of them a great attention to maintain the friendship of the Duke of Burgundy; and advised them to show gratitude to the French princes taken at Aincourt, till his son were of age, and could himself bold the reins of government. And he enjoined them, if the success of their arms should not enable them to place young Henry on the throne of France, never, at last, to make peace with that kingdom, unless the enemy, by the cession of Normandy, and its annexation to the crown of England, made compensation for all the hazard and expense of his enterprise. 6

6 This name was John, and he was afterwards created Duke of Suffolk. He was grandson of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster. The Earl of Dorset was brother to Somerset, and succeeded him in that title.

tillage laws to limit and confine it. The Duke of Gloucester, in the reign of Richard II., possessed a revenue of 60,000 crowns, (about 30,000 pounds a year of our present money,) as we learn from Froissart, and was, consequently, richer than the king himself, if all circumstances are considered.

It is remarkable that the city of Calais alone was an annual expense to the crown of 19,119 pounds; that is, above a third of the common charge of the government in time of peace. This fortress was of no use to the defence of England, and only gave that kingdom an inlet to annoy France. Ireland cost two thousand pounds a year, over and above its own revenue; which was certainly very low.

Every thing comprises to give us a very mean idea of the state of Europe in those ages.

From the most early times, till the reign of Edward III., the denomination of money had never been altered: a pound sterling was still a pound troy; that is, about three pounds of our present money. That conqueror was the first that imitated in this important article. In the twelfth of his reign he coined twenty-two shillings from a pound troy; in his twenty-seventh year he coined twenty-five shillings. But I Henry VI., who was also a conqueror, raised still further the denomination, and coined thirty shillings from a pound troy: his revenue, therefore, must have been about 110,000 pounds of our present money. That was a vast surplus of provisions, was equivalent to above 350,000 pounds.

None of the princes of the house of Lancaster ventured to impose taxes without consent of parliament: their predecessors had been obliged to do so, either by force of arms or by some other advantage to its advantage in the ecclesiastical government. But as the English nation had little or no concern in these great transactions, we are here the more concise in relating them.

The first commission of array which we meet with, was issued in this reign.5 The military part of the feudal system, which was the most essential circumstance of it, was entirely dissolved; and could no longer serve for the defence of the kingdom.

Henry, therefore, when he went to France in 1415, empowered certain commissioners to take, in each county, a review of all the free-men able to bear arms, to divide them into companies, and to keep them in readiness for resisting an enemy. This was the arras militia in England. He gave place to one, which was, perhaps, still less orderly and regular.

We have an authentic and exact account of the ordinary revenue of the crown during this reign; and it amounts to about 14 pence 10 shillings and 10 pence a year.6 This is nearly the same with the revenue of Henry III. and the kings of England had neither become much richer nor poorer in the course of so many years. The ordinary expenses of the government amounted to 42,507 pounds 16 shillings and 10 pence: so that the king had a surplus only of 12,206 pounds 14 shillings for the support of his household; for his wardrobe; for the expense of embassies; and other articles. This sum was nowise sufficient: he was therefore obliged to have frequent recourse to parliamentary supplies, and was thus, even in time of peace, not altogether independent of his people. But wars were attended with a great expense, which neither the prince's ordinary revenue, nor the extraordinary supplies, were able to bear; and the sovereign was always reduced to many miserable shifts, in order to make any tolerable figure in them. He commonly borrowed money from all quarters; he pawned his jewels; sometimes the crown itself; 7 he ran in arrears to his army; and he was often obliged, notwithstanding all these expedients, to stop in the midst of his career of victory, and to sell a part of his jewels, to which he was soldiers agreed very ill with this low income. All the extraordinary supplies granted by parliament to Henry during the course of his reign, were only seventeenths and fifteenths, about 203,000 pounds. If it is easy to compute how soon this money must be exhausted by armies of 24,000 archers, and 6000 horse; when each archer had six-pence a day, 8 and each horseman two shillings. The most splendid successes proved common- fruitless, when supported by so poor a revenue; and the debts and difficulties which the king thereby incurred, made him pay dear for his victories. The civil administration likewise, even in time of peace, could never be very satisfactory: the government was still enabled to support itself. Henry, till within a year of his death, owed debts which he had contracted while Prince of Wales; 9 it was in vain that the parliament pretended to reduce them. The familiar artifices and practices, by which he was reduced to such necessities. Though the right of levying purveyance, for instance, had been expressly guarded against by the Great Charter itself, and was frequently complained of by the Commons, it was found absolutely impracticable, by which it was reduced to such necessities. Henry VI. was enabled to support itself. Henry, till within a year of his death, owed debts which he had contracted while Prince of Wales. 9 It was in vain that the parliament pretended to reduce them. The familiar artifices and practices, by which he was reduced to such necessities.

During the reigns of the Lancastrian princes, the authority of parliament seems to have been more confirmed, and the privileges of the people more highly respected, than during any former period: and the two preceding kings, though men of great spirit and abilities, abstained from such exertions of prerogative, as even weak princes, whose title was undisputed, were tempted to think they might venture upon with impunity. The long minority of which there was now the prospect, encouraged still further the Lords and Commons to extend their influence, and without paying much regard to the verbal destination of Henry V. they assumed the power of giving a new arrangement to the whole administration. They declined altogether the name of Regent with regard to England: they appointed the Duke of Bedford Protector or Guardian of that kingdom, to which they supposed to imply less authority: they invested the Duke of Gloucester with the same dignity during the absence of his elder brother; 10 and, in order to limit the power of both these prudential councils, without whose advice and approbation no measure of importance could be determined. 11 The person and education of the infant prince was committed to Ileary Beauffort, Bishop of Winchester, his great uncle, and the legitimated son of John of Lancaster; Duke of Lancaster; a prelate, who, as his family could never have any pretensions to the crown, might safely, they thought, be intrusted with that important charge. The two princes, the Dukes of Bedford and Gloucester, who seemed injured by this plan of government, yet, being persons of great integrity and honour, were in no circumstances which tended to give security to the public; and as the wars in France appeared to be the object of greatest moment, they avoided every dispute which might throw an obstacle in the way of foreign confederate. When the state of affairs between the English and French kings was considered with a superficial eye, every advantage seemed to be on the side of the former; and the total expulsion of Charles appeared, at least, to be a matter easily to be expected from the superior power of his competitor. Though Henry was yet in his infancy, the administration was devolved on the Duke of Bedford, the most accomplished prince of his age; whose experience, prudence, valour, and generosity, qualified him for his high office, and enabled him both to maintain union among his friends, and to gain the confidence of his enemies. The whole power of England was at his command: he was at the head of armies inured to victory: he was seconded by the most renowned generals of the age, the Earls of Somerset, Warwick, Salisbury, Suffolk, and Arundel, Sir John Talbot, and Sir John Fastolf; and besides Guisane, the Duke of Normandy was of English birth, master of the capital, and of almost all the northern provinces, which were well enabled to furnish him with supplies both of men and money, and to assist and support his English successes, whenever occasion required it. But Charles, notwithstanding the present inferiority of his power, possessed some advantages, derived partly from his situation, partly from his personal character, which promised him success, and served, first, to counteract, then to overbalance, the superior force and opulence of his enemies. He was the true and undoubted heir of the monarchy: all Frenchmen, who knew the interests or desires of the nation, inclined their eyes towards him as its sole resource: the exclusion given him by the imbecility of his father, and the forced or precipitate consent of the states, had plainly no validity: that spirit of faction, which had blinded the people, could not long hold them in so gross a delusion: their national and inveterate hatred against the English, the authors of all their calamities, must soon revive, and inspire them with indignation at bending their necks under the yoke of the English. It was, moreover, stipulated, that he should be enabled to maintain an independence against their native sovereigns, would never endure a subjection to strangers: and though most of the princes of the blood were, since the death of Louis, either engaged in foreign wars, or domestic in England, the inhabitants of their demesnes, their friends, their vassals, all declared a zealous attachment to the king, and exerted themselves in resisting the violence of foreign invasion.

Charles himself, though only in his twentieth year, was of a character well calculated to become the object of these benevolent sentiments; and, perhaps, from the favour which naturally attends youth, was the more likely, on account of his tender age, to acquire the good-will of his native subjects. He was a prince of the most friendly and benign disposition, of easy and familiar manners, and of a just and sound, though not a very vigorous, understanding. Sincere, generous, affable, he appeared, from affection, the services of his followers, even while his low fortunes might make it their interest to desert him; and the benity of his temper could pardon in them those salutes of disapprobation which are paid in the hands of sovereigns who have been long exposed. The love of pleasure often seduced him into indolence; but, amidst all his irregularities, the goodness of his heart still shone forth; and, by exerting at intervals his courage and activity, he proved, that his general remissness, proceeded not from the want either of a just spirit of ambition, or of personal valour.

Though the virtues of this amiable prince lay some time in obscurity, the Duke of Bedford knew that his title alone made him formidable, and that every foreign assistance would be requisite, ere an English regent could hope to complete the conquest of France; an enterprise which, however it might seem to be much advanced, was still exposed to many and great difficulties. The chief advantage to be derived from the present advantages, was the resentment of the Duke of Burgundy against Charles, and as that prince seemed intent rather on gratifying his passion than consulting his interests, it was of some use for the regent, by demonstrations of respect and confidence, to retain him in the alliance of England. He sent therefore all his endeavours to that purpose: he gave the duke every proof of friendship and regard; he even offered him the regency of France, which Richemont, declined; and he proposed to corrobore the national connexions by private ties, he concluded his own marriage with the Princess of Burgundy, which had been stipulated by the treaty of Arras.

Being sensible that next to the alliance of Burgundy, the friendship of the Duke of Brittany was of the greatest importance towards forwarding the English conquests; and that, as the provincies of France, already subdued, lay between the dominions of these two princes, he could never hope for any security, without preserving his connexions with them; he was very intent on strengthening himself also from that quarter. The Duke of Brittany, having received many base and treacherous communications from them, gave up all hope of their return, and had, with other vassals of the crown, done homage to Henry V. in quality of heir to the kingdom: but as the regent knew that the duke was engaged in a power by his brother, the Count of Richemont, he endeavoured to fix his friendship, by paying court, and doing services to this haughty and ambitious prince.

Arthur, Count of Richemont, had been taken prisoner at the battle of Azincour, had been treated with great indulgence by the late king, and had been permitted on his parole to take a journey into Brittany, where the state of affairs rendered his presence useful. The death of that victorious monarch happened before Richemont's return; and this prince pretended, that, as his word was given personally to Henry V. he was not bound to fulfil it towards his son and successor: a chicanery which the regent, as he could not force him to compliance, deemed it prudent to overlook. An interview was settled at Amiens between the Dukes of Bedford, Burgundy, and Brittany, at which the Count of Richemont was also present. The alliance was renewed between these princes; and the regent persuaded Philip to give in marriage to Richemont his eldest sister, widow of the deceased dauphin, Lewis, the elder brother of Charles. Thus the Duke of Burgundy, the regent, and the Duke of Burgundy, and seemed engaged by interest to prosecute the same object, in forwarding the success of the English arms.

While the vigilance of the Duke of Bedford was employed in gaining or confirming these alliances, whose vicissitude rendered them so important, he did not overlook the state of more remote countries. The Duke of Albany, Regent of Scotland, had died; and his power had devolved on Murdock, his son, a prince of a weak understanding and indolent disposition; who, far from possessing the talents requisite for the government of that fierce people, was not even able to maintain authority in his own family, or restrain the pretensions and insolence of the Stewarths of the Scots to serve in France, where Charles treated them with great honour and distinction, and where the regent's brother enjoyed the dignity of constable, broke all order in the administration; new successes daily came over, and filled the armes of the Scottish king: the Earl of Douglas conducted a reinforcement of 3000 men to his assistance: and it was justly to be dreaded that the Scots, by commencing open hostilities in the North, would occasion a diversion still more considerable of the English power, and would ease Charles, in part, of that load by which he was at present so grievously oppressed. The Duke of Bedford, therefore, persuaded the English council to form an alliance with James their prisoner; to free that prince from his long captivity; and to connect him with England by marrying him to a daughter of the Earl of Somerset and cousin of the young king. As the Scotch regent, tired of his present dignity, which he was not able to support, was now become entirely sincere in his applications for James's liberty, the treaty was soon concluded; a ransom of forty thousand pounds was stipulated; and the King of Scots was restored to the throne of his ancestors, and proved, in his short reign, one of the most illustrious princes that had ever governed that kingdom. He was murdered, in 1437, by his traitorous kinman the Earl of Athole. His affections inclined to the cause of France; but the English had not reason during his time to complain of any breach of the truce by Scotland.

Military operations. But the regent was not so much employed in these political negociations as to neglect the operations of war, from which alone he could hope to succeed in expelling the French monarch. Though the chief seat of Charles's power lay in the southern provinces, beyond the Loire, his partisans were possessed of some fortresses in the northern, and even in the neighborhood of Paris; and it behooved the Duke of Bedford first to clear these countries from the enemy, before he could think of attempting more distant conquests. The castle of Noyelle, after a siege of six weeks; those of Rouen and Ypre, the town of Morlaix, in Brittany, the castle of Gaillon, the Earl of Suffolk, the Lord of Estoues, had formed the siege of Crevant in Burgundy; the Earl of Salisbury and Suffolk, with the Count of Toulouse, were sent to its relief; a fierce and well-directed action was fought; the English and their allies were defeated; the Constable of Scotland, and the Count of Vendome, were taken prisoners; and above a thousand men, among whom was Sir William Hamilton, were left on the field.

The following day, the King of France, upon the Seine, and of Le Charité upon the Loire, was the fruit of this victory: and as this latter place opened an entrance into the southern provinces, the acquisition of it appeared on that account of the greater importance. He pressed the Duke of Bedford, and seemed to promise a successful issue to the war.

A.D. 1432. The more Charles was threatened with an invasion in those provinces which adhered to him, the more necessary it became that he should retain possession of every fortress which he still held within the quarters of the enemy. The Duke of Bedford had besieged in person, during the space of three months, the town of Meaux, very strongly fortified; and unable to make any further defence, was obliged to capitulate; and he agreed to surrender the town, if, before a certain term, no relief arrived. Charles, informed of these conditions, determined to make an attempt for saving the place. He collected, with some difficulty, an army of 14,000 men, of whom one half were Scots; and he sent them thither under the command of the Earl of Buchan, Constable of France; who was attended by the Earl of Douglas his countraman, the Duke of Alençon, the Marschal de la Faye, the Count of Aumale, and the Viscount of Normandy. When the constable arrived within a few leagues of Yvr, he found that he was cut off too late, and took the place by assault. The brave garrison, unable to make any further resistance, was obliged to capitulate; and he agreed to surrender the town, if, before a certain term, no relief arrived. Charles, informed of these conditions, determined to make an attempt for saving the place. He collected, with some difficulty, an army of 14,000 men, of whom one half were Scots; and he sent them thither under the command of the Earl of Buchan, Constable of France; who was attended by the Earl of Douglas his countraman, the Duke of Alençon, the Marschal de la Faye, the Count of Aumale, and the Viscount of Normandy. When the constable arrived within

England, and threw herself under the protection of the Duke of Gloucester. That prince, with many noble qualities, had the defect of being governed by an impetuous temper and vehement passions; and he was rashly indulged, as well by the charms of the countess herself, as by the prospect of possessing her rich inheritance, to offer himself to her as a husband.

Without waiting for a papal dispensation; without endeavouring to reconcile the Duke of Burgundy to the marriage without his consent. The Duke of Brabant died; and his widow before she could recover possession of her dominions, was obliged to declare the Duke of Burgundy her heir, in case she should die without issue, and to promise never to contract a new marriage. The marriage with Jaueline was terminated thus by the satisfaction of Philip, it left a disagreeable impression on his mind; it excited an extreme jealousy of the English, and opened his eyes to his true interest; and as nothing but his anxiety against Charles had engaged him in alliance with them, it counterbalanced that passion by another of the same kind, which in the end became prevalent, and brought him back, by degrees, to his natural connections with his family and his native country.

About the same time the Duke of Brittany began to withdraw himself from the English alliance. His brother, the Count of Richemont, though connected by marriage with the Dukes of Burgundy and Bedford, was extremely attached by inclination to the French interest; and he was willing to be instrumental to all the advantages which Charles made him for obtaining his friendship. The staff of conference was thereby consequently allowed to enter to him; and as his martial and ambitious temper aspired to the command of armies, which he had in vain attempted to obtain from the Duke of Bedford, he not only accepted the offer of that office, but brought the other brothers to an alliance with the French monarch. The new constable, having made this one change in his measures, firmly adhered, ever after, to his engagements with France. Though his pride and enmity, which were not without some degree of success, and even permitted him to assassinate his other favourites, had so much disgusted Charles, that he once banished him the court, and refused to admit him to his presence, he still acted with vigour for the service of that monarch, and, in his capacity, the pardon of all past offences.

In this situation, the Duke of Bedford, on his return, found the affairs of France, after passing eight months in England. The Duke of Burgundy was much disgusted. The Duke of Brittany had entered into engagements with Charles, and had done homage to that prince for his duchy. The French had been allowed to recover from the astonishment into which their frequent disasters had thrown them. An incident too had happened, which served extremely to raise their courage. The Earl of Warwick had besieged Montargis, which the Earl of Burgundy, impatient of the impotency of his brother's temper, was still the chief obstacle to all accommodation. For this reason, instead of pushing the victory gained at Vincennes, he found himself obliged to take a journey into England, and to try, by his counsels and authority, to moderate the measures of the Duke of Gloucester.

There had likewise broken out some differences among the English ministry, which had proceeded to great extremities, and which required the regent's presence to compose them. The Bishop of Winchester, to whom the care of the king's person and education had been intrusted, was a prelate of great capacity and experience, but of an impetuous and unruly character; and as he was averse to the government of affairs, he had continual disputes with his nephew, the protector; and he gained frequent advantages over the vehement and impulsive temper of the regent. The Duke of Gloucester, who was actuated by the authority of parliament to reconcile them; and these rivals were obliged to promise, before that assembly, that they would bury all quarrels in oblivion. Time also seemed to open expedients for composition; and promised to the regent the duchy of Cornwall. The credit of that prince had procured a bull from the Pope; by which not only Jaueline's contract with the Duke of Gloucester was annulled; but it was also declared, that even in case of the Duke of Brabant's death, it should never be lawful for her to espouse the English prince. Humphrey, despairing of success, married another lady of inferior rank, who had lived some time with him as his mistress. The Duke of Brabant died; and his widow, before she could recover possession of her dominions, was obliged to declare the Duke of Burgundy her heir, in case she should die without issue, and to promise never to contract a new marriage. the balance between the two nations, and propose the way for the final conquest of France.

The city of Orleans was so situated between the provinces commanded by Henry, and those possessed by Charles, that it opened an easy entrance to either, and as the Duke of Bedford intended to make a great effort for penetrating into the south of France, it behoved him to begin with this place, which was the key of the kingdom, and become the nearest in importance in the kingdom. He conducted the conduct of the enterprise to the Earl of Salisbury, who had newly brought him a reinforcement of six thousand men from England, and who had much distinguished himself, by his able conduct during the course of the present war. Salisbury, passing the Loire, made himself master of several small places, which surrounded Orleans on that side; and as his intentions were thereby known, the French king used every expedition to supply the city with a garrison and provisions, and enable it to maintain a long and obstinate siege.

The Lord of Gacour, a brave and experienced captain, was appointed governor: many officers of distinction threw themselves into the place; the troops which they conducted were issued to war, and were determined to make the most obstinate resistance; and even the inhabitants, disciplined by the long continuance of hostilities, were well qualified, in their own defence, to second the efforts of the most veteran forces. The eyes of all Europe were turned towards this scene; where, it was reasonably supposed, the French were to make their last stand for maintaining the independence of their monarchy and the rights of their sovereign.

The Earl of Salisbury at last approached the place with an army, which consisted only of ten thousand men; and not being able, with so small a force, to invest so great a city, he commanded a bridge over the Loire, he stationed himself on the southern side towards Sologne, leaving the other, towards the Beauce, still open to the enemy. He there attacked the fortifications which guarded the entrance of that bridge, and, after a long and obstinate warfare, he carried several of them; but was himself killed by a cannon-ball as he was taking a view of the enemy. The Earl of Suffolck succeeded to the command; and being reinforced with great number of English, and Burgundians, he passed the river with the main body of his army, and invested Orleans on the other side. As it was now the depth of winter, Suffolk, who found it difficult, in that season, to throw intrenchments all around, contented himself, for the present, with erecting redoubts at different distances, where his men were lodged in safety, and were ready to intercept the supplies which the enemy might attempt to throw into the place. Though he had several places in his camp, (and he was among the first sieges in Europe where cannon were found to be of importance,) the art of engineering was hitherto so imperfect, that Suffolk trusted more to famine than to force for subduing the city; and he prepared in the spring to render the circumvallation more complete, by drawing intrenchments from one redoubt to another. Numberless feats of valour were performed both by the besiegers and besieged during the winter: bold sallies were made, and repulsed with equal boldness: convoys were sometimes introduced and often intercepted: the supplies were still unequal to the consumption of the place; and the English seemed destined, though slowly, to be advancing towards the completion of their enterprise.

A.D. 1429. But while Suffolk lay in this situation, the French parties ravaged all the country around; and though he was obliged to choose his provisions from a distance, were themselves exposed to the danger of want and famine. Sir John Fastolfe was bringing up a large convoy of every kind of stores, which he was to be joined with a detachment of two thousand five hundred men, and he was joined by a body of four thousand French, under the command of the Counts of Clermont and Dunois. Fastolfe drew up his troops behind the wagons; but the French generals, afraid of tion: a young prince expelled his throne by the sedition of native subjects, and by the arts of strangers, could not fail to move the compassion of all his people, whose hearts were uncorrupted by faction; and the peculiar character of this prince was composed of the fiercest passions, naturally rendered him the hero of that sex whose generous minds know no bounds in their affections.

The siege of Orleans, the progress of the English before that town, the greater distress of that garrison and inhabitants, the importance of saving this city and its brave defenders, had turned thither the public eye; and Joan, infamed by the general sentiment, was seized with a wild determination to do her utmost to relieve her present distresses. Her unexperienced mind, working day and night on this favourite object, mustop the inspirations of passion for heavenly inspirations; and she fancied that she saw visions, and heard voices, exhorting her to re-establish the throne of France, and to expel the foreign invaders.

An uncommon intrepidity of temper made her overlook all the dangers which might attend her in such a path; and thinking herself destined by Heaven to this office, she threw aside all that bashfulness and timidity so natural to her sex, her years, and her low station. She went to Vaucouleurs; procured admission to Baudoinecourt the governor; informed him of her inspirations and intentions; and was received by him with the most open and frankness. He spoke to her; but to second those heavenly revelations which impelled her to this glorious enterprise. Baudoinecourt treated her at first with some neglect; but on her firmness and extraordinary representations of her reasons, he began to remark something extraordinary in the maid, and was inclined, at all hazards, to make so easy an experiment. It is uncertain whether this gentleman had discernment enough to perceive that great use might be made with the vulgar of so uncommon an engine; or, what is more likely, in that credulous age, was himself a convert to this visionary; but he adopted at last the schemes of Joan; and he gave her some attendants, who conducted her to the French court, which at that time resided at Chinon.

It is the business of history to distinguish between the miraculous and the marvellous; to reject the first in all narrations merely profane and human; to doubt the second; and when obliged by unquestionable testimony, as in the present case, to admit of something extraordinary, to receive as little of it as is consistent with the known facts and circumstances. It is pretended, that Joan, imbued with the visions, had seen the king, though he had never seen his face before, and though he purposely kept himself in the crowd of courtiers, and had laid aside every thing in his dress and apparel which might distinguish him from any other person. He had been, by the Supreme Creator, to raise the siege of Orleans, and conduct him to Rheims to be there crowned and anointed; and on his expressing doubts of his mission, revealed to him, before some confidants, a secret, which was unknown to all the world beside himself, and which nothing but a heavenly inspiration could have discovered to her; and that she demanded, as the instrument of her future victories, a particular sword, which was kept in the church of St. Catherine of Fierbois, and which, though she had never seen it, she described by all its marks, and by the place in which it had long lain neglected. This is certain, that all these miraculous stories were spread abroad, in order to captivate confidants, a secret, which was unknown to all the world beside himself, and which nothing but a heavenly inspiration could have discovered to her; and that she demanded, as the instrument of her future victories, a particular sword, which was kept in the church of St. Catherine of Fierbois, and which, though she had never seen it, she described by all its marks, and by the place in which it had long lain neglected. banishing these vain terrors by hurry, and action, and war, he wasted till the soldiers should recover from the pain; and he thereby gave leisure for their prepossessions to sink still deeper in their minds. The military maxims which are prudent in common cases, deceived him in these unaccountable events. The English felt their courage daunted and overwhelmed; and thence inferred a divine vengeance hung over them. The French drew the same inference from an inactivity so new and unexpected. Every circumstance was now reversed in the opinions of men, on which all depends; the spirit resulting from a long interrupted success was on a sudden transferred from the victors to the vanquished.

The maid called loud, that the garrison should remain no longer on the defensive; and she promised her followers the assistance of Heaven in attacking those redoubts of the enemy which had so long kept them in awe, and which they had never hitherto dared to insult. The generals seconded her ardent: an attack was made on one redoubt, and it proved successful? all the English who defended the intrenchments were put to the sword, or taken prisoners; and Sir John Talbot himself, who had drawn together, from the other redoubts, some troops to bring them relief, durst not appear in the open field against so formidable an enemy.

Nothing, after this success, seemed impossible to the maid and her enthusiastic votaries. She urged the generals to attack the main body of the English in their intrenchments, still in despair, and the British, by their success, hazard the failure of the French, by too great temerity, and sensible that the least reverse of fortune would make all the present visions evaporate, and restore every thing to its former condition, checked her vehemence, and proposed to her first to expel the enemy from their forts on the other side of the river, and thus lay the communication with the country entirely open, before she attempted any more hazardous enterprise. Joan was persuaded, and these were vigorously assailed. At one attack the French was repulsed; the maid was left almost alone; she was obliged to retreat, and join the runaways; but displaying her sacred standard, and animating them with her countenance, her gestures, her exhortations, she led them back to the charge, and overpowered the English in their intrenchments.

In the attack of another fort, she was wounded in the neck with an arrow; she retained a moment behind the assailants; she pulled out the arrow with her own hands; she had the wound quickly dressed; and she hastened back to head the troops, and to plant her victorious banner on the ramparts of the enemy.

By degrees the English were entirely chased from their fortifications on that side: they had lost above six thousand men in these different actions; and, what was still more important, their wonted courage and confidence was broken and gone, and had given place to an inactivity and despair. The maid restored triumphantly over the bridge, and was again received as the guardian angel of the city. After performing such miracles, she convinced the most obdurate incredulity of her divine mission: men felt themselves animated as by a superior energy, and thought nothing impossible to that divine hand which so visibly conducted them. It was in vain even for the English generals to oppose with their soldiers the prevailing opinion of supernatural influence; they themselves were probably moved by the same belief: the utmost they dared to advance was, that Joan was not an instrument of God; she was only the implement of the devil; but the French that day, the English had felt, and the sad experience was, that the devil might be allowed sometimes to prevail, they derived not much consolation from the enforcing of this opinion.

It might prove extremely dangerous for Suffolk, with such intimidated troops, to remain any longer in the presence of so courageous and victorious an enemy; he therefore raised the siege, and retreated with all the precaution imaginable. The French resolved to push their conquests, and to force the English no leisure to recover from their construction. Charles formed a body of six thousand men, and sent them to attack Jeregou, whither Suffolk had retired with a detachment of his army. The siege lasted ten days; and the place was obstinately defended. Joan displayed her wonted intrepidity on this occasion. She descended into the foss in leading the attack, and she there received a blow on the head with a stone, by which she was confounded and beaten to the ground: but she soon recovered herself, and pursued her disability. Suffolk was obliged to yield himself prisoner to a Frenchman called Renaud; but before he submitted, he asked his adversary, whether he were a gentleman! On receiving a negative answer, he concluded the Frenchman was a knight; Renaud replied, that he had not yet attained that honour. Then I make you one, replied Suffolk: upon which he gave him the blow with his sword, which doubled him into that fraternity; and he immediately surrendered himself his prisoner.

The remainder of the English army was commanded by Fastolfe, Scales, and Talbot, who thought of nothing but making a great retreat, as soon as possible, into a place of safety; while the French esteemed the overtopping them equivalent to a victory. So much had the events which passed before Orleans altered every thing between the two nations. The vanguard of the French, under Richemont and Xav several times attacked the remnants of the enemy at the village of Paty. The battle lasted not a moment: the English were disconcerted and fled; the brave Fastolfe himself showed the example of flight to his followers. He was sentenced by a court martial, as a punishment for this instance of cowardice: Two thousand men were killed in this action, and both Talbot and Scales taken prisoners.

In the account of all these successes, the French writers, to magnify the wonder, represent the maid (who was now known by the appellation of the maid of Orleans) as not only active in combat, but as performing the office of general; directing the troops, conducting the military operations, and swareing the revolutions in all councils of war. It is certain, that the policy of the French court endeavored to maintain this appearance with the public: but it is much more probable, that Dunois and the other commanders prompted her in all her measures, than that a country girl, without experience or education, could, on a sudden, become expert in a profession which requires more genius and capacity than any other active scene of life. It is sufficient praise, that she could distinguish the persons on whose judgment she might rely; that she could seize their hints and suggestions, and on a sudden, deliver their opinions as her own; and that she could curb, on occasion, the most impetuous and enthusiastic spirit with which she was actuated, and could temper it with prudence and discretion.

The raising of the siege of Orleans was one part of the maid's enterprise, which Charles could not praise; the crowning of him at Rheims was the other: and she now vehemently insisted that he should forthwith set out on that enterprise. A few weeks before, such a proposal would have appeared the most extravagant in the world. Rheims lay in a distant quarter of the kingdom; was then in the hands of a victorious enemy; the whole road which led to it was occupied by their garrisons; and no man could be so sanguine as to imagine, that such an attempt could so soon come within the bounds of possibility. But it was extremely the interest of Charles to maintain the belief of something extraordinary and divine in these events, and to avail himself of the present consternation of the English, he resolved to send against them the utmost forces of the army presented; and to lead his army upon this promising adventure. Hitherto he had kept remote from the scene of war: as the safety of the state depended upon his person, he had been persuaded to restrain his military ardor; but observing those prosperous turn of affairs, he was now determined to appear at the head of his armies, and to set the example of valour to all his soldiers. And the French nobility saw at once their young sovereign assuming a new and more brilliant character, seconded by fortune, and protected by the hand of Heaven; and they caught fresh zeal to exert themselves in replacing him on the throne of his ancestors.
Charles set out for Rheims at the head of twelve thousand men; he passed by Troye, which opened its gates to him; Chalons imitated the example: Rheims sent him a deputation with its keys, before his approach to it: and he scarcely perceived, as he was passing along, that he was marching through an enemy's country. The ceremony of his coronation was here performed with the holy oil, which was consecrated at Rheims; Sens, Laon, and Orleans were brought from heaven on the first establishment of the French monarchy: the Maid of Orleans stood by his side in complete armour, and displayed her sacred banner, which had so often disdained and confounded his fiercest enemies; and the people shouted with the most ardent demonstrations of joy, viewing such a combination of wonders. After the completion of the ceremony, the maid threw herself at the king's feet, embraced his knees, and, with a flood of tears, pleaded and tenderly extorted from her, she congratulated him on this singular and marvellous event.

Charles, thus crowned and anointed, became more respectable in the eyes of all his subjects, and seemed, in a manner, to receive ane, from a heavenly commission, his title to their allegiance. The inclinations of men swaying their belief, no one doubted of the inspirations and prophetic spirit of the maid: so many incidents, which passed all human comprehension, were attributed to a superior influence: and the red and undoubted facts brought credit to every exaggeration, which could scarcely be rendered more wonderful. Laon, Soissons, Chateau-Thierry, Beauvais, and many other towns and castles, surrendered, at once, to the Maid of Orleans, immediately after Charles's coronation, submitted to him on the first summons; and the whole nation was disposed to give him the most zealous testimonies of their duty and affection.

The Maid of Orleans, therefore, finding the nation so disposed to her, undertook the conquest of the country. She advanced with a higher idea of the power, address, and resolution of the Duke of Bedford. Duke of Bedford, than his being able to maintain himself in so perilous a situation, and to preserve his army, without firing a single shot, from many places, and amidst the universal inclination of the rest to imitate that contemptuous example. This prince seemed present everywhere by his vigilance and foresight; he employed every resource which fortune had yet left him: he put all the English garrisons in a posture of defence: he kept a watchful eye over every attempt among the French towards an insurrection: he retained the Parliaments in obedience, by alternately employing caresses and severity; and knowing that the Duke of Burgundy was already wavering in his fidelity, he acted with so much skill and prudence, as to renew, in this dangerous crisis, his alliance with that prince; an alliance of the utmost importance to the credit and support of the English government.

The small supplies which he received from England set the talents of this great man in a still stronger light. The ardour of the English for foreign conquests was now extremely obviated by time and reflection: the parliament seems even to have become sensible of the danger which might attend their further progress: no supply of money could be obtained by the regent during his greatest distresses; and men enlisted slowly under his standard, or soon deserted, by reason of the wonderful accounts which had reached England, of the magic, and sorcery, and desolative power of the Maid of Orleans. It happened fortunately, in this emergency, that the Bishop of Winchester, now created a cardinal, landed at Calais with a body of five thousand men, which he was conducting into Bohemia, on a crusade against the Hussites. He was persuaded to lend these troops to his nephew during the present difficulties; and the regent was thereby enabled to take the field, and to oppose the French king, who was advancing with his army to the gates of Paris.

The extraordinary conduct of the Maid of Orleans and of the Duke of Bedford appeared also in his military operations. He attempted to restore the courage of his troops by boldly advancing; to the face of the enemy; but he chose his posts with so much caution and carelessness, that two of his generals, who were ordered to cover him, were easily taken by the French. He still attended that prince in all his movements, covered his own towns and garrisons; and kept himself in a posture to reap advantage from every imprudence or false step of the enemy. The French army, which consisted mostly of volunteers, who served at their own expense, 1000 after retired and was disbanded: Charles went to Bourges, the ordinary place of his residence, but not till he made himself master of Compiègne, Beaufrais, Senlis, Abbeville, the neighbourhood of Paris, the affections of the people had put into his hands.

The regent endeavoured to revive the declining state of his affairs by bringing over the young King of England, and having him confirmed as Duke of Burgundy. All the French vassals of the crown who lived within the provinces possessed by the English, swore a new allegiance, and did homage to him. But this ceremony was cold and insipid, compared with the issue, which had attended the coronation of Charles at Rheims; and the Duke of Bedford expected more effect from an accident, which put into his hands the person that had been the author of all his calamities.

The Maid of Orleans, after the coronation of Charles, declared to the Count of Dunois, that her wishes were now fully gratified, and that she had no further desire than to maintain the state, and preserve the condition and course of life which became her sex: but that nobleman, sensible of the great advantages which might still be reaped from her presence in the army, exhorted her to persevere, till, by the final expulsion of the English, she had brought all the French towns to their full completion. In pursuance of this advice, she threw herself into the town of Compiègne, which was at that time besieged by the Duke of Burgundy, assisted by the Earls of Arundel and Suffolk; and Charles, animating her, on her appearance, believed himself therefor invincible. But their joy was of short duration. The maid, next day, after her arrival, headed a sally upon the quarters of John of Luxembourg: she twice drove the enemy from their intrenchments; finding their numbers to increase every moment, she ordered a retreat; when hard pressed by the pursuers, she turned upon them, and made them again retreat; but being here deserted by her friends, and surrounded by the enemy, she was at last, after exerting the utmost valour, taken prisoner by the Burgundians. The common opinion was, that the French officers, finding the merit of every victory ascribed to her, had in envy to her renown, by which they themselves were so much eclipsed, willingly exposed her to this fatal accident.

The entry of her friends, on this occasion, was not a greater proof of her merit than the triumph of her enemies. A complete victory would not have given more joy to the English and their partizans. The service of Te Deum, which has so often been professed by princes, was publicly celebrated, on this fortunate event, at Paris. The Duke of Bedford fancied, that, by the captivity of that extraordinary woman, who had blasted all his successes, he should again recover his former ascendant over France; and to push further the present advantage, he purchased the captive from John of Luxembourg, and formed a prosecution against her, which, whether it proceeded from reason or policy, was equally barbarous and dishonourable.

There was no possible reason why Joan should not be regarded as a prisoner of war, and to be entitled to all the courtesy and good usage which civilized nations practise towards enemies on such occasions. She had never, in her military capacity, forfeited, by any act of treachery or cruelty, her claim to that treatment: she was unsubdued by any civil crime: even the virtues and the very decencies of her sex had ever been rigidly observed by her; and she, with her grace and fertility, leading armies to battle, may seem an exception, she had thereby performed such signal service to her prince, that she had abundantly compensated for this irregularity; and was, on that very account, the mark of an object of more admiration than was necessary, therefore, for the Duke of Bedford to interest religion some way in the prosecution; and to cover, under that cloak, his violation of justice, and humanity.

The Bishop of Beverley, a man wholly devoted to the English interests, presented a petition against Joan, on pretence that she was taken within the bounds of his diocese; and he desired her tried by an ecclesiastical court. Mercy, impuity, and magic: she, however, regarded the victory of Pope and King as the joint request: several prelates, among whom the Cardinal of Winchester was the only Englishman, were appointed her judges: they held their court in Rouen, where the young King of England was resident; and the Bishop, in her formal military apparatus, but loaded with irons, was produced before this tribunal.

She first desired to be eased of her chains: her judges answered, that she had once already attempted an escape, by throwing herself from a tower; she confessed the fact, maintained the justice of her intention, and owned that, if she could, she would still execute that purpose. All her other speeches showed the same firmness and intrepidity: though harassed with interrogatories during the course of near four months, she never betrayed any weakness or womanish submission; and no advantage was gained over her. The point which her judges pushed most vehemently, was her visions and revelations, and intercourse with departed saints; and they asked her, whether she would submit to the church the truth of these, and said she did, but they would submit them to God, the fountain of truth. They then exclaimed, that she was a heretic, and denied the authority of the church. She appealed to the Pope: they rejected her appeal.

They asked her, why she put trust in her standard, which had been consecrated by magical mountations? She replied, that she put trust in the Supreme Being alone, whose image was impressed upon it. They demanded that the curule was consecrated in her hands. In the anointment and coronation of Charles at Rheims? She answered, that the person who had shared the danger was entitled to share the glory. When accused of going to war without authority, and contrary to the laws and custom of her sex, and of assuming the government and command over men; she scrupled not to reply, that her sole purpose was to defeat the English, and to expel them the kingdom. In the issue, she was condemned for all the crimes of which she had been accused, aggravated by heresy; her revelations were declared to be inventions of the devil to delude the people; and she was sentenced to be delivered over to the secular arm.

Joan, so long surrounded by inveterate enemies, who treated her with every mark of contumely; brow-beaten and overawed by men of superior rank, and invested with the ensigns of a sacred character, which she had been taught to cherish, and felt her spirit at last subdued; and those visionary dreams of inspiration, in which she had been buoyed up by the triumphs of success and the applause of her own party, gave way to the terrors of that punishment to which she was condemned. She publicly declared herself willing to recant; she acknowledged the illusion of those revelations which the church had rejected; and she promised never more to maintain them. Her sentence was then mitigated: she was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and to be fed during life on bread and water.

Enough was now done to fulfill all political views, and to convince both the French and the English, that the opinion of divine influence, which had so much encouraged the one and daunted the other, was entirely without foundation. But the horrid vengeance of Joan's enemies was not yet finished with this victory. Suspecting that the female dress which she had now taken on, and which was disagreeable to her, they purposely placed in her apartment a suit of men's apparel; and watched for the effects of that temptation upon her. On the sight of a dress, in which she had never before in her life, she at first cried out, that she never before in her life, she at first cried out, and then went away and sat down. But her heart, when it recovered itself, was at last persuaded, and she rose up, and said she had been mistaken. And then she asked, whether she were so far in error, and she rose up, and said she had been mistaken. And then she asked, whether she were so far in error, she asked, whether she were so far in error, she asked, whether she were so far in error, she asked, whether she were so far in error, she asked, whether she were so far in error, her servitors and passions revived; and the venture in her solitude to clothe herself again in the forbidden garment. Her insidious enemies caught her in that situation: her fault was interpreted to be no less than a relapse into heresy: no recantation would now suffice, and no pardon could be granted her. She was condemned to be burned in the market-place of Rouen; and the infamous sentence was accomplished: she was executed the next day, in heramber, to whom the more generous superstition of the ancients would have erected altars, was, on pretence of heresy and magic, delivered over alive to the flames, and expiated, by that dreadful punishment, the sacred service which she had rendered to her prince, and to her native country.

The affairs of the English, far from being advanced by this execution, went every day more and more to decay: the great abilities of the regent were unable to resist the strong inclination, which had seized the French, to return under the obedience of their rightful sovereign, and which that act of cruelty was fitted to remove. Chartrres was surprised by a stratagem of the Count of Donon: a body of the English, under Lord Willoughby, was defeated at St. Celerin, upon the Sartre; the fair in the suburbs of Lien, seated to the midst of the English. The unfortunate was pillaged, with all his effects, by the English, and menaced them with an approaching revolution. But the chief detriment which the regent sustained, was by the death of his duchess, who had hitherto preserved some balance of friendship between him and his brother the Duke of Burgundy; and his marriage soon afterwards, with Jaquetine of Luxembourg, was the beginning of a breach between them. Philip complained, that the regent had never had the civility to conform to the marriage; and suddenly a marriage was a slight on his sister's memory. The Cardinal of Winchester mediated a reconciliation between these princes, and brought both of them to St. Omer's for that purpose. The Duke of Bedford here expected the first visit, both as he was son, brother, and uncle to a king, and because he had already made such advances as to come into the Duke of Burgundy's territories, in order to have an interview with him: but his approach of ten great power and independent dominions, refused to pay this compliment to the regent: and the two princes, unable to adjust the ceremonials, parted without seeing each other. A bad prognostic of their cordial intentions to renew past favours.

Nothing could be more repugnant to the De spite of interests of the house of Burgundy, than to the Duke of Bedford, to unite the crowns of France and England under the same head; an event, which, had it taken place, would have reduced the duke to the rank of a petty prince, and have rendered his situation entirely dependent and precarious. The title also to the crown of France, which, after the failure of the elder branches, might accrue to the duke or his posterity, had been sacrificed by the treaty of Troye; and strangers and enemies were thereby irrevocably fixed upon the throne. Revenge alone had carried Philip into these impolite measures; and a point of honour had hitherto induced him to maintain them. But as it is the nature of passion gradually to decay, while the sense of interest maintains a permanent influence and authority, the duke had, in some years, a pretense sensibly to relent in his animosity against Charles, and to hearken willingly to the apologies made by that prince for the murder of the late Duke of Burgundy. His extreme youth was pleaded in his favour; his incapacity to judge for himself was pleaded; the ascendant greatness over him by his ministers; and his inability to resent a deed, which, without his knowledge, had been perpetrated by those under whose guidance he was then placed. The more to flatter the prince's new humbleness, he was commanded from his court and presence Tanevru de Chatel, and all those who were concerned in that assassination; and had offered to make every other atonement which could be required of him. The distress which Charles had already suffered, had tended to gratify the duke's revenge; the misery, to which France had been so long exposed, had begun to move his compassion; and the cries of all Europe admonished him, that his resentment, which might hitherto be deemed pious, would, if carried further, be unpopular, dangerous, and contagious. While the duke was in this disposition, every disgust which he received from England made a double impression upon him; the entreaties of the Count of Richemont and other persons of high rank, appeared as ambassadors from France; and the English having also been invited to attend, the Cardinal of Winchester, the Bishops of Norwich and St. David's, the Earl of Huntingdon and Suffolk, with others, received from the protector and council a commission to negotiate.

The conferences were held in the abbey of August.

St. Vaast; and began with discussing the proposals of the two crowns, which were so wide of each other, that the French ambassador was offered to cede Normandy with Guernsey, but both of them loaded with the usual homage and vassalage to the crown. As the claims of England upon France were universally unpopular in Europe, the mediators declared the offer of Cæsar a proposal too extravagant to be taken with the other English ambassadors, without giving a particular detail of their demands, immediately left the congress. There remained nothing but to discuss the mutual demands, and concessions, which were easily adjusted; the vassal was in a situation to give law to his superior; and he exacted conditions, which, had it not been for the present necessity, would have been deemed, to the last degree, dishonorable, and disadvantageous to the crown of France. Besides making repeated atonements and acknowledgments for the murder of the Duke of Burgundy, Charles was obliged to cede all the towns of Picardy, which had been between the Somme and the Low Countries; he yielded several other territories; he agreed, that these and all the other dominions of Philip should be held by him, during his life, without doing any homage, or swearing fealty to the present king; and he freed his subject from all feudal vassalage. He also stipulated, that the title of Duke of Burgundy should not be granted to any one, who should not have been born under the blood of the house of Bourgogne, and that his son-in-law, the Counts of Artois, should be admitted into that title.

A.D. 1435.

Such were the conditions upon which France purchased the friendship of the Duke of Burgundy.

The friend of Burgundy wrote to the Duke of Gloucester with a letter, in which he notified the conclusion of the treaty of Arras, and apologized for his departure from that of Troyes. The council received the herald with great coldness: they even assumed him his lodgings in a shoemaker's house, by way of insult; and the populace were so incensed, that the Duke of Gloucester had not given him guards, his life had been exposed to danger, when he appeared in the streets. The Flemings, and other subjects of Philip, were insulted, and some of them murdered by the Londoners; and every thing seemed to tend towards a rupture between the two nations. These violences were not disagreeable to the Duke of Burgundy; as they afforded him a pre- tence for the further measures which he intended to take against the English, whom he now regarded as implacable and dangerous enemies.

A few days after the Duke of Bedford died, the English received intelligence of this event, so far as the Duke of Bedford, to the interests of England, he died at Rouen; a prince of great abilities, and of many virtues; and whose memory, except from the barbarous execution of the Maid of Orleans, was unassailed by any considerable klenish. Isabella, Queen of France, died a little before him, despaired by the English, detested by the French, and reduced in her later years to regard, with an unnatural horror, the progress and success of her own son, in recovering possession of his kingdom. This period was also signalized by the death of the Earl of Arundel, a great English general, who, though he commanded three thousand men, was deserted by the head of six hundred, and soon after expired of the wounds which he received in the action.

The violent factions which prevailed between the Duke of Burgundy and the Cardinal of Winchester prevented the English from taking the proper measures for repairing these multiplied losses, and threw all their affairs into confusion. The popularity of the duke, and his near relation to the crown, gave him advantages in the contest which he often lost by his open and unguarded temper, unfit to struggle with the politic and interested spirit of his rival. The balance, meanwhile, of these parties, kept every thing in suspense; foreign affairs were much neglected: and though the Duke of York, son to that Earl of Cambridge who was executed in the beginning of the last reign, was appointed successor to the Duke of Bedford, it was seven months before his commission passed the seals; and the English remained so long in an enemy's country without a proper head or governor.

The new governor, on his arrival, found the capital already plundered, and the state of the kingdom always been more attached to the Burgundian than to the English interest; and after the conclusion of the treaty of Arras, their affections, without any further control, universally led them to return to their allegiance under their native sovereign.

When together with Lord Adam, the same person who had before put Paris into the hands of the Duke of Burgundy, was introduced in the night-time by intelligence with the citizens: Lord Adam, who, according to an English writer, had only a small garrison of 1500 men, was expelled: this nobleman dis- covered valour and presence of mind on the occasion; but unable to guard so large a place against such multitudes, he retired into the castle, and being there invested, he delivered up that fortress, and was contented to stipulate for the safe retreat of his troops into Normandy.

In the same season the Duke of Burgundy openly took part against England, and commenced hostilities by the siege of Calais, the only place which now gave the English any sure hold of France, and still rendered them dangerous. As he was beloved among his own subjects, and had acquired the epithet of Good, from his popular qualities, he was able to interest all the inhabitants of the Low Countries in the success of this enterprise; and he invested that place with an army, formidable from its numbers, but without experience, discipline, or military spirit. On this plan of this siege, the Duke of Gloucester assembled some forces, sent a deputation to Philip, and challenged him to wait the event of a battle, which was promised to him, as soon as the wind would permit him to reach Calais. The warlike genius of the English had at that time rendered them terrible in all the northern parts of Europe; especially to the Flemings, who were more expert in manufactures than in arms; and the Duke of Burgundy, being already foiled in some attempts before Calais, and observing the discontent and terror of his own army, thought proper to raise the siege, and to retreat before the arrival of the enemy.

The English were still masters of many fine provinces in France; but retained possession, more by the extreme weakness of Charles, than by the strength of their own garrisons, or the force of their armies. Nothing indeed can be more surprising than the feeble efforts made, during the course of several years, by these two potent nations against each other; while the one struggled for independence, and the other aspired to a total conquest of its rival. The general want of industry, commerce, and policy, in that age, had rendered all the European nations, and France and England no less than the others, unfit for bearing the burthen of war, when it was prolonged beyond one session; and the continuance of hostilities had long ere this time, exhausted the force and patience of both kingdoms. Scarcely could the appearance of an army be brought into the field, on either side, without all the operations and treachery of the present age, which were performed by small bodies, assembled on a sudden from the neighbouring garrisons. In this desperate state of the affairs of war, the French king had before used so much advantage: the affections of the people were entirely on his side; intelligence was early brought him of the state and motions of the enemy: the inhabitants were ready to assist, upon the approach of the English army, and being assayed by the valor of Lord Talbot, soon after created Earl of Shrewsbury, he performed actions which acquired him honour, but merit not the attention of posterity. It would have been well, had this feeble war, sparing the blood of the people, prevented likewise all other oppressions; and had the fury of men, which reason and justice cannot restrain, thus happily received a check from their impotency and inability. But the French and English, though they exerted in this war all the most destructive engines of war, were soon sensible of the wasteful, ruinous, and destitute consequences of these hostilities which decided nothing, seemed at last disastrous of peace, and they set on foot negotiations for that purpose. But the proposals of France, and the demands of England, were such to many each other, that all hope of accommodation immediately vanished. The English ambassadors demanded restitution of all the provinces which had once been annexed to England, together with the final cession of Calais and its district; and required the possession of these extensive territories without the burden of any fealty or homage on the part of their prince: the French offered only part of Guienne, part of Normandy, and Calais, loaded with the usual burdens. It appeared in the balance of these negotiations, that the French had the most promising little prospect of agreement. The English were still too haughty to stoop from the vast hopes which they had formerly entertained, and to accept of terms more suitable to the present diminution of the two kingdoms. The Duke of York soon after resigned his government to the Earl of Warwick, a nobleman of reputation, whom death prevented from long enjoying this dignity. The duke, upon the demise of that nobleman, returned to his charge, and during his administration, a truce was concluded between the King of England and the Duke of Burgundy, which had become necessary for the commercial interests of their subjects. The war with France continued in the same languid and feeble terms. The captivity of five princes of the blood, taken prisoners in the battle of Azincour, was a considerable advantage which England long enjoyed over its enemy; but this superiority was entirely lost by the death of these princes who had died; some had been ransomed; and the Duke of Orleans, the most powerful among them, was the last that remained in the hands of the English. He offered the English nobles a truce; and when his last proposal was laid before the council of England, as every question was there an object of faction, the party of the Duke of Gloucester, and that of the Cardinal of Winchesbut had not credit to effect his purpose. The cardinal and his friends had cast their eye on Margaret of Anjou, daughter of Regnier, titular King of Sicily, Naples, and Jerusalem, and afterwards the Count of Mortain, brother of Charles V, who had left these magnificent titles, but without any real power or possessions, to his posterity.

This princesse was the most accomplished of her age both in body and mind; and seemed to possess those quick and vivid perceptions, together with her father's ascendant over Henry, and to supply all his defects and weaknesses. Of a masculine, courageous spirit, of an enterprising temper, endowed with solidity as well as vivacity of understanding, she had not wanted ability to develop these great talents even in the privacy of her father's family; and it was reasonable to expect, that when she should mount the throne, they would break out with still superior lustre. The Earl of Suffolk, therefore, in concert with his associates of the English council, made proposals of marriage to Margaret, which were accepted. But this nobleman, besides pre-occupying the princesse's favour, by being the chief means of her advancement, endeavoured to unite himself with her and her family by a very extraordinary cessions: though Margaret brought no dowry with her, he ventured of gift Anjou, himself, without any direct authority from the council, but with the assent of the council, and the ruling members, to engage, by a secret article, that the province of Maine, which was at that time in the hands of the English, should be ceded to Charles of Anjou, whom he pretended to have received as a natural, the French king, and who had already received from his master the grant of that province as his appanage.

The treaty of marriage was ratified in England: Suffolk obtained first the title of marquis, then that of duke; and even received the seals of parliament, and the favours of the English court in concluding it. The princesse fell immediately into close connexions with the cardinal and his party, the Dukes of Somerset, Suffolk, and Buckingham; who, fortified by her new income, and by her engagement, resolved on the final run of the Duke of Gloucester.

A D. 1447. This generous prince, worsted in all court intrigues, for which his temper was not suited; but possessing, in a high degree, the favour of the public, had already received from his rivals a cruel mortification, which he had hitherto borne without violating public peace, but which it was impossible that a person of his spirit and humanity could ever forgive. For a duke, the daughter of Regnier, Lord Cobham, had been accused of the crime of witchcraft, and it was pretended that there was found in her possession a waxen figure of the king, which she and her associates, Sir Roger Bolingbroke, Sir William Scrope, and others, had made in a magical manner before a slow fire, with an intention of making Henry's force and vigour waste away by insensible degrees. The accusation was well calculated to affect the weak and credulous mind of the king, and to paralyse belief in an ignorant age; and the duchess was brought to trial with her confederates. The nature of this crime, so opposite to all common sense, seems always to exempt the accusers from observing the rules of common sense in their evidence: the princesse were pronounced guilty; the duchess was condemned to do public penance, and to suffer perpetual imprisonment; the others were executed. But, as these violent proceedings were ascribed only to the production of the duke's enemies, they were in contrary to their usual practice in such most marvellous trials, acquitted the unhappy sufferers; and increased their esteem and affection towards a prince, who was thus exposed, without protection, to those mortal injuries.

These sentiments of the public made the Cardinal of Winchester and his party sensible that it was necessary to destroy a man whose popularity might become dangerous, and whose kingdom was a source of national prosperity and hind. In order to effect their purpose, a parliament was summoned to meet, at not London, which was supposed to be too well affected to the duke, but at St. Edmonds-

HISTORY OF ENGLAND. [A.D. 1448.—CHAP. XXI.

Surrey's disobedience, refused to admit him: and this adventurer, not daring to commit depredations on the territories either of the king of France or of England, marched into Brittany, seized the town of Fougères, repaired the fortifications of Pontorson and St. James de Beavron, and subsisted his troops by the ravages which he exercised on that whole province.1 The Duke of Brittany complained of his proceedings to the king of France, his humble lord: Charles renounced with the Duke of Somerset: that nobleman replied, that the injury was done without his private, and that he had no authority over Surrey and his companions.2 Though this answer ought to have appeased the anger of Charles, who had often felt severe the licentious, independent spirit of such mercenary soldiers, he never would admit of the apology. He still insisted that these plunderers should be recalled, and that reparation should be made to the Duke of Brittany for the damage he had sustained: and, in order to render an accommodation absolutely impracticable, he made the estimation of damages amount to no less a sum than 1,600,000 crowns. He was sensible of the superiority which the present state of his affairs gave him over England; and he determined to take advantage of it.

No sooner was the truce concluded between the two kingdoms than Charles employed himself, with great industry and judgment, in repairing those numerous ills to which France, from the continuance of wars, both foreign and domestic, had so long been exposed. He restored the course of public justice; reformed the discipline of his troops; he repressed faction in his court; he reformed the languid state of agriculture and arts; and, in the course of a few years, he rendered his kingdom Bourbon to itself, and formed public wealth. Meanwhile, affairs in England had taken a very different turn. The court was divided into parties, which were enraged against each other: the people were discontented with the government; congregations in France, which were an object more of glory than of interest, were overlooked amidst domestic incidents, which engrossed the attention of all men: the governor of Normandy, ill supplied with military forces, was able to dispute the greater part of his troops, and to allow the fortifications of the towns and castles to become ruinous: and the nobility and people of that province had, during the late open communication with France, enjoyed frequent opportunities of renewing connexions with their ancient master, and of contracting the means for expelling the English. The occasion, therefore, seemed favourable to Charles for breaking the truce. Normandy was at once invaded by four powerful armies; one of them, the king himself, secondly by the Duke of Brittany; a third by the Duke of Alençon; and a fourth by the Count of Dunois. The places opened their gates almost as soon as the enemy appeared before them: Vernon, Nogent, Chateau Gaillard, Pont de Men, Gisors, Maine, Vernon, Argentan, Lisseux, Fecamp, Coutances, Besenes, Pont de l'Aarch, fell in an instant into the hands of the enemy. The Duke of Somerset, so far from having an army which could take the field, and relieve these places, was not able to supply them with the necessary garrisons and provisions. He retired with the few troops of which he was master into Rouen; and thought it sufficient, till the arrival of succours from England, he could save that capital from the general fate of the province. The King of France, at the head of a formidable army, fifty thousand strong, presented himself before the gates: the dangerous example of revolt had infested the inhabitants; and they called aloud for a capitulation. Somerset, unable to resist at once both the enemies within and without, retired with his garrison into the palace and castle, which being placed inaccessible, he was obliged to surrender; he parleyed a short time to Harfleur by the payment of 56,000 crowns, by engaging to surrender Arques, Tancarville, Caudebec, Harfleur, and the town of the bay, by delivering hostages for the performance of articles.1 The governor of Harfleur refused to obey his orders; upon which the Earl of Shrewsbury, who was one of the hostages, was detained prisoner; and the English were thus deprived of the only general capable of recovering them from their present distressed situation. Harfleur made a better defence under Sir Thomas Curson the governor; but was finally obliged to open its gates to Dunois. Succours at last appeared from England under Sir Thomas Knyvett.1 But Harfleur, the last place of Normandy, which remained in the hands of the English, being delivered up, the conquest of that important province was finished in a twelvemonth by Charles, to the great joy of the inhabitants and of his whole kingdom.2

Alike rapid success attended the French arms in Guienne; though the inhabitants of that province were, from long custom, believed to the English government. Dunois was despatched thither, and The English met with no resistance in the field, and very little from the towns. Great improvements had been made, during this age, in the structure and management of artillery, and none of France, which, and the art of defence was by that means more unequal, than either before or since, to the art of attack. After all the small places about Bourdeaux were reduced, the city agreed to submit, if not relieved by a certain time; and as no one in England thought seriously of these distant concerns, no relief appeared; the place surrendered; and Havonne being taken soon after, this whole province, which had remained united to England, was deserted by the English in a period of three centuries, finally swallowed up in the French monarchy.

Though no peace or truce was concluded between France and England, the war would be monotonous, at an end: The English, torn in pieces by the civil dissensions which ensued, made but one feeble effort more for the recovery of Guienne: and Charles, occupied at home in regulating the government, and fending against the intrigues of his factious son, Louis the dauphin, scarcely ever attempted to invade them in their island, or to retaliate upon them, by availing himself of their intestine confusions.

CHAP. XXI.

HENRY VI.

A weak prince, seated on the throne of England, had never failed, good howsoever, ignorant and innocent, to be infected with faction, discontent, rebellion, and civil commotions; and as the incapacity of Henry appeared every day in a tuller light, these dangerous consequences began, from past experience, to be universally and justly apprehended. Men also of unquiet spirits, no longer employed in foreign wars, whence they were now excluded by the situation of the neighbouring states, were more likely to court internal disorder, by their emulation, rivalry, and animosities, to tear the bowels of their native country. But though these causes alone were sufficient to breed confusion, there concluded another circumstance of the most dangerous nature: a pretender to the crown appeared: the title itself of the weak prince, who enjoyed the name of sovereignty, was distracted; and the English were too pay the severe, though late, penalty of their turbulence under Richard II.

and of their levity in violating, without any necessity or just reason, the lineal succession of their monarchs.
Claim of the Duke of York to the Crown of England. The first line and the ancient causes of those mighty kinsmen of the former occupat rendered the people incapable of any regular system of government.

But the Duke of York, besides the family of Nevil, had many other partisans among the great nobility. Conway, Earl of Devonshirr, descended from a very noble family of that name in France, was attached to his interests: Mowbray, Duke of Norfolik, had, from his hereditary hatred to the family of Lancaster, embodied the same party: and the discontent, which universally prevailed among the people, rendered every combination of the great the more dangerous to the established government.
Though the people were never willing to grant the supplies necessary for keeping possession of the conquered provinces in France, they repined extremely at the loss of these boasted acquisitions; and fancied, because a sudden irruption could make conquests, that without steady expenditure, it was vain to maintain them. The voluntary cession of Maine to the queen's uncle had made them suspect treachery in the loss of Normandy and Guienne. They still considered Mar-borough, Duke of Marlborough, and a latent enemy to the kingdom. And when they saw her father and all her relations active in promoting the success of the French, they could not be persuaded that she, who was all-powerful in the English council, would very zealously oppose them in their enterprises.
But the most fatal blow given to the popularity of the crown, and to the interests of the house of Lancaster, was by the assassination of the virtuous Duke of Gloucester, whose character, having been alive, would have intimidated the partisans of York; but whose memory, being extremely cherished by the people, served to throw an odium on all his murderers. By this crime the reigning family suffered a double prejudice: it was deprived of its firmest support; and it was loaded with all the infamy of that imprudent and barbarous assassination.
As the Duke of Suffolk was known to have had an active hand in the crime, he partook deeply of the hatred attending it; and the clamours, which necessitated his assistance against him, as prime minister, and declared favourite of the queen, were thereby augmented to a tenfold pitch, and became absolutely uncontrollable. The great notoriety and popularity of the Duke of Suffolk was not much more one who was only great grandson to a merchant, and who was of a birth so much inferior to theirs.
The people complained of his arbitrary measures; which were, in some degree, a necessary consequence of the irregular power then possessed by the prince, but which the least disaffection easily magnified into tyranny. The great acquisitions which he daily made, were the object of envy; and as they were gained at the expense of the crown, which was itself reduced to poverty, they appeared, that account, to all indifferent persons, the more exceptional and invidious.
The revenues of the crown, which had long been dispro-portioned to its cost and dignity, had been extremely dilapidated during the minority of Henry, both by the rapacity of the courtiers, which the king's uncle could not control, and by the necessary expenses of the French war, which had always been very ill supplied by the grants of parliament. The royal revenues were disipated; and at the same time the king was loaded with a debt of 372,000 pounds, a sum so great, that the parliament could never think of supplying it. This necessity forced the ministers upon many arbitrary measures: the household itself could not be supported without stretching to the utmost the right of purveyance, and rendering it a kind of universal robbery upon the people: the public clamour rose high upon the occasion, and no one had th equity to make allowance for the necessity of the king's situation. Suffolk, once become odious, bore the blame of the whole; and every grievance, in every part of the administration, was universally imputed to his tyranny and oppression.

This nobleman, sensible of the public's hatred toward him which he laboured, and foreboding the consequences of seeing an attack from the Commons, endeavoured to secure his interests by boldly yielding to the charge, and by insisting upon his own innocence, and upon even his merits, and those of his family, in the public service. He rose in the House of Peers; took notice of the clamours propagated against him; and complained, that after serving the crown in thirty-four campaigns; after living abroad seventeen years without once returning to his native country; after losing a father and three brothers in the wars with France; after being himself a prisoner, and purchasing his liberty by great ransom; it should yet be suspected, that he had been debauched from his allegiance by that enemy whom he had ever opposed with such zeal and fortitude, and that he had betrayed his prince, who had rewarded his services by the highest honours and greatest offices that it was in his power to confer. This speech did not answer the purpose intended. The Commons, rather provoked at his character, threw the whole charge against him to the Peers in accusation of high treason, divided into several articles. They insisted, that he had persuaded the French king to invade England with an armed force, in order to make him king, and to marry his own son, John de la Pole, whom he intended to marry to Margaret, the only daughter of the late John, Duke of Somerset, and to whom, heimagined, he would have a secure title; and that he had contributed to the release of the Duke of Orleans, in hopes that his prince would assist King Charles in expelling the English from France, and recovering full possession of his kingdom; that he had afterwards encouraged the marquis of Normandy and Guenee, and had promoted his conquests by betraying the secrets of England, and obstructing the succours intended to be sent to those provinces; and that he had, without any power or connection, procured by forethought to cede the province of Maine to Charles of Anjou, and had accordingly ceded it; which proved, in the issue, the chief cause of the loss of Normandy.

It was a review of these articles, that the Commons adopted, without inquiry, all the popular clamours against the Duke of Suffolk, and charged him with crimes, of which none but the vulgar could seriously believe. Nothing can be less probable, that a nobleman, so little eminent by his birth and character, could think of appropriating the crown to his family, and of deposing Henry by foreign force, and, together with him, Margaret, his daughter, to introduce into the kingdom such a spirit and penetration. Suffolk appeared to many noblemen in the house, who knew that he had intended to marry his son to one of the co-heirs of the Earl of Warwick, and was disappointed in his views only by the death of that lady; and, he observed, that Margaret of Somerset could bring to her husband no title to the crown; because herself was not so much as comprehended in the entail settled by act of parliament. It is easy to account for the loss of Normandy and Guenee, by the situation of affairs in the two kingdoms, without supposing any treachery in the English ministers; and it may safely be affirmed, that greater vigour was requisite to defend those provinces from the force of Charles VII. than to conquer them at first from his predecessor. It could never be the interest of any English minister to betray and abandon such acquisitions; much less of one who did not despise the king, and who enjoyed such high honours and ample possessions in his own country, who had nothing to dread but the effects of popular hatred, and who could never think, without the most extreme reluctance, of becoming a fugitive and exile in a foreign land. The only article which carries any face of probability, is his engagement for the delivery of Maine to the queen's uncle: but Suffolk maintained, with great appearance of truth, that this measure was approved of by several at the council table; and it seems hard to ascribe to it, as is done by the Commons, the subsequent loss of Normandy, and expulsion of the English. Normandy lay open on every side to the invasion of the French: Maine, an inland province, must soon have fallen without resistance; and as the English possessed in other parts more fortresses than they could garrison or provide for, it seemed no bad policy to contract their forces, and to render the defence practicable, by reducing some of the lesser places.

The Commons were probably sensible, that this charge of treason against Suffolk would not bear a strict scrutiny; and they therefore, soon after, sent up against him a new charge of misdemeanors, which they also divided into several articles. They affirmed, among other accusations, that he had procured exorbitant grants from the crown, had embezzled the public money, had conferred offices on improper persons, had perverted justice by maintaining infamous causes, and had procured pardons for notorious offenders. The articles are mostly general; but are not improbable: and as Suffolk seems to have been a bad man, and a bad minister, it will not be rash in us to think that when he had betrayed his prince, he could have been proved against him. The court was alarmed at the prosecution of a favourite minister, who lay under such a load of popular prejudices; and an expedient was taken to persuade the Commons to yield. The king summoned all the lords, spiritual and temporal, to his apartment: the prisoner was produced before them, and asked what he could say in his own defence? He denied that charge. The court inquired: He expressed himself not satisfied with regard to the first impeachment for treason; but in consideration of the second, for misdemeanors, he declared that, by virtue of Suffolk's own submission, not by any judicial authority, he banished him the kingdom during five years. The lords remained silent: but as soon as they returned to their own house, they entered a protest, that this sentence should nowise infringe their privileges; and that if Suffolk had surrendered his right, and had not voluntarily submitted to the king's commands, he was entitled to a trial by his peers in parliament.

It was easy to see, that these irregular proceedings were meant to favour Suffolk, and that, as he still possessed the queen's confidence, he would, on the first favourable opportunity, be restored to his country, and be reestablished in his former situation. The command of a vessel was therefore employed by his enemies to intercept him in his passage to France: he was secur'd near Dover; his head struck off on the spot, his body thrown into the sea; and thus was put an end to the hopes of an honest man. No inquiry was made after the actors and accomplices in this atrocious deed of violence.

The Duke of Somerset succeeded to Suffolk's power in the ministry, and credit with the queen; and as he was the person under whose government the French provinces had been lost, the public, who always judge by the event, soon made him equally the object of their animosity and hatred. The Duke of York was absent in Ireland during all these transactions; and it was observed, that his partisans had excited and supported the prosecution against Suffolk, no immediate ground of complaint could, on that account, lie against him. But there happened, soon after, an accident which restored the confidence of the court, and discovered to them the extreme danger to which they were exposed from the pretensions of that popular prince.

The rest of the people, set afoot by the parliamentary impeachment, and by the fall of so great a favourite as Suffolk, broke out in various commotions, which were soon suppressed; but there arose one in Popular insurrection, which was attended with more dangerous consequences. A man of low condition, one John Cade, a native of Ireland, who had been obliged to fly into France for crimes, observed, on his return to England, the discontent of the people; and he laid on them the foundation of projects which were at first crowned with surprising success. He took the name of John Mortimer; intending, as is supposed, to pass himself for a son of that Sir John Murthwaite who had been sentenced to death by parliament; and he employed the men he had集合, without any trial or evidence, merely upon an induction of high treason given in against him. On the first mention of that popular name, the common people of Kent, to the number of 20,000, marched out of the city, and he exalted their zeal by publishing complaints against the numerous abuses in government, and demanding a redress of grievances.

The court, not yet fully sensible of the danger, sent a small force against the notables, under the command of Sir Humphrey Stafford, who was defeated and slain in an action near Sevenoaks, and Cade, advancing with his followers towards London, encamped on Blackheath. Though elated by his victory, he still maintained the appearance of moderation; and sending to the court a plausible list of grievances, he promised that when these should be redressed, and when Lord Say the treasurer, and Cromer, sheriff of Kent, should be punished for the murder of his nephew, he would disband his forces, and return to the revenues.

The council, who observed that nobody was willing to fight against men so reasonable in their pretensions, carried the king, for present safety, to Kenilworth; and in the meantime the rebels laid siege to London. Their discipline was maintained, during some time, great order and discipline among their followers. He always led them into the fields during the night-time; and published severe edicts against plunder and violence of every kind; but being obliged, in the end, to leave the name upon his wrongs, his manner of proceeding was such that the rebels, by their own conduct, brought into a rich house in which they plundered; and the citizens, alarmed at this act of violence, shut their gates against them; and being seconded by a detachment of soldiers sent them by Lord Scales, governor of the Tower, they routed the rebel he had met with great slaughter. The Kentish men were so discouraged by the blow, that, upon receiving a general pardon from the prince, they retired towards Rochester and thence to Exeter. The pardon was soon after annulled, as a pretext to violence; a price was set on Cade's head; he was killed by one Iden, a gentleman of Snees; and many of his followers were capitally punished for their rebellion.

At the trial of Cade in court, that the Duke of York had secretly instigated Cade to this attempt, in order to try, by that experiment, the dispositions of the people towards his title and family, and as the event had so far succeeded to his wish, the ruling party had greater reason than ever to apprehend the future consequences of his pretensions. At the same time they heard that he intended to return from Ireland; and fearing that he meant to bring an armed force along with him, they issued orders in the king's name, for opposing him, and for debarring him entrance into England. But the duke refused his enemies by coming attended with no more than his ordinary revenue; the precautions of the ministers served only to show his friends that they were not fearful of his intentions. They broke into a rich house in which they plundered; and the citizens, alarmed at this act of violence, shut their gates against them; and being seconded by a detachment of soldiers sent them by Lord Scales, governor of the Tower, they routed the rebel with great slaughter. salutary to national liberty; the privileges of the people could only be maintained by the observance of laws; and if no account were made of the rights of the sovereignty, it could not be expected that any regard would be paid to the property and freedom of the subject: that it was never too late to correct any pernicious precedent; an unjust establishment, the longer it stood, acquired the greater sanction and validity; it could, with all appearance of reason, be pleaded as an authority for a like injustice; and the maintenance of it, instead of favouring public tranquillity, tended to disjoint every principle by which human society could be preserved: the usurpers would be happy in their present possession of power, or their continuance for a few years, could convert them into legal princes; but nothing would be more miserable than the people, if all restrains on violence and ambition were thus removed, and a full scope given to the attempts of every turbulent innovator: that time, indeed, might bestow solitude on a government whose first foundations were the most infirm; but it required both a long course of time to produce this effect, and the total extirpation of those claimants, whose title was built on the original principles of the constitution: that the deposition of Richard II., and the advancement of Henry IV., were not deliberate national acts, but the result of the popularity and violence of the people, unprovided from those very defects in human nature, which the establishment of political society, and of an order in succession, was calculated to prevent: that the subsequent English monarchs were a continuation of the same wretchedness and usurpation; they were not ratified by the legislature, since the consent of the rightful king was still wanting; and the acquiescence, first of the family of Mortimer, then of the family of York, proceeded from principles which had not provided in the constitution the pretensions necessary to be met by the king, which the restoration of the true order of succession could not be considered as a change which familiarized the people to revolutions; but as the correction of a former abuse, which had itself encouraged the giddy spirit of innovation, rebellion, and disobedience: and that, as the original title of Lancaster stood only in the person of Henry IV., on present convenience, even this principle, unjustifiable as it was, when not supported by laws, and warranted by the constitution, had now entirely gone over to the other side; nor was there any comparison between a prince utterly unable to sway the sceptre, and blindly governed by corrupt ministers, or by an impious queen, engaged in foreign and hostile interests; and a prince of mature years, of approved wisdom and experience, a native of England, the lineal heir of the crown, who, by his restoration, would replace every thing on another foundation.

So many plausible arguments could be urged on both sides of this interesting question, that the people were extremely divided in their sentiments; and though the noblemen of the north and north-east seemed to have espoused the party of York, the opposite cause had the advantage of being supported by the present laws, and by the immediate possession of royal authority. There were also many great noblemen in the Lancastrian party, who balanced the power of their antagonists, and kept the nation in suspense between them. The Earl of Northumberland adhered to the present government: the Earl of Westmorland, in spite of his connexions with the Duke of York, and with the family of Nevil, of which he was the head, was brought over to the same party; and the whole north of England, the most warlike part of the kingdom, was, by means of these two potent noblemen, warmly engaged in the interests of Lancaster. Edmund Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, and his brother Henry, were great supporters of that cause; as were also Henry Holland, Duke of Exeter, Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Salisbury, the Lords Clifford, Dudley, Scales, Audley, and other noblemen.

While the kingdom was in this situation, it might naturally be expected that so many turbulent factions, possessed of so many splendid families, and independent authority, would immediately have flown to arms, and have decreed the quarrel, after their usual manner, by war and battle, under the standards of the contesting princes. But there still were many causes which retarded these desperate extremities, and made a long train of fiction, intrigue, and cabal, precede the military operations. By the gradual progress of arts in England, as well as in other parts of Europe, the people were now become of some importance; laws were beginning to be respected by them; and it was requisite that they should be taught to preserve their minds to the overthrow of such an ancient establishment as that of the house of Lancaster, ere their concurrence could reasonably be expected. The Duke of York himself, who was an innovator, an enemy to violence, and disposed to trust rather to time and policy, than to sanguinary measures, for the success of his pretensions. The very inbecility itself of Henry tended to keep the factions in suspense, and make them stand in awe of one another; it made the Lancastrian party unable to strike any violent blow against their enemies; it encouraged the Yorkists to hope, that, after banishing the king's ministers, and getting possession of his person, they might gradually undermine his authority, and be able, without the perilous experiment of a civil war, to change the succession by parliamentary and legal authority.

The conference which appeared in a parliament assembled soon after the arrival of the Duke of York from Ireland, favoured these expectations of his partisans, and both discovered an unusual desire of settling the affairs of the kingdom, and the general disgusts which prevailed against the administration. The lower House, without any previous inquiry or examination, without alleging any other ground of complaint than common fame, ventured to present a petition against the Duke of Somerset, his associates, and retained by them, the noblemen, lordships, and estates of Chester, Sir John Sutton, Lord Dudley, and several others of inferior rank; and they prayed the king to remove them for ever from his person and council, and to prohibit them from approaching within twelve miles of the court. This was a violent attack, somewhat arbitrary, and supported but by few precedents, against the ministry; yet the king durst not openly oppose it: he replied that, except the lords, he would banish all the others from court during a year, unless he should have occasion for their service in suppressing any rebellion. At the same time, he rejected a bill which had passed both Houses, for attainting the late Duke of Suffolk, and which, in several of its clauses, discovered a very general prejudice against the measures of the court.

The Duke of York, trusting to these symptoms, raised an army of 10,000 men, and first advanced towards London, with a view of demanding a reformation of the government, and the removal of the Duke of Somerset from all power and authority. He unexpectedly found the gates of the city open to him, and on his approaching into Kent, he was followed by the king at the head of a superior army; in which several of Richard's friends, particularly Salisbury and Warwick, appeared; probably with a view of mediating between the parties, and of seconding, on occasion, the Duke of York's pretensions. A parley ensued; Richard still insisted upon the removal of Somerset, and his submitting to a trial in parliament: the court pretended to offer the same with his demand; and that nobleman was put in arrest; the Duke of York was then persuaded to pay his respects to the king in his tent; and, on repeating his charge against the Duke of Somerset, he was surprised to see that minister step from behind the curtain, and offer to maintain his innocence. Richard now found that he had been betrayed; that he was in the hands of his enemies; and that it was become necessary, for his own safety, to lower his pretensions. No violence, however, was attempted against him; the court proceeding to bear the destruction of so popular a prince: he had many friends in Harry's camp; and his son, who was not in the power of the court, might still be able to revenge his disgrace. The king submitted to this disposition; he retired to his seat of Wigmure, on the borders of Wales.}

pened an incident, which, by increasing the public discontent, proved favourable to his pretensions. Several Gascon lords, affianced to the English government, and disgusted at the new dominion of the French, came to London, and offered to return to their allegiance under Henry.\(^6\) The Earl of Shrewsbury, with a body of 8000 men, was sent over to support them. Bourdeaux, 2000 June, desir’d opened its gates to him: he made himself master of Trécesson, Castillon, and some other places; affairs began to wear a favourable aspect: but, as Charles hastened to resist this dangerous invasion, the fortunes of the English were soon reversed: Shrewsbury, a vehement war party, fell in battle; his conquests were lost; Bourdeaux was again obliged to submit to the French king; \(^7\) and all hopes of recovering the province of Gascony were for ever extinguished.

Though the English might deem themselves happy to be fairly rid of distant dominions which were of no use to them, and which they never could defend against the growing power of France, they expressed great discouragement on this occasion; and they now all the gloom of the ministry, who had not been able to effect impossibilities.

While they were in this disposition, the queen’s delivery of a son, who received the name of Edward of Prince, increased the national joy; and as it removed all hopes of the peaceable succession of the Duke of York, whu, otherwise, in the right of his father, and by the laws enacted since the accession of the throne, was next heir to the crown, it had rather a tendency to inflame the quarrel between the parties. But the duke was incapable of violent counsels; and even when no visible object lay between him and the throne, he was prevented by his own scruples from mounting it. Henry, always unfit to exercise the government, fell at this time into a distemper, which so far increased his natural immensity, that it rendered him incapable of maintaining even the appearance of the crown. The queen and the council, desirous of this support, found themselves unable to resist the York party; and they were obliged to yield to the torrent. They sent Somerset to the Tower, and appointed Richard, Jlanet of the kingdom, with powers to open and hold a session of parliament.\(^8\) That assembly, also, taking into consideration the state of the kingdom, created him protector during pleasure. Men who thus intrusted sovereign authority to one that had such evident and strong pretensions to the crown, were not surly averse to his taking immediate and full possession of it: yet the duke, instead of pushing them to make further concessions, appeared so perpetually engaged, either in parleying with the enemy, or in the care of the fag, that his conduct was tendered to him. He desired that it might be recorded in parliament, that this authority was conferred on him from their own free motion, without any application on his part; he expressed his resolve that from the moment he was tendered to him in the exercise of it: he made it a condition of his acceptance, that the other lords, who were appointed to be of his council, should also accept of the trust, and should exercise it; and be required that all the powers of his office should be specified and defined by act of parliament. This moderation of Richard was certainly very unusual and very amiable; yet it was attended with bad consequences in the present juncture, and, by giving time to the appearance of the French fleet, and of the foreign parties, proved a source of all those furious wars and commotions which ensued.

The enemies of the Duke of York soon found it in their power to make use of his weakness for their own ends. Henry, being so far recovered from his distemper as to carry the appearance of exercising the royal power, they moved him to resume his authority, to annul the protectorship of the queen, and to annul the marriage of the Prince of Wales, and to commit the administration into the hands of that nobleman. Richard, sensible of the dangers which might attend his former acceptance of the parliamentary commission, would not give annulment of it, levied an army; but still without advancing any pretensions to the crown. He complained only of the king’s ministers, and demanded a reformation of the government. A battle was fought at St. Albans, in which the Yorkists were superior, and without suffering any material loss, kept about 5000 men in the field. Amongst whom were the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Stafford, eldest son of the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Clifford, and many other persons of distinction. The king himself joined them, and the Duke of York, who treated him with great respect and tenderness: he was only obliged (which he regarded as no hardship) to commit the whole authority of the crown into the hands of his rival. This was the first blood spilt in that fatal quarrel, which was not finished in less than a course of thirty years, which was signalized by twelve pitched battles, which opened a scene of extraordinary fierceness and cruelty, as computed tu have cost the lives of eighty princes of the blood, and almost entirely annihilated the ancient nobility of England. The strong attachments which at that time men of the same kindred bore to each other, and the virtilc spirit, which was considered as a point of honour, secured the great families implacable in their resentments, and every moment widened the breach between the parties. Yet affairs did not immediately proceed to the last extremities; the nation was in no haste to settle any just and permanent peace, and the spirit of Queen Margaret, supporting her small power, still proved a balance to the great authority of Richard, which was checked by his irresistible temper. A parliament, which was soon after assembled, was plainly discovered, by the contrariness of their proceedings, the contrariness of the motives by which they were actuated. They granted the Yorkists a general indemnity; and this was the last step the protector took. He was, therefore, the duke, who, in accepting it, still persevered in all his former prerogatives; but at the same time they renewed their oaths of fealty to Henry, and fixed the continuance of the protectorship to a majority of his choice. Richard was tested with the usual dignities of Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester. The only decisive act passed in this parliament, was a full resumption of all the grants which had been made since the death of Henry V. and which had reduced the crown to great poverty.

It was not found difficult to wrest power from hands so little tenacious as those of the Duke of York. Margaret, availing herself of that prince’s absence, produced his husband before the House of Lords; and, as his state of health permitted him, at that time, to act his part with some tolerable decency, he declared his intentions of resuming the government, and of putting an end to the protectorate. This measure, as was expected, was not opposed by the contrary party: the House of Lords, who were, many of them, disgusted with the late act of resumption, assented to Henry’s proposal: and the king was declared to be reinstated in sovereign authority. Even the Duke of York acquiesced in this irregular act of the peers; and no disturbance ensued. But that prince’s claim to the crown was too well known, and the steps which he had taken to promote it were too evident, ever to allow sincere trust and confidence to have place between the parties. The court reid to Coventry, and invited the Duke of York and the Earned at Salisbury and Warwick to attend the king’s person. When they on the road they reid intelligence that designs were formed against their liberties and lives. They immediately separated themselves: Richard withdrew to his castle of Wigmore: Salisbury to Malmesbury in Yorkshire, and York to his government of Calais, which had been committed to him the battle of St. Albans, and which, as it gave him the command of the only regular military force maintained by England, was chosen by Richard to support his claim to the kingdom, which was threatened; and the awe in which each party stood of the other rendered the mediation for some... time successful. It was agreed that all the great leaders on both sides should meet in London, and be solemnly reconciled. The Duke of York and his party therefore embarked thither with numerous retinues, and took up their quarters near each other for mutual secu-ry. The leaders of the Lancastrian party used the same precaution. The mayor, at the head of 5000 men, kept up a vigilant look-out for all signs of an attack; but was extremely vigilant in maintaining peace between them.a Terms were adjusted, which removed not the ground of difference.
An outward reconciliation only was procured; and in order to notify this accords to the whole province, a solemn procession in St. Paul's was appointed, where the Duke of York led Queen Margaret, and a leader of one party marched hand in hand with a leader of the opposite. The lessen cordiality prevailed, the mob were the exterior demonstrations of amity redoubled. But it was evident, that a contest for a crown could not thus be peaceably accommodated; that each party watched only for an opportunity of subverting the other; and that much blood must yet precipitate; but when the van of the royal army had passed the brook, Salisbury suddenly turned upon them; and partly by the surprise, partly by the division, of the enemies' forces, put this body to rout: the example of men was followed by the rout of the army; and Salisbury, namning a complete victory, reached the general rendezvous of the Yorkists at Ludlow.b The Earl of Warwick brought over to this rendezvous a counsel of peers from Calais, whom it was thought the fortune of the war would much depend; but this reinforcement occasioned, in the issue, the immediate ruin of the Duke of York's party. When the royal army approached, and a general action was every hour expected, Sir Andrew Trollop, who commanded the veterans, deserted to the king in the night-time; and the Yorkists were so dismayed at this instance of treachery, which made every man suspect his fellow, that they remained next day without striking a stroke: the duke fled to Ireland: the estaped to Calais: where his great popularity among all orders of men, particularly among the military, soon drew to him persons, and retinue, and he deserted himself, selves every where in readiness to rise on the first

Warwick landed in Kent, with the Earl of Salisbury, and the Earl of March, eldest son of the Duke of York; and being met by the primacy, by Lord Cobham, and person and retinue, found himself deserted by the acclamations of the people, to London. The city immedately opened its gates to him: and his troops increasing on every day's march, he soon found himself in a condition to face the royal army, which hustened from Coventry to attack him. At the Battle of Northampton, 10 July, the royalists by the indefatigable Lord Grey of Ruthin, who, commanding Henry's van, deserted to the enemy; and Sir William Lucas, were killed in the action or purpose of the king. The Parliament of the common people were spared by orders of the Earls of Warwick and March. Henry himself, that empty shadow of a king, was again taken prisoner; and as the innocence and sincerity of his manners, which bore the appearance of sanctity, had procured him the leader of the people, the Earl of Warwick and the other leaders took care to distinguish themselves by their respectful demeanour

A parliament was summoned in the king's name, and met at Westminster, where the duke soon after appeared from Ireland. This prince had never hitherto advanced openly any claim to the crown; but he had had the care to insulate one of the Earl of Warwick's: their companions on both sides took part in the quarrel: a fierce combat ensued: the earl apprehended his life to be aimed at: he fled to his government of Calais, and both parties in every county, openly made preparations for deciding the contest by war and arms. The Earl of Salisbury, marching to join him, was taken at Blore heath, on the borders of Staffordshire, by Lord Audley, who commanded much superior forces; and a small rivulet with steep banks ran between the armies. Salisbury here supplied his defect in numbers by stratagem: a refinement of which there occur few instances in the English civil wars, where a headlong courage, more than military conduct, is commonly to be remarked.
He signified a retreat, and allure Audley to follow him with the utmost precipitation; but when the van of the royal army had passed the brook, Salisbury suddenly turned upon them; and partly by the surprise, partly by the division,

crown, in this, and the two last reigns, should be abrogated and rescinded. The duke acquiesced in this decision: Henry himself, being a prisoner, could not oppose it; even if he had enjoyed his liberty, he would not probably have felt any violent reluctance against it; and the act was confirmed by the unanimous assent of the legislative body. Though the mildness of this compromise is chiefly to be ascribed to the moderation of the Duke of York, it is impossible not to observe in those transactions visible marks of a higher regard to law, and a more fixed authority, enjoyed by parliament, than has appeared in any former period of English history.

It is probable that the duke, without employing either menaces or violence, would have obtained a settlement more consistent and uniform: but as many, if not all the members of the upper House had received grants, concessions, or dignities, during the last sixty years, when the house of Lancaster was possessed of the government; they were afraid of invalidating their own titles by too sudden and violent an overthrow of that family; and in thus temporizing between the parties, they fixed the throne on a basis upon which it could not possibly stand. To the uponminent consent of the whole of a more fixed authority, enjoyed by parliament, than has appeared in any former period of English history.

The queen, after this important victory, divided her arms. A.D. 1640.

The earl of Pembroke, half-brother to the king, against Edward, the new Duke of York. She herself marched with the larger division towards London, where the Earl of Warwick had been left with the command of the Yorkists. Pembroke, the Duke of York, was defeated by Edward at Mortimer's Cross. He had three sons, Edward, George, and Richard, with three daughters, Anne, Elizabeth, and Margaret. The queen, after this important victory, divided her arms. A.D. 1640.

Margaret compensated this defeat by a second battle victory, which she obtained over the Earl of Albemarle. That nobleman, on the approach of the Lancastrians, led out a strong army, reinforced by the forces of the Londoners, who were affectionate to his cause; and he gave battle to the queen at St. Albans. While the armies were warmly engaged, Levelock, who commanded a considerable body of the Yorkists, withdrew from the combat; and this unexpected event, which was the result of Margaret's promised victories in those civil wars, decided the victory in favour of the queen. About 2300 of the vanquished perished in the battle and pursuit; and the person of the king fell again into the hands of his own party. This weak prince was sure to be almost equally a prisoner whom ever faction had the keeping of him; and scarcely any more decorum was observed by one than by the other, in their method of treating him. Lord Bovvil, to whose care he had been intrusted by the Yorkists, remained with him after the defeat, on assurances of pardon given him by Henry; but Margaret, regardless of her husband's promise, immediately ordered the army to be struck off by the executioner. Sir Thomas Kirtel, a brave warrior, who had signalized himself in the French wars, was treated in the same manner.

The queen made no great advantage of this victory: young Edward accepted her from the other side; and collecting the remains of Warwick's army, was soon in a condition of giving her battle with superior forces. She was sensible of her danger, while she lay between the enemy and the city of London; and she found it necessary to retreat with her army to the north. Edward entered the capital amidst the acclamations of the citizens, and immediately opened a new scene to his party. This prince, in the bloom of youth, remarkable for the beauty of his person, for his bravery, his activity, his affability, and every popular quality, found himself so much possessed of public favour, that, elated with the spirit natural to his age, he resented every thing that seemed to infringe upon those narrow limits which his father had prescribed to himself, and which had been found, by experience, so prejudicial to his cause. He determined to assume the name and dignity of king; to insist openly on his claim; and henceforth to treat the opposite party as traitors. But the war was protracted with too many delays, and attended with other inconveniences, he ventured to proceed in a less regular manner, and to put it out of the power of his enemies to throw obstacles in the way of his elevation. His army was ordered to assemble... that all such knights of any county as were returned by virtue of the king’s letters, without any other election, should be valid, and that no sheriff should, for returning them, incur the penalty of the statute of Henry IV. All the other provisions of the act are the same as those of the statute of Henry III.

because it was unlawfully summoned, and the knights and barons not duly chosen."

The parliaments in this reign, instead of relieving their vassals from the burdens of the crown, and endeavouring to enforce the former statutes enacted for that purpose, The Commons petitioned that no forefather should be capable of any church prebend, and that the patronage of the deanery of Canterbury, and lands, and other property, should be in the king’s hands. But the king was determined to keep the power of election in the hands of the clergy.

in St. John’s Fields; great numbers of people surrounded them; an harangue was pronounced in this mixed multitude, judging that the title of Edward, and inveighing against the tyranny and usurpation of the rival family; and the former asked, whether they would have Edward, or Henry of Lancaster for king? They unanimously exclaimed against the proposal. It was then demanded, whether they would accept of Edward, eldest son of the late Duke of York, as a candidate. The answer was in the affirmative, and Edward received the joyful acclamations. A great number of bishops, lords, magistrates, and other persons of distinction, were next assembled at Baynard’s castle, who ratified the popular election, and the new king was solemnly crowned on the subsequent day, proclaimed in London, by the title of Edward IV.

In this manner ended the reign of Henry VI., a monarch who, while in his cradle, had been proclaimed king both of France and England, and who began his life with the most splendid prospects that any prince in Europe had ever enjoyed. The revolution was unhappy for his people, as it was the source of civil wars; but was almost entirely unfavourable to his person, who was utterly in vain of excusing his authority, and who, provided he personally met with good usage, was equally easy, as he was equally enslaved, in the hands of his enemies and of his friends. He was the chief cause of the public calamities: but whether his queen and his ministers were not also guilty of some great abuses of power, it is not easy for us, at this distance of time, to say. There remains no record of any considerable violation of the laws, except in the assassination of the Duke of Gloucester, which was a private crime, formed no precedent, and was but too much of a punishment in the eyes of the nation, for the crimes of the times.

The most remarkable law, which passed in the reign, was that for the due election of the bishops and members of parliament in counties. After the lapse of the assize system, the election of tenors was in some measure lost; and every freeholder, as well those who held of mesne lords, as the immediate tenants of the crown, were by degrees admitted to give their votes at elections. This innovation (for such it may probably be esteemed) was indirectly confirmed by a law of Henry IV., which gave right in such a multitude of electors as was the occasion of great disorder. In the eighth and tenth of this king, therefore, laws were enacted, limiting the electors to such as possessed forty shillings a year in land, free from all burdens, within the county. This sum was equivalent to near twenty pounds a year of our present money; and it were to be wished, that the spirit as well as the letter of such laws, had been observed.

The preamble of the statute is remarkable: "Whereas the elections of knaves have of late, in many counties of England, been made by outrageous and excessive numbers of persons, power of them, and their other opinions, and values, yet pretending to a right equal to the best knights and esquires; whereby manslaughters, riots, batteries, and divisions among the gentle men, and other people of the same counties, shall very likely rise and be, unless due remedy be provided in this behalf," &c. We may learn from these expressions, what an important matter the election of a member of parliament was now become in England: that assembly was beginning in this period to assume great authority: the Commons had it in their power to enforce the execution of the laws; and if they failed of success in this particular, it proceeded less from any incapacity of the assembly, than from the licentious spirit of the aristocracy, and perhaps from the rude education of the age, and their own ignorance of the advantages resulting from a regular administration of justice.

When the Duke of York, the Earl of Salisbury and Warwick, flew the kingdom upon the desertion of their troops, a parliament was summoned at Coventry in 1460, by which they were all attainted. This parliament seems to have been a very irregularly constituted, and scarcely deserves the name: much more, that an act passed in it, the second only to the Estates of Scotland, in which all the estates are represented. The third in importance, and the fourth in number of members, was that of the twelve counties of York, in which the number of members was forty-two.
ensued. The scaffold, as well as the field, necessarily streamed with the noblest blood of England, split in the quarrel between the two contending families, whose animosity was now become implacable. The people, divided in their affections, took different symbols of party: the partisans of the house of Lancaster clothed in purple, those of York in white; these of York were denominated from the white; and the civil wars were thus known, over Europe, by the name of the quarrel between the two races.

The licence, in which Queen Margaret had been obliged to indulge her troops, infused great terror and aversion into the city of London, and all the southern parts of the kingdom; and as she there expected an obstinate resistance, she had prudently stationed northwards and her own partisans. The same licence, joined to the zeal of faction, soon brought great multitudes to her standard; and she was able, in a few days, to assemble an army, sixty thousand strong, in Yorkshire. The king and the Earl of Warwick hastened, with an army of forty thousand men, to check her progress; and when they reached Pomfret, they despatched a body of troops, under the command of Lord Fitzwalter, to secure the passage of Ferrybridge over the river Ayre, which lay between them and the enemy. Fitzwalter took possession of the post assigned him; but was not able to maintain it against Lord Clifford, and became necessarily compelled to retreat. The Yorkists were chased back with great slaughter; and Lord Fitzwalter himself was slain in the action. The Earl of Warwick, dreading the consequences of this disaster, at a time when a decisive action was every hour expected, immediately turned his forces back, and hastened to the flanks of the army, which he stabbed before the whole army; and, kissing the hilt of his sword, swore that he was determined to share the fate of the meanest soldier. And, to show the greater severity of the action, they were sentenced to die, giving to every one full liberty to retire; but meting out the severest punishment to those who should discover any symptoms of cowardice in the ensuing battle. Lord Farcet, who had prudently placed himself northwards in order to guard his rear, having fallen unexpectedly on Lord Clifford, revenged the former disaster by the defeat of the party and the death of its leader.

The hostile armies met at Touton; and a 30th of March fierce and bloody battle ensued. While the Yorkists were advancing to the charge, there happened a great fall of snow, which, driving full in the faces of their enemy, was immediately covered by a stratagem of Lord Falconberg's. That nobleman ordered some infantry to advance before the line, and, after having sent a volley of flight arrows, as they were called, they were followed by those of the Yorkists, who, being put to flight, soon after fell back, pursued by the Earl of Northumberland, and his brother Sir John Nevill, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lords Dares and Welles, and Sir Andrew Trollop. The Earl of Devonshire, who was now engaged in Henry's party, was brought a prisoner to Edward, amongst others, soon after, with the charge of murder, at York. His head was fixed on a pole, erected over a gate of that city; and the head of Duke Richard, and that of the Earl of Salisbury, were taken down, and buried with great pomp in the Greenely, and the Merchant Taylors' Hall, in the city, and the Garden of York, during the action; but learning the defeat of their army, and being sensible that no place in England could now afford them shelter, they fled with great precipitation into Scotland. They were accompanied by the Duke of Exeter, who, though he had married Edward's sister, had taken part with the Lancastrians, and by Henry, Duke of Somerset, who had commanded in the unfortunate battle of Touton, and who was the son of that statesman killed in the first battle of St. Albans.

Notwithstanding the great animosity which prevailed between the kingdoms, Scotland into Scotland, had never exerted itself with vigour to take advantage, either of the wars between England carried on with France, or of the civil commotions which arose between the contending families. James I., more laudably employed in civilizing his subjects, and taxing them to the satirical yoke of law and usage, than among his foreign nations; and though he seemed interested to maintain a balance between France and England, he gave no further assistance to the former kingdom, in its greatest distresses, than permitting, and, perhaps, encouraging, his subjects to enlist in the French service. After the murder of that excellent prince, the minority of his son and successor, James II., and the distractions incident to it, retained the Scots in the same state of neutrality; and the superiority, visibly acquired by France, rendered it then unnecessary for her ally to interpose in her defence. But when the quarrel commenced between the houses of York and Lancaster, and between the English and the French, in the year 1460, and had provided himself with a small train of artillery for that enterprise: but his cannon were so ill framed, that one of them burst as he was firing it, and put an end to his life in the flower of his age. His successor, James III., was also deprived of his accession: the usual distractions ensued in the government: the Queen-dowager, Anne of Gueldres, aspired to the regency: the family of Douglas opposed her pretensions: they were speedily ascertained, and they were all killed with thousands, in the battle of Flodden Fields, in the year 1513, when the Earl of Surrey, the king's grandson, a daughter of the Earl of Somerset; she could engage the Scottish council to go no further than to express their good wishes in her favour: but, on her offer to deliver to them immediately the important fortress of Berwick, and to renew the engagement of her uncle, the king of France, James, she found a better reception; and the Scots promised the assistance of their arms to reinstate her family upon the throne. But as the danger from that quarter seemed, by the success they had obtained, to be imminent, the king hastened to pursue the fugitive king and queen into their retreat; but returned to London, where a parliament was summoned for settling the government.

On the meeting of this assembly, Edward and York found the good effects of his vigorous measures in assuming the crown, as well as of his victory at Touton, by which he had secured it; the parliament no longer hesitated between the two families, or proposed any of those ambiguous decisions which could only serve to perpetuate and inflame the animosities of party. They recognised the tule of Edward, by hereditary descent through the family of Mortimer; and declared that he was king by right, from the death of his father, who had also the same lawful title; and that he was in possession of the crown from the day that he assumed the government, tendered to him by the acclamations of the people. They expressed their assurances of the purity and security of the crown of Lancaster, particularly that of the Earl of Derby, otherwise called Henry IV., which, they said, had been attended with every kind of disorder, the murder of the sovereign, and other bloody and rampant events. They annulled every grant which had passed in those reigns; they restated the king in all the possessions which had belonged to the crown the pretended deposition of Richard II, and though they conceived judicial devices, and the decrees of inferior courts, they reversed all attainers passed in any pretended parliament; particularly the attainder of the Earl of Cambridge, the king's grandfather; as well as that of the Earls of Salisbury and Devonshire, and of Lord Lumby, who had been forfeited for adhering to Richard II.4

Many of these votes were the result of the usual violence of party; the common sense of mankind, in more peaceable times, repeated them: and the statutes of the house of Lancaster, being the deeds of an established government, and enacted by princes long possessed of authority, have always been held as valid and obligatory. The parliament, however, in substituting the foundations that had still the pretence of replacing the government on its ancient and natural basis; but, in their subsequent measures, they were more guided by revenge, at least by the views of convenience, than by the maxims of equity and justice. They passed an act of forfeiture and attainder against Henry VI. and Queen Margaret, and their infant son, Prince Edward: the same act was extended to the Duke of Somerset and Exeter; to the Earls of Northumber-land, Devonshire, Pembroke, Wilts; to the Vacant Beaumont; the Lords Ros, Neville, Clifford, Welles, Dacre, Gray of Rugemont, Hungerford; to Alexander Hasting, Lord

... Montague, John Heron, and many other persons of distinction. 5 The parliament vested the estates of all these attainde persons in the crown; though their sole crime was the adhering to a prince, whose deviation from the great foundation of the government, and whom that very king himself, who was now seated on the throne, had acknowledged and obeyed as his lawful sovereign.

The necessity of supporting the government established will more fully justify some other acts of violence; though the method of conducting them may still appear exceptionable. John, Earl of Oxford, and his son Aubrey de Vere, were detected in a correspondence with Margaret, who had, however, in substituting the foundations of the government, been condemned and executed. 6 Sir William Tyrell, Sir Thomas Tudenham, and John Montgomery, were convicted in the same arbitrary court, were executed, and their estates forfeited. This usurpation of the right to law and civil government was a high strain of prerogative, which, were it not for the violence of the acts, would probably have appeared excusable to a nation so jealous of their liberties as the English. It was the last violent step, and the impossible hope, that such a great and sudden revolution must leave the roots of discontent and dissatisfaction in the subject, which would require great art, or in lieu of it, great violence, to extirpate them. The latter was more suitable to the genius of the age, in which the government was established.

But the new establishment still seemed precarious and uncertain; not only from the domestic discontent of the people, but from the efforts of foreign powers. Lewis, the eleventh of the name, had succeeded to his father, Charles, in 1460; and was led from the obvious motives of national interest, to feed the flames of civil discord among such dangerous neighbours, by giving support to the weaker party. But the intriguing and politic genius of this prince was here checked by itself: having attempted to subdue the independent spirit of his own vassals, he had excited such an opposition at home, as prevented him from making all the other attempts he was offered, of the diminution of the dominions of the English. He sent, however, a small body to Henry's assistance under Vannes, seneschal of Normandy, who landed in Northumberland: A. D. 1462. and got possession of the castle of Alncwik: but as the indefatigable Margaret went in person to France, where she solicited larger supplies, and promised Lewis to deliver up Calais if her family should by his means recover it: she crossed the channel, and was induced to send along with her a body of 2000 men at arms, which enabled her to take the field, and to make an interval into England. Though reinforced by a numerous body of archers from Scotland, and by many partisans of the family of Lancaster; she received a check at Hedingham-more from Lord Mauton, or Montague, brother to the Earl of Northumberland. Ten of the east Marches between Scotland and England. Montagu was encouraged with this success, that, while a numerous reinforcement was on their march to join him by orders from Edward, he yet ventured, with his own troops alone, to attack the Lancasterians at Hexam; and he obtained a complete victory over them. The Duke of Somerset, the Lords Ros and Hungerford, were taken in the pursuit, and immediately beheaded by martial law at Hexam. The Summary Justice was in like manner executed at Newcastle on Sir Humphrey Nevil, and several other gentlemen. All those who were spared in the field suffered on the scaffold; and the utter extermination of the Lancasterians was the object of the York party; a conduct which received but too plausible an apology from the preceding practice of the Lancasterians.

The fate of the unfortunate royal family after this defeat, was singular. Margaret, flying with her son into a forest, where she endeavoured to conceal herself, was beset, during the darkness of the night, by robbers, who, either ignorant or regardless of her quality, despised her of her rings and jewels, and delivered her up to violence and timidity. The portion of this rich booty raised a quarrel among them; and while their attention was thus engaged, she took the opportunity of making her escape with her son into the midst of a forest. She wandered for some time, overspent with hunger and fatigue, and sunk with terror and affliction. While in this wretched condition, she saw a robber approach with his naked sword; and finding that she had no means of escape she suddenly embraced the resolution of trusting entirely for protection to his faith and generosity. She advanced towards him; and presenting to him the young prince, called out to him, "Ye wretches, near you is the son of your king's son." The man, whose humane and generous spirit had been obscured, not entirely lost, by his vicious course of life, was struck with the singularity of the event, was charmed with the confidence reposed in him; and bowed down with the temptation to serve a princely princess, but to devote himself entirely to her service. 7 By his means she dwelt some time concealed in the forest, and was at last conducted to the sea-coast, whence she made her escape into Flanders. She passed thence into her father's court, where she lived several years in privacy and retirement. Her husband was not so fortunate or so dexterous in finding the means of escape. Of some of his friends took him under their protection, and conveyed him into Lancaster; where he remained concealed during a twelvemonth; but he was at last detected, delivered up to Edward, and thrown into the Tower. 8 The safety of his person was the least amount of his enemies, than to the contempt which they had entertained of his courage and his understanding.

The imprisonment of Henry, the execution of Margaret, the execution and confiscation of all the most eminent Lancastrians, seemed to give full security to Edward's government; whose title by blood being now recognised by parliament, and universally submitted to by the people, was no longer in danger of being impeached by any antagonist. In this prosperous situation, the king thought it his turn to enjoy the pleasures which his youth, his high fortune, and his natural temper invited him to enjoy; and the cares of royalty were less attended to, than the disruption of armament and the developments of passion. He had unconsciously given his attention to the feroci-ity of civil wars, was, at the same time, extremely depressed to the softer passions, which, without mitigating his severe temper, maintained a great influence over him, and among the rest Elizabeth, who was remarkable for the grace and beauty of her person, as well as the gallantry of his address, which, even unassisted by his royal dignity, would have rendered him acceptable to the fair, facilitated all his applications for their favour. This easy and agreeable course of unalloyed every day his popularity among all ranks of men: he was the peculiar faux of the young and gay of both sexes. The disposition of the English, little addicted to jealousy, kept themselves from taking unbruised pleasure in his dilapidations: and while it gratified his inclination, was thus become, without design, a means of supporting and securing his government. But as it is difficult to confine the ruling passion within strict rules of prudence, the amusement of his sex, increased the little ill-humour and discontent which he brought to it.

In every incident now tended to widen the breach between the king and this powerful subject. The queen, who lost not her influence by mar-rriage, was equally esteemed by the irritated Edward. She espoused, in second marriage, Sir Richard Woodville, a private gentleman, to whom she bore several children; and her husband being slain in the battle of St. Alban's, fighting on the side of Lancaster, and his estate being for that reason confiscated, his widow retired to live with her father, at her seat of Grafton in Northamptonshire. whence she saw, in every heart, the same public, and both the endearments, careses, and importunities of the young and amiable Edward, proved fruitless against her nag and irascible virtue. His passion, irritated by suppression and distress, was now habitually turned to such honourable sentiments, carried him, at last, beyond all bounds of reason; and he offered to share his throne, as well as his heart, with the woman, who, having no other means of adorning herself, was such a well to entitle her to both. The marriage was privately celebrated at Grafton. The secret was carefully kept for some time: no one suspected, that so libertine prince could sacrifice so much to a romantic passion: and there were, in particular strong reasons, which at that time rendered this step, to the highest degree, dangerous and imprudent. The king, desirous to secure his throne, as well by the prospect of increasing his family, as to his father's testament, determined to make application to some neighbouring princess; and he had cast his eye on Bonn of Savoy, sister to the Queen of France, who, he hoped, would, by her marriage, increase the strength of that power, which was so strongly involved in the task of giving support and assistance to his rival. To render the negotiation more successful, the Earl of Warwick had been despatched to Paris, where the princes then resided;

he had demanded Bonn in marriage for the king; his proposals had been accepted; the treaty was fully concluded; and nothing remained but the ratification of the terms agreed on, and the bringing over the princess to England. But when the secret of Edward's marriage broke out, the naughty Earl, deeming himself affronted, bolted from the court, in this fruitless negotiation, and and being kept a stranger to the king's intentions, who had never been consulted in the formation of that project, and Edward was at once soothing and mitigating, the influence of passion, over so young a man as Edward,
soothing and mitigating, the influence of passion, over so young a man as Edward,
meet have served as an excuse for his impudent conduct, had he deemed it a case of error, or had pleaded his weakness as an apology: but his reconciled them to his superiority by his gracious and popular manners. And as Edward obtained from parliament a general resumption of all grants which he had made under colour of taxation, and which were not extinguished or impoverished the crown; this act, though it passed with some exceptions, particularly one in favour of the Earl of Warwick, gave a general alarm to the nobility, and disturbed the peace of the country. But the most considerable associate that Warwick acquired to his party, was George, Duke of Clarence, the king's second brother. This prince deemed himself no less neglected than ruined. He resented the exclusion of Southwell, the influence of the queen and her relations; and as his fortunes were still left on a precarious footing, while theirs were fully established, this neglect, joined to his unquiet spirit and ambitious schemes, made him seek the support of the malcontents. The favourable opportunity of gaining him was espied by the Earl of Warwick, who offered him in marriage his eldest daughter, and coheir of his immense fortunes, a settlement which, as it was superior to any that the king himself could confer upon him, immediately attached him to the party of the earl. Thus an extensive and dangerous combination was insensibly formed against Edward and his ministry. Though the immediate object of the malcontents was not to overturn the throne, it was difficult to foresee the extremities to which they might be carried: and as opposition to government was usually, in those ages, prosecuted by force of arms, civil commotions and revolutions were to be soon the result of these intrigues and confederacies.

While this cloud was gathering at home, Edward carried his views abroad, and engaged his troops prepared to secure his formidable nobility by entering into foreign alliances. The dark and dangerous ambition of Lewis XI. the more it was known, the greater alarm it excited among his neighbours and vassals; and as it was supported by great abilities, and unrestrained by any principle of faith or humanity, they found no security to themselves but by a jealous combination against him. Philip, Duke of Burgundy, was more active, and more extensive designs were devolved to Charles, his only son, whose marital disposition acquired him the surname of Bold, and whose ambition, more outrageous than that of Lewis, but seconded by less power and policy, was regarded with more favourable eye by the other potentates of Europe. The opposition of interests, and still more a natural antipathy of character, produced a declared animosity between these bad princes; and Edward was thus secure of the sincere attachment of them, whom he should choose to declare himself. The Duke of Burgundy being descended by his mother, a daughter of Portugal, from John of Gaunt, was naturally inclined to favour the house of Lancaster. They were of the same political motives; and Charles, perceiving the interests of that house to be extremely decayed in England, sent over his natural brother, commonly called the Bastard of Burgundy, to carry in his name proposals of marriage to Margaret, the king's sister. The alliance of Burgundy was more popular among the English than that of France; the commercial interests of the two nations invited the princes to a close union; their common jealousy of Lewis was a natural cement between them; and Edward, pleased with strengthening himself by so potent a confederate, soon concluded the alliance, and bestowed his sister upon Charles. A league which Edward at the same time concluded with the powerful Duke of Brittany, seemed both to increase his security, and to open to him the prospect of rivaling his predecessors in those foreign conquests, which, however short-lived and unprofitable, had rendered their reigns so popular and illustrious. But while the ambitious schemes of the Earl of Warwick might have built on these alliances, they were soon frustrated by intestine commotions, which engrossed all his attention. These disorders probably arose not immediately from the influence of Jones, but from accident aided by the turbulent spirit of the age, by the general humour of discontent which that popular nobleman had instilled into the nation, and perhaps by some remains of attachment to the house of Lancaster. Edward had brought into York, from an ancient grant of the Yorkshire,

King Athelstan, a right of levying a thrave of corn upon every plough-land in the county; and as these charitable establishments were so extensive, he cleansed himself of the charge. It was explained that the revenue of the hospital was no longer expended for the relief of the poor, but was secreted by the managers, and employed to their private purposes. After long remonstrating with the administration, they refused payment. Ecclesiastical and civil censures were issued against them; their goods were dismembered, and their persons thrown into jail; till, as their ill-fame daily increased, they rose in arms, fell upon the officers of the hospital, whom they put to the sword; and proceeded in a body, fifteen thousand strong, to the gates of York. Lord Montague, who commanded in those parts, opposed himself to their progress; and having been so fortunate in a skirmish at Arbmire the Earl of Warwick, he immediately set to work the head of a body of Welchmen; and he was joined by five thousand archers under the command of Stafford, Earl of Devonshire, who had succeeded in that title to his father. As the Earl of Pembroke, Sir John Conyers, and Robert Huskisson, he entered immediately to be led to execution, to the practice of the times. The rebels, however, still continued in arms; and being soon headed by men of greater numbers and better discipline than the Earl of Warwick, as Sir John Conyers, Sir Robert Huskisson, and Pembroke, having prevailed in a skirmish, and having taken Sir Henry Nevil prisoner, ordered him immediately to be put to death, without any form of process. But this execrable deed did not satisfy the leaders of the rebels; they attacked the Welch army, routed them, put their sword without mercy; and having seized Pembroke, they took immediate revenge upon him, as the leader, for the execution of Sir Henry Nevil. There was misfortune to the Earl of Devonshire, who had deserted Pembroke, ordered him to be executed in a like summary manner. But these speedy executions, or rather open murders, did not stop there: the northern rebels, sending a party to Graffon, seized the Earl of Rivers and his son John; men who had become obnoxious by their near relation to the king, and his partiality towards them: and they were immediately executed by orders from Sir John Conyers.

There is no part of English history since the Conquest so obscure, so uncertain, so little authentic or consistent, as that of these years between 1460 and 1461; the particular circumstances: some events of the utmost consequence, in which they almost all agree, are incredible and contradicted by records.

A.D. 1466. Edward having taken issue against all the historians, even Camden, and the minister of the ambas-and it is remarkable, that this profound darkness falls upon us just on the eve of the restoration of letters, and when the art of printing was already known in Eu-
era. All we can distinguish with certainty, through the deep cloud which covers that period, is a scene of horror and bloodshed, savage manners, arbitrary executions, and treacherous, dishonourable conduct in all parties. There is no possibility, for instance, of accounting for the views and conduct of Sir Edward Wolsey, during the preceding reign of Edward V., not only because we have no account of his life before this, but also because we know not that he ever held any office, or that he ever exercised any public function. We may therefore presume, that the insurrection which so seriously threatened the peace of the kingdom, engaged all the powers of government, and the might of the state, to avert its consequences; and if the Duke of Clarence, in his government of Calais, during the commencement of this rebellion; and that his brother Montague, had not both together been tricked and taken prisoners, we may presume that it was not intended to proceed from any secret counsels and instigation of Warwick; though the murder committed by the rebels on the Earl of Rivers, his capital enemy, forms, on the other hand, a violent presumption against him. We know that he and Clarence came over to England, offered their service to Edward, were received without any suspicion, were intrusted by him with the highest commands, and still persevered in their fidelity. Soon after, we find the rebelsqueted and dispersed by a general pardon granted by Edward from the advice of the Earl of Warwick: but Montague was so secure of Warwick's fidelity, should have granted a general pardon to men who had been guilty of such violent and personal outrages against him, is not intelligible: nor why that nobleman, if unfaithful, should have endeavoured to appease a rebel who had, so to speak, betrayed his master.

But it appears that, after this insurrection, there was an interval of peace, during which the king loaded the family of Nevil with honours and favours of the highest nature: he made Lord Montague a viscount by the same name; he created his son George, Duke of Bedford, publicly declared his intention of marrying that young nobleman to his eldest daughter, Elizabeth, who, as he had yet no heir, was at that very time engaged to be married to Warwick. We may infer, from this, that so soon after, being invited to a feast by the Archbishop of York, a younger brother of Warwick and Montague, he entertained a sudden suspicion that they intended to secure him in a similar manner; and he abruptly left the entertainment.

So soon after, there broke out another rebellion, which is as unaccountable as all the preceding events; chiefly because no sufficient reason is assigned for it, and because, so far as it appears, the family of Nevil had no hand in exciting and fomenting it. It arose in Lincolnshire, and was headed by Sir Robert Welles, son to the lord of that name. The army of the rebels, in their progress, hearkened to terms; and Sir Robert, for himself, far from giving countenance to them, fled into a sanctuary, in order to secure his person against the king's anger or suspicions. He was arrested from this retreat by a massacre of safety; and it is to be inferred, from his absense, headed along with Sir Thomas Dymoke, by orders from Edward. The king fought a battle with the rebels, defeated them, took Sir Robert Welles and Sir Thomas Laundae prisoners, and ordered them immediately to be beheaded.

Edward, during these transactions, had entertained so little jealousy of the Earl of Warwick or Duke of Clarence, that he sent them with commissions of army to levy forces against the rebels; but these malcontents, as soon as they left the court, raised troops in their own name, issued declarations against the government, and complained of its omission, oppression, and bad management. The unexpected defection of Welles disconcerted all their measures; and they retired northwards into Lancashire, where they expected to be joined by Lord Stanley, who had married the Earl of Warwick's sister. But as that nobleman had been with his brother, as we have already seen, and as Lord Montague also remained quiet in Yorkshire; they were obliged to disband their army, and to fly into Devonshire, where they embarked and made sail towards Calais.

The deputy-governor, whom Warwick had left at Calais, was one Vavasour, a Gascon, who, seeing the Earl return in this miserable condition, refused him admittance; and would not so much as permit the Duchess of Clarence to land; though a few days before she had been delivered on ship-board of a son, and was at that time extremely distressed by sickness. With difficulty he would allow a few flagons of wine to be carried to the ship for the use of the ladies: but as he was a man of sanguinary temper, and well acquainted with the revolutions which England had recently endured, he resolved to seize Warwick for this appearance of infidelity, and represented it as proceeding entirely from zeal for his service. He said, that the fortress was ill supplied with provisions; that he could not depend on the attachment of the garrison; that the inhabitants, who lived by the English commerce, would certainly declare for the established government; that the place was at present unable to resist the power of England on the one hand, and that of the Duke of Burgundy on the other; and that, by seeming to declare for Edward, he would acquire the confidence of that prince, and still keep it in his power, when it should please him to reduce Calais to its ancient subjection. It is uncertain whether Warwick was satisfied with this apology, or suspected a double infidelity in Vavasour; but he declined to be entirely convinced by him; and having seized some Flemish vessels which he found off Calais, he made them compensate him with the utmost possible correspondence, and whom he hoped still to make his instrument in overturning the government of England, and re-establishing the house of Lancaster. No animosity of the king was ever greater than that which now sprung up between that house and the Earl of Warwick. His father had been executed by orders from Margaret: he himself had twice reduced Henry to captivity, had banished the queen, had put to death all the most noted partisans either in the field or on the scaffold, and had occasioned innumerable ills to that unhappy family. For this reason, believing that such inveterate rancour could never admit of any cordial reconciliation, he had not mentioned Henry's name, when he took arms against Edward; and he rather endeavoured to prevail by means of his own adherents, than revive a party which he sincerely hated. But his present distresses and the entreaties of Lewes made him think otherwise; and he determined to make some progress for Angers, where she then resided, an agreement was sent from common interest soon concluded between them. It was stipulated, that Warwick should espouse the cause of Henry, and endeavoured to restore him to liberty, and to re-establish him on the throne; that the administration of the government during the minority of young Edward, Henry's son, should be intrusted conjointly to the Earl of Warwick and the Duke of Clarence; that Prince Edward should marry the Lady Anne, second daughter of that nobleman; and that the crown, in case of the failure of male issue in that prince, should descend to the Duke of Clarence, to the entire exclusion of King Edward and his posterity. Never was confederacy, on all sides, less natural, or more evidently the work of necessity; but Warwick hoped, that all former passions of the Lancastrians might be lost in present political motives; and that at worst, the independent power of his family, and the affections of the people, would suffice to give him security, and enable him to exact the full performance of all the conditions agreed on. The marriage of Prince Edward with the Lady Anne was solemnized; and Edward foresaw that it would be easy to dissolve an alliance composed of such discordant parts. For this purpose, he sent over a lady of great magnificence and address, who belonged to the train of the Duchess of Clarence, and who, under cover of attending the lady, was engaged in making the arrangements for his departure with the duke, and to renew the connexions of that prince with his own family. She represented to Clarence, that he had unwarily, to his own ruin, become the instrument of Warwick's vengeance, and had indirectly and certainly in the eyes of his most inveterate enemies; that the mortal injuries which the one royal family had suffered from the other, were now past all forgiveness, and no imaginary union of interests could ever quiet them; that the leaders were willing to forget past offences, the animosity of their adherents would prevent a sincere coalition of parties, and would, in spite of all temporary and verbal agreements, preserve an eternal enmity that no nobleman for his own safety, and that a prince who deserted his own kindred, and joined the murderers of his father, left himself single, without friends, without protection, and would not, when misfortunes inevitably fell upon him, be so much as entitled to any pity or regard from the rest of mankind. Clarence was only one-and-twenty years of age, and seems to have possessed but a slender capacity; yet could he easily see the force of these reasons; and upon the premises of forgiveness from his brother, he secretly engaged, on a favourable opportunity, to desert the Earl of Warwick, and abandon the Lancastrian party.

During this negociation, Warwick was secretly carrying on a correspondence of the same nature, with his brother the Marquis of Montague, who was entirely trusted by Edward; and like motives produced a like resolution in that nobleman. The marquis also, that he might render the projected blow as effectual as possible, postponed all business, resolved on his side, to watch a favourable opportunity for committing his perjury, and still to maintain the appearance of being a zealous adherent to the house of York.

After these mutual states were thus carefully laid, the decision of the quarrel advanced speedily. Lewis prepared a fleet to escort the Earl of Warwick, and granted him a supply of men and money. The Duke of Burgundy, on the other hand, having already purchased the surrender of the Flemish vessels before Calais, and anxious to support the reigning family in England, with whom his own interests were now connected, fitted out a large fleet, with which he secured the Channel; and he incessantly warned his brother-in-law of the imminent peril to which he was exposed. But Edward, though always brave, and often active, had little foresight or penetration. He was not sensible of his danger; he made no suitable preparations against it; and the thought of the Duke of Burgundy might spare himself the trouble of guarding the seas, and that he wished for nothing more than to see Warwick set foot on English ground. A vain confidence in his own prowess, a surfeit of the immediate love of pleasure, and his incapacity of all sound reason and reflection.

September. Warwick and Clarence return.

The event soon happened, of which Edward seemed so destitute. A storm dispersed the Flemish navy, and left the sea open to Warwick. That nobleman seized the opportunity, and setting sail, quickly landed at Dartmouth, with the Duke of Clarence, the Earls of Oxford and Pembroke, and a small body of troops, while the King was in the north, engaged in suppressing an insurrection which had been raised by Lord Fitz-Hugh, brother-in-law to Warwick. The scene which ensues resembles more the fiction of a poem or romance than an actual event in history. The proceedings point to Lord Warwick, the zeal of the Lancastrian party, the spirit of discontent with which many were infected, and the general instability of the English nation, occasioned by the late foreign revolutions, laid such much stress on his standard, that in a very few days his army amounted to sixty thousand men, and was continually increasing. Edward hastened southwards to encounter him; and the two armies met upon the borders near Nottingham, where a decisive action was every hour expected. The rapidity of Warwick's progress had incapacitated the Duke of Claawowed, the regency was intrusted to Warwick and Clarence till the majority of Prince Edward; and in default of that prince's issue, Clarence was declared successor to the crown. The usual adherents crowd to the Duke of York's side; the Duke of Somerset and Exeter, the Earl of Richmond, Pembroke, Oxford, and Ormond, were reversed; and every one was restored who had lost either honours or fortunes by his former adherer. The ruling party were more sparing in their executions than was usual after any revolution during those violent times. The only victim of distinction was John Tobet, Earl of Worcester. This accomplished person, born in an age and nation where the nobility valued themselves on ignorance as their privilege, and left learning to monks and school-masters, for whom, indeed, the spurious erudition which prevailed was best fitted, had been struck with the first rays of true science, which began to penetrate from the south, and had been zealous by his exhortation and example, to propagate the love of letters among his unpolished countrymen. It is reported, however, that as this nobleman himself the effect which so naturally attends it, of humanizing the temper and softening the heart; and that he had enraged the Lancastrians against him, by the severities which he exercised upon those who had been of an independent spirit. He had deavoured to conceal himself after the flight of Edward; but was caught on the top of a tree in the forest of Wexford, was conducted to London, tried, and beheaded at the Earl of Oxford, condemned and executed. All the other considerable Yorkists either fled beyond sea, or took shelter in sanctuaries, where the ecclesiastical privileges afforded them protection. In London, alone, it is computed that no less than 12,000 persons saved themselves in this manner; and among the rest Edward's queen, who was there delivered of a son, called by his father's name.

Queen Margaret, the other royal queen, had not yet appeared in England; but on receiving intelligence of Warwick's success, was preparing with Prince Edward for her journey. All the banished Lancastrians flocked to her; and among the rest, the Duke of Somerset, son of the duke beheaded after the battle of Hexham. This nobleman, who had long been regarded as the head of the party, had fled into the Low Countries on the discomfiture of his friends; and as he conceived his name and quality, he had there languished in extreme indigniety. Philip de Comines tells us, that the spirit of faction, in which it became very difficult for any man entirely to shake off. These persons, who had long distinguished themselves in the York party, were unable to act with zeal and cordiality for the support of the Lancastrians; and many were frightened by any prospect of favour or accommodation offered them by Edward, to return to their ancient connections. However this may be, Edward's entrance into London made him master not only of that rich and powerful city, but also of the person of Henry, who, destined to be the perpetual sport of fortune, thus fell again into the hands of his enemies.

It appears that Warwick, during his short administration, which had continued only six months, had been guilty of any unpopular act, or had anywise desirous to lose that general favour with which he had so lately overthrown Edward. But this prince, who was formerly on the defensive, was now on the offensive, and in the spring of 1471, he received command to grant some assistance to his brother-in-law; but in such a covert manner as should give the least offense to the English government. He equipped four large vessels, and from the merchants of the ships to be secretly hired from the Easterlings, he delivered that small squadron to Edward, who, receiving also a sum of money from the duke, immediately set sail for the coast of England. No sooner was the expedition in appearance before the duke was revealed, than he issued a proclamation, inhibiting all his subjects from giving him countenance or assistance; as an act which could not deceive the Earl of Warwick, but which might serve as a decent pretence, if that nobleman were so disposed to maintaining friendship with the Duke of Burgundy.

Edward, impatient to take revenge on his enemies, and to recover his lost authority, made an attempt to land with his forces, which exceeded not the number of 10,000 men, in the county of Norfolk; but being there repulsed, he sailed northwards, and disembarked at Ravenspur, in Yorkshire. Finding that the new magistrates, who had been appointed by the Earl of Warwick, kept the people every where from joining him, he pretended, and even made oath, that he came not to challenge the crown, but only the inheritance of the house of York, which of right belonged to him; and that he did not mean to disturb the peace of the kingdom. His partisans every moment flocked to his standard; he was admitted into the city of York; and he was soon in such a situation as gave him hopes of securing all its arms and pretensions. The Marquis of Montague commanded the York county; but from some mysterious reasons, which, as well as many other important transactions in that age, no historian has cleared up, he totally neglected the beginning of Edward's forces, which, he ought to have opposed so formidable. Warwick assembled an army at Leicester, with an intention of meeting and of giving battle to the enemy; but Edward, by taking another road, passed him unobserved, and presented himself before the gates of London.

He had here been refused admission, he was totally undone; but there were many reasons which inclined the citizens to favour him. His numerous friends, issuing from their seclusion, went to meet him in his house among many rich merchants, who had formerly lent him money, saw no other chance for their payment, but his restoration; the city dukes, who had been liberal of their favours to him, and who still retained an affection for this young and gallant prince, swayed their husbands and friends in his favour; and above all, the Archbishop of York, Warwick's brother, to whom the care of the city was committed, had secretly, from unknown reasons, entered into a correspondence with him; and he facilitated Edward's admission into London. The most likely for April, cause which can be assigned for these multiplied infidelities, even in the family of Nevill itself, is the perpetual sport of fortune, thus fell again into the hands of his enemies.
Edward's army. The king, therefore, found himself in a condition to face the Earl of Warwick; who, being reinforced by his son-in-law, the Duke of Clarence, and his brother the Marquis of Montague, took post at Harrow, in the neighbourhood of London. The arrival of Queen Margaret was every day expected, who would have drawn together all the genuine Lancastrians, and have brought a great and powerful army. But, though this very consideration proved a motive to the earl rather to hurry on a decisive action, than to share the victory with rivals and absent enemies, who he foresaw would, in case of success, come forward in the enterprise. But while the jealousy was all directed towards that side, he overlooked the dangerous infidelity of friends, who lay the nearest to his bosom. His brother Montague, who had lately temporised, seems now to have remained sincerely attached to the interest of his family; but his son-in-law, though bound to him by every tie of honour and gratitude, though he shared the power of the regency, though he had been invested by Warwick to all the honours and patrimony of the house of York, resolved to fulfil the secret engagements which he had formerly taken with his brother, and to support the interests of his own family; he deserted to the king in the night-time, and carried over a body of 12,000 men along with him. Warwick was now too far advanced to retreat; and as he rejected with disdain all terms of peace offered him by Edward and Clarence, he was obliged to hazard a general engagement. The battle was fought on both sides; the two armies, in imitation of their leaders, displayed uncommon valour; and the victory remained long undecided between them. But an accident threw the balance to the side of the Yorkists. An accident to Edward's cognizance was a sun; that of Warwick a star with rays; and the misfortune of the morning rendering it difficult to distinguish them, the Earl of Oxford, who fought on the side of the Lancastrians, was by a sun mistaken for a star and attacked by his side. Warwick, contrary to his more usual practice, engaged that day on foot, resolving to show his army that he meant to share every fortune with them; and he was also in the thick of the engagement. His brother underwent the same fate: and as Edward had issued orders not to give any quarter, a great and undistinguished slaughter was made in the pursuit. There fell about 1500 on the side of the Lancastrians.

The same day on which this decisive battle was fought, Queen Margaret and her son, now about eighteen years of age, and a young prince of great hopes, landed at Weymouth, supported by a small body of French forces. When she received intelligence of her husband's captivity, and of the defeat and death of the Earl of Warwick, her courage, which had supported her under so many disastrous events, here quite left her; and she immediately gave way to all the dismal consequences of this calamity. At first she took sanctuary in the abbey of Beaulieu; but being encouraged by the appearance of Tudor, Earl of Pembroke, and Courtney, Earl of Devonshire, of the Lords Wensloe and St. John, with other men of rank, who exulted her still to hope for success, she resumed her former spirit, and determined to defend to the utmost the ruin of her fallen fortunes. She advanced through the counties of Devon, Somerset, and Gloucester, increasing her army on each day's march; but was at last overtaken by the rapid and expeditious Edward at Tewkesbury, on the banks of the Severn. The Lancastrians were here totally defeated: the Earl of Devonshire and Lord Wensloe were killed in the field: the Duke of Somerset, and about twenty other persons of distinction, having taken shelter in a church, were surrounded, dragged out, and immediately beheaded: about 3000 of their side fell in battle: and the army was entirely dispersed.

Queen Margaret and her son were taken prisoners, and brought to the king, who asked the prince, after an insulting manner, how he dared to invade his dominions? The young prince, more mindful of his high birth than of his present fortune, replied, that he came thither to claim his just inheritance. The ungenerous Edward ' Murder of prince insensible to pity, struck him on the face with his gauntlet; and the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester desired Sir Thomas Gray, taking the blow as a signal for further violence, buried the prince into the next apartment, and there despatched him with their daggers. Margaret was thrown into the Tower, and kept in confinement a few days after the battle of Tewkesbury; but when she died a natural or violent death is uncertain. It is pretended, and was generally believed, that the Death of Duke of Gloucester killed him with his own hands. But the universal opinion is, that the prince has incurred, relieved perhaps the nation to aggravate his crimes without any sufficient authority. It is certain, however, that Henry's death was sudden; and, though he was murdered under an ill state of health, this circumstance, joined to the general manners of the age, gave a natural ground of suspicion; which was rather increased than diminished by the exposing of his body to public view.

That preference made only the more evident in the accounts in the English history, and to suggest the comparison.

All the hopes of the house of Lancaster seemed now to be utterly extinguished. Every legitimate prince of that family was either a prisoner, a fugitive, or a rebel; the party had perished in battle or on the scaffold: the Earl of Pembroke, who was levying forces in Wales, disbanded his army when he received intelligence of the battle of Tewkesbury; and he fled into Brittany with his nephew, the young Prince of Wales, Richard, who, having been now fully restored to the nation, a parliament was summoned, which ratified, as usual, all the acts of the vector, and recognised his legal authority.

But this prince, who had been so firm, and active, and intrepid, during the course of adversity, was still unable to resist the allurements of a prosperous fortune; and he wholly devoted himself, as before, to pleasure and amusement.

A. D. 1462. He who could give him anxiety or alarm. He recovered, however, by this gay and inoffensive course of life, and by his easy, familiar manners, that popularity which it is natural he should have acquired; and his reputation was exercised upon his enemies; and the example also of his royal festivity served to abate the former acrimony of faction among his subjects, and to restore the social disposition which had been so long interrupted between the opposite parties. All men seemed to be fully satisfied with the present government; and the memory of past calamities served only to impress the people more strongly with a sense of their allegiance, and with the resolution of never incurring any more the hazard of renewing such dreadful scenes.

But while the king was thus indulging himself in pleasures, he was harassed from his lethargy by the prospect of foreign enemies, which it is probable his desire of popularity, more than the spirit of ambition, had made him covet. Though he deemed himself little beholden to the Duke of Burgundy for the reception which that prince had given him during his exile, the political interests of his states maintained still a close connexion between them; and they agreed to unite their arms in making a powerful invasion of France. A league was formed in which Edward stipulated to pass the seas with an army exceeding 10,000 men, and to invade the French territories: Charles promised to join him with all his forces: the king was to challenge the crown of France, and to obtain at least the provinces of Normandy and Guienne: the duke was to acquire Champagne and some other territories, and to free all his dominions from the burden of homage to the crown of France; and neither party was to make peace without the consent of the other. They were the more encouraged to hope for success from this league, as the Count of St. Pol, constable of France, was in a condition that he was unable to defend his towns on the Somme, had secretly promised to join them; and there were also hopes of engaging the Duke of Brabant to enter into the confederacy. The terms were as usual a sure means of making the parliament open their purses, as far as the habits of that age would permit. They voted the king a tenth of rents, or two shillings in the pound; which must have been very inaccurately assessed, since it produced only 31,460 pounds; and they added to this supply a whole fifteenth, and three quarters of another; but as the king deemed these sums still unequal to the undertaking, he attempted to levy money by way of remorse, a habit of exaction which except during the reigns of Henry III. and Richard II. had not been much practised in former times, and which, though the consent of the parliaments was pretended to be gained, could not be deemed entirely voluntary unless its terms were exemplified. The parliametary grant show sufficiently the spirit of the nation in this respect. The money levied by the fifteenth was not to be put into the king's hands, but to be kept in religious houses; and the king had promised that neither should take place, it was immediately to be refunded to the people. After these grants the parliament was dissolved, which had sitten near two years and a half, and had undergone several prorogations; a practice not very usual at that time in England.

A.D. 1453.

The king passed over to Calais with an army of 1500 men at arms, and 15,000 archers; attended by all the chief nobility of England, and some of the barons of Germany, and against the past, were eager to appear on this great theatre of honour; but all their sanguine hopes were dashed when they found, on entering the French territories, that neither did the constable open his gates to them, nor the Duke of Burgundy bring them the smallest assistance. That prince, transported by his ardent temper, had carried all his armies to a great distance, and had employed them in a war of the frontiers of Germany, and against the Duke of Lorrain: and though he came in person to Edward, and endeavoured to apologise for this breach of treaty, there was no prospect that they would be able to conclude any advantageous peace with the English. This circumstance gave great disgust to the king, and inclined him to hearken to those advances which Lewis continually made him for an accommodation.

That monarch, more swayed by political views than by the point of honour, deemed no submissions too mean, which might free him from enemies who had proved so formidable to his predecessors, and who, united to so many other enemies, might still shake the well established government of France. It appears from Comines, that this discipline was at this time very imperfect among the English; and that their civil wars, though long continued, yet being always decided by hasty battles, had still left their marks upon the English, and the people of whom the army of Burgundy was ever ready to receive upon the continent. But as Lewis was sensible that the warlike genius of the people would soon render them excellent soldiers, he was far from hesitating to present them with the English. This circumstance of experience and he employed all his art to detach them from the alliance of Burgundy. When Edward sent him a herald to claim the crown of France, and to carry him a defiance in case of refusal, Lewis, on answering to this bravo de hauts terms, he replied, I shall make the same to you, and even made the herald a considerable prize: he took afterwards an opportunity of sending a herald to the Eng-
had taken his measures so ill with his allies, as to be obliged, after such an expensive armament, to return without making any acquisitions adequate to it: it showed the wanton dignity in Lewis, who, rather than run the hazard of a battle, agreed to subject his kingdom to a tribute, and thus acknowledge the superiority of a neighbouring prince, possessed of less power and territory than himself. But, as Lewis made interest the sole test of honour, he thought that all the advantages of the treaty were on his side, and that he had overreached Edward, by sending him out of France on such easy terms. For this reason, he was solicitous to term his true intentions, and he strictly enjoined his courtiers never to show the English the least sign of mockery or derision. But he did not himself very carefully observe so prudent a rule; he could not forbear, one day, in the joy of his heart, throwing some sort of a badminton court under the English, a thing very different to all his usual deportment, and he justly plunged his courtiers never to show the English the least sign of mockery or derision. He did not, but was overwhelmed by a gentleman who had sat in England. He was immediately sensible of his indiscretion: sent a message to the gentleman; and offered him such advantages in his own country, as engaged him to remain in France. It is but just, said he, that I pay the penalty of my talkativeness. The most honourable part of Lewis's treaty with Edward was the matter of the ransom for the body of Queen Margaret, who, though after the death of her husband and son she could no longer be formidable to government, was still detained in custody by Edward. Lewis paid fifty thousand crowns for her ransom; and that prince, who had been on the stage of the world, and was during his lifetime experienced a variety of fortune, passed the remainder of her days in tranquillity and privacy, till the year 1482, when she died: an admirable princess, but more illustrious by her undaunted spirit in adversity, than by her moderation in prosperity. She seems neither to have enjoyed the virtues, nor been subject to the weaknesses, of her sex; and was as much trusted with the confidence as endowed with the courage of that barbarous age in which she lived.

Though Edward had so little reason to be satisfied with the conduct of the Duke of Burgundy, he reserved to that prince, power over the territories of Flanders; but Charles, when the offer was made him, haughtily replied, that he was able to support himself without the assistance of England, and that he would make no peace with Lewis till three months after Edward's return into his own country. This prince possessed all the ambition and courage of a conqueror; but being defective in policy and prudence, qualities no less essential, he was unfortunate in all his enterprises, and perished at the battle of the Marais, a people whom he despised, and who, though brave and free, had hitherto been in a manner overlooked in the general system of Europe. This event, which happened in the year 1477, proved a most alternate in the views of all the princes and states, and attended with consequences which were felt for many generations. Charles left only one daughter, Mary, by his first wife; and this princess, being heir of his opulent and extensive domains, was coveted by all the potentates of Christendom, who contended for the possession of such a rich prize. Lewis, the head of her family, might, by a proper application, have obtained this match for the dauphin, and have thereby united to the crown of France all the provinces of the Low Countries, together with Burgundy, Artois, and Picardy; which would at once have rendered his kingdom an overmatch for all its neighbours. But a man wholly interested is not subject to the romance of true policy by the passions of minuteness and severity. He had imbibed so deep a hatred to the house of Burgundy, that he was unwilling to exchange that princely treasure by arms, than unite her to his family by marriage; he conquered the duchy of Burgundy, and that part of Picardy, which had been ceded to Philip the Good by the treaty of Arras; but he thereby forced the states of the Netherlands to bestow their sovereign in marriage on Maximilian of Austria, son of the Emperor Frederick, from whom they looked for protection in their present distresses; and by this means, France lost the opportunity, which she never could recall, of making that important acquisition of power and territory.

During this interesting crisis, Edward was no less defective in policy, and not less actuated by personal passions, unworthy of a sovereign and a statesman. Jealousy of his brother Clarence had caused him to neglect the advances which were made of marrying that prince, and he was so angry at the present, that he would not hear of any proposal to receive the princess, and he sent her proposals of espousal Anthony, Earl of Rivers, brother to his queen, who still retained an entire ascendancy over him. But the match was rejected with disdain; and Edward, resenting this treatment of his brother with the utmost force, attempted to proceed without interruption in her conquests over his defiance. Any pretence sufficed for abandoning himself entirely to indulgence and pleasure, which were now become his ruling passions. The only object which divided his attention, was the improving of the public revenue, which had been dilapidated by the necessities or negligence of his predecessors; and some of his expedients for that purpose, though not always advantageous to his people and oppressive to the people, the detail of private wrongs naturally escapes the notice of history; but an act of tyranny, of which Edward was guilty in his own family, has been taken notice of by all writers, and has met with general approbation. The Duke of Clarence, by all his services to deserting Warwick, had never been able to regain the king's friendship, which he had forfeited by his former confrontery with that nobleman. He was still regarded at court as a man of a dangerous and a fickle character; and the imprudent openness and violence of his temper, though it rendered him much less dangerous, tended extremely to alienate the king, and to incense him against him. Among others, he had had the misfortune to give displeasure to the queen herself, as well as to his brother the Duke of Gloucester, a prince of the ducal house, of the most unrelenting ambition, and the least scrupulous in the means which he employed for the attainment of his ends. A combination between these potent adversaries being secretly formed against Clarence, it was determined to begin by attacking his friends; in hopes, that if he patiently endured this injury, his pusillanimity would dishonour him in the eyes of the public; if he made resistance, and expressed resentment, his passion would betray him into measures which might give them the means of depriving him of the throne; for, at last day in the park of Thomas Burdet, of Arrow, in Warwickshire, had killed a white buck, which was a great favourite of the owner; and Burdet, vexed at the loss, broke into a passion and shot at the form of the deer in the belly of the person who had advised the king to commit that insult upon him. This natural expression of resentment, which would have been overlooked or forgotten had it fallen from any other person, was rendered criminal and capital in that gentleman, by the friendship in which he had the misfortune to live with the Duke of Clarence: he was tried for his life; the judges and jury were found service enough to condemn him; and he was publicly beheaded in the same year, with an ordinance of the Low Countries, which took away the privileges of the provinces of the Low Countries, and those of all the other provinces, which were more beneficial to astronomy than was usual in that age, lay under the imputation of necromancy with the ignorant vulgar; and the court had hold of this popular rumour to effect his destruction. He was brought to his trial for that imaginary crime; many of the greater part of the people, to avoid the suspicion of their presence; he was condemned, put to the torture, and executed.

The Duke of Clarence was alarmed when he found these acts of tyranny executed against him; he reflected on the fate of the good Duke of Gloucester in the last reign, who, after seeing the most infamous pretences employed for the destruction of his nearest connexions, at last fell himself a victim to the vengeance of his enemies. But Clarence, instead of securing his own life against these dangers, was provoked, as it were, open and loud in justifying the innocence of his friends, and in exculpating against the iniquity of their persecutors. The king, highly offended with his freedom, or using a language shewn by events to be false, 'must, at the request of John and Isabella, 10th Jan., give the Tower a summons and try him for his life before the House of Peers, the supreme tribunal of the nation. The trial was conducted with a most arraigning public justice, by maintaining the innocence of men who had been condemned in courts of judicature; and of inveighing against the iniquity of the king, who had given orders for their prosecution. Many rash expressions were imputed to him, and some, too, reflecting on Edward's legitimacy; but he was not accused of any overt act of treason; and even the truth of these speeches may be doubted of, since the liberty of judgment was given him as his brother's accuser, and pleading the cause against him. But a sentence of condemnation, even when this extraordinary circumstance had not place, was a necessary consequence, in those times, of any prosecution in which the fate of a prince was at stake. The necessity of the parliament during that age, furnish us with examples of a strange contrast of freedom and servility: they scruple to grant, and sometimes refuse, to the king the smallest supplies, the most necessary for the support of government, even the most necessary for the maintenance of wars, for which the nation, as well as the parliament itself, expressed great fondness; but they never scruple to continue in the act of injustice or tyranny, which falls on any individual, bowever distinguished by birth or merit. These maxims, so ungenerous, so opposite to all principles of good government, so contrary to the practice of present parliaments, are very remarkable in all the transactions of the English history, for more than a century after the period in which we are now engaged.

The only favour which the king granted his brother, after his condemnation, was to leave him till the close of his life; and he was privately drowned in a butt of maltseyse in the Tower: a whimsical chance, which implies that he had an extraordinary passion for that liquor. The duke left two children by the eldest daughter of Warwick; a boy, born in the earl by his grandfather's title, and a daughter, afterwards Countess of Salisbury. Both this prince and princess were also unfortunate in their end, and died a violent death; a fate which for many years attended almost the descendants of the royal blood in England. There preriegs a report, that a chief source of the violent prosecution of the Duke of Clarence, whose name was George, was a current prophecy, that the king's son should be murdered by one, the initial letter of whose name was G. It is not impossible but, in those ignorant times, such a silly reason might have some influence: but it is more probable, that the whole story is the invention of a subsequent period, and founded on true pleasure and the children by the Duke of Gloucester. Comines remarks, that, at that time, the English never were without some stupendous prophecy or other, by which they accounted for events unexplained.

All the glories of Edward's reign terminated with the civil wars; where his laures too were extremely sullied with blood, violence, and cruelty. His spirit seems afterwards to have been consumed in a subsequent period, and founded on true pleasure and the children by the Duke of Gloucester. Comines remarks, that, at that time, the English never were without some stupendous prophecy or other, by which they accounted for events unexplained.

aimed rather at maintaining an independent influence and authority. Lord Hastings, the chamberlain, was another leader of the same party; and as this nobleman had, by his bravery and activity, as well as by his approved fidelity, acquired the confidence and favour of his master, he had been able, though with some difficulty, to induce Henry against the credit of the queen. The Lords Howard and Stanley maintained a connexion with these two noblemen, and brought a considerable accession of influence and reputation to their party. All the other barons, who had no particular dependence on the queen, adhered to the same interest; and the people in general, from their natural envy against the prevailing power, bore great favour to the cause of the new party.

But Edward knew, that though he himself had been able to overawe those rival factions, many disorders might arise from their contests during the minority of his son; and he therefore took care, in his last illness, to summon together several of the leaders on both sides, and, by composing their ancient quarrels, to provide, as far as possible, for the future tranquillity of the government. After expressing his intentions that his brother, the Duke of Gloucester, then absent in the north, should be intrusted with the regency, he recommended to them peace and unanimity during the tender years of his son; represented to them the dangers which must attend the continuance of these dissensions, and endeavoured each in return with all the appearance of the most cordial reconciliation. But this temporary or signed agreement lasted no longer than the king's life: he had no sooner expired, than the several parties broke up; and each ought, as they had applied, by separate messages, to the Duke of Gloucester, and endeavoured to acquire his favour and friendship.

This prince, during his brother's reign, had endeavoured to sustain good terms with both parties; and his high birth, his extensive abilities, and his great services, had enabled him to support himself without falling into a dependence on either. But the new situation of affairs, which was now to devolve upon him, immediately changed his measures; and he secretly determined to preserve no longer that neutrality which he had hitherto maintained. His exorbitant ambition, unrestrained by any principle either of justice or humanity, made him carry his views to the possession of the crown itself; and as this object could not be attained without the ruin of the queen and her family, he felt without hesitation into concert with the opposite party. But being sensible that no measures could be likely to succeed, unless he could effect his criminal purposes, he redoubled his professions of zeal and attachment to that princess; and he gained such credit with her, as to influence her conduct in a point, which, from her prudence and integrity, was violently disputed between the opposite factions.

The young king, at the time of his father's death, resided in the castle of Ludlow, on the borders of Wales; whether he had been sent, that the influence of his presence might overawe the Welch, and restore the tranquillity of that country, which had been disturbed by some late commotions. His person was committed to the care of his uncle, the Earl of Rivers, the most accomplished nobleman in England, who, having united an uncommon taste for literature to great abilities in business, and valour in the field, was entitled, by his talents, still more than by nearness of blood, to direct the education of the young monarch. The queen, anxious to preserve that ascendent over her son, which she had long maintained over her husband, wrote to the Earl of Rivers, that he should levy a body of forces, in order to escort the king to London, to protect him during his conversion, and to keep him from falling into the hands of their enemies. The opposite faction, sensible that Edward was now of an age when great advantages could be made of his name and countenance, and endeavoured by the means legally entitled to exert in person his authority, foresaw, that the tendency of this measure was to perpetuate their subjection under their rivals; and they vehemently opposed a resolution which they represented as the signal for renewing a civil war in the kingdom. Lord Hastings threatened to depart instantly to his government of Calais, and the other nobles seemed resolved to oppose force by force: and as the Duke of Gloucester, on pretence of pacifying the quarrels, rather than of supporting himself against the armed power, which might be dangerous, and was nowise necessary, the queen, trusting to the sincerity of his friendship, and overawed by so violent an opposition, recalled him himself to Northampton, in order to sign the measure to bring up a greater revenue than should be necessary to support the state and dignity of the young sovereign.

The Duke of Gloucester, meanwhile, set out from York, attended by the numerous train of his family. When he reached Northampton, he was joined by the Duke of Buckingham, who was also attended by a splendid retinue; and as he heard that the king was hourly expected on that road, he resolved to await his arrival, under colour of conducting him thence in person to London. The Earl of Rivers, apprehensive that the place would be too narrow to contain so many attendants, sent his pupil forward by another road to Stony-Stratford; and came himself to Northampton, in order to sign himself for this measure, and to pay his respects to the Duke of Gloucester. He was received with the greatest appearance of cordiality; he passed the evening in an amicable manner with the young prince, and the next day, riding in the road with them next day to join the king: but as he was entering Stony-Stratford, he was arrested by orders from the Duke of Gloucester. The Earl of Rivers arrested, and his brother-in-law, the Duke of Gloucester, was at the same time put under a guard, together with Sir Thomas Vaughan, who possessed a considerable office in the king's household; and all the prisoners were instantly conducted to Princet. Gloucester approached the young prince with the greatest demonstrations of respect; and endeavoured to satisfy him with regard to the violence committed on his uncle and brother: but Edward, much attached to these near relations, by whom he had been tenderly educated, was not such a master of dissimulation as to conceal his displeasure.

The people however were extremely rejoiced at this revolution; and the duke was received in London with the loudest acclamations: but the queen no sooner received intelligence of her brother's imprisonment, than she foresaw that Gloucester's violence would not stop there, and that her own ruin, if not that of all her children, was now inseparable, determined, therefore, to seek the sanctuary of Westminster, attended by the Marquis of Dorset; and she carried thither the five princesses, together with the Duke of York. She trusted, that the ecclesiastical privileges which had formerly, during the absence of her husband and family, guaranteed her protection against the fury of the Lancastrian faction, would not now be violated by her brother-in-law, while her son was on the throne; and she resolved to await there the return of better fortune. But Gloucester, anxious to have the Duke of York in his power, proposed to take him by force from the sanctuary; and he represented to the privy-council, both the indignity put upon the government by the queen's ill-grounded apprehensions, and the necessity of the young prince's appearance at the ensuing coronation of his brother. It was further urged, that ecclesiastical privileges were originally intended only to give protection to unhappy subjects, accused of their debts or crimes; and were entirely useless to a person who, by reason of his tender age, could lie under the burden of neither, and who, for the same reason, was utterly incapable of claiming sanctuary from any sanctuary. But the two archbishops, Cardinal Beaufort and Rotherham, Archbishop of York, protesting against the sacriilege of this measure, it was agreed that they should first endeavour to bring the queen to compliance by personal persuasion, when he would offer himself against her. These prelates were persons of known integrity and honour; and being themselves entirely persuaded of the duke's good intentions, they employed every argument, accompanied with earnest entreaties, exhortations, and assurances, to bring her over to the same opinion. She long continued obstinate, and missted, that the Duke of York, by living in the sanctuary, was not only secure himself, but gave security to the king; but the在一个，while his successor and avenger remained in safety. But finding that none supported her in these sentiments, and that force, in case of refusal, was threatened by the council, she at last complied, and produced her son to the council. She was here on a sudden struck with a kind of presage of his future fate: she tenderly embraced him; she bedewed him with her tears; and biding him an eternal adieu, declared all the expressions of regret and reluctance, into their custody.

The Duke of Gloucester, being the nearest male of the royal family capable of exercising the government, seemed entitled, by the customs of the realm, to the office of protector; and the council, not waiting for the Duke of Gloucester consent of parliament, made no scruple of investing him with that high dignity. The general prejudice entertained by the nobility against the queen, and her kindred, occasioned that precipitation and irregularity; and no one foresaw any danger to the succession, much less to the lives of the young princes, from a measure so obvious and so natural. Besides that the duke of Gloucester had been by his accusers, who he had produced the issue of Edward, together with the two children of Clarence, seemed to be an eternal obstacle to his and his family's safety; and it was determined to destroy so many persons possessed of a preferable title, and imprudent to exclude them. But a man who had abandoned all principles of honour and humanity, was soon warped by his prevalent passion here; and the rules of fear or caution, and even of justice, Gloucester, having so far succeeded in his views, no longer hesitated in removing the other obstructions which lay between him and the throne.

The death of Earl Rivers, and of the other prisoners detained, was first determined; and he was easily obtained the consent of the Duke of Buckingham, as well as of Lord Hastings, to this violent and sanguinary measure. However easy it was, in those times, to procure a sentence against the most innocent person, it appeared still more easy to despatch an enemy, without any trial or form of process; and orders were accordingly issued to Sir Richard Ratcliffe, a proper instrument in the hands of this tyrant, to despatch the two young princes. The protector then assailed the fidelity of Buckingham by all the arguments capable of swaying a vicious mind, which knew no motive of action but interest and ambition. He represented, that the execution of persons so nearly related to the king, who had been the means of the protector, with their children, was not expedient. He added that the fate he so much resented, would never pass unpunished; and all the actors in that scene were bound in prudence to prevent the effects of his future vengeance: that it would be impossible to keep the queen for ever at a distance from her son, and equally impossible to prevent her from instilling into his tender mind the thoughts of retaliating, by like executions, the sanguinary insults committed on her family: that the only method of obviating these mischiefs, was to put the sceptre in the hands of a man of whose friendship the duke might be assured, and whose years and experience taught him to pay respect to merit, and to the rights of ancient nobility: that the same necessity which had curbed them so far in resisting the usurpation of these intruders, must justify them in attempting further innovations, and in making, by national consent, a new settlement of the succession. To these reasons, he added the offers of great private advantages to the Duke of Buckingham; and he easily obtained from him a promise of supporting him in all his enterprises.

The Duke of Gloucester, knowing the importance of gaining Lord Hastings, sounded at a distance his sentiments, by means of Catesby, a lawyer, who lived in great intimacy with that nobleman; but found him impregnable in his allegiance and fidelity to the children of Edward, who had ever honoured him with his friendship. He therefore knew, that all his efforts were to be kept with him; and he determined to ruin utterly the man whom he despaired of engaging to concur in his usurpation. On the very day when Rivers, Gray, and Vaughan were executed, or rather murdered, at Pomfret, the protector summoned a council in the Tower; whether that nobleman, suspecting no design against him, repaired without hesitation. The Duke of Gloucester was capable of committing such a bloody and traitorous act with the utmost coolness and indifference. On taking his place at the council-table, he appeared in the easiest and most jovial humourimaginable. He seemed to indulge himself in familiar conversation with the counsellors, before they should enter on business; and having paid some compliments to Morton, Bishop of Ely, on the good and early strawberries which he raised in his garden at Holbeach, he begged the favour of having a dish of them, which that prate immediately despatched a servant to bring to him. The protector then left the council, as if called away by some other business; but soon after returning with an angry and inflamed countenance, he asked a number of those assembled whether they would have deserted his life against his life, who was so nearly related to the king, and was intrusted with the administration of government! Hastings replied, that they merited the punishment of death. Their protector, said he, was my lord George, my brother's wife, and Jane Shore, his mistress, with others, their associates: we to what a condition they have reduced me by their incantations and witchcraft: upon which he laid bare his arm, all his hands and fingers. But the counsellors, who knew that this infamy had attended him from his birth, looked on each other with amazement; and above all, Lord Hastings, who, as he had since Edward's death engaged in an intrigue with Jane Shore, was naturally anxious concerning the issue of these extraordinary proceedings. Certainly, my lord, said he, if they be guilty of these crimes, they deserve the severest punishment.—And do you reply to me, exclaimed the protector, with your life and your lands! You are the chief abettor of that witch Shore: you are yourself a traitor: and I swear by St. Paul, that I will not dure before your head be brought me. He struck the table with his hand: the alarmed men rushed in as the signal; the counsellors were thrown into the utmost consternation: and one of the guards, as by accident or mistake, aimed a blow with a poll-axe at Lord Stanley, who, aware of the danger, sunk under the shock; and though he saved his life, was severely wounded in the head in the protector's presence. Hastings was seized, was hurried away, and Execution of instantly beheaded on a timber log which Lord Hastings lay in the court of the Tower. Two hours after, a proclamation, well penned and fairly written, was read to the citizens of London, enumerating his offences, and apologizing to them, from the suddenness of the discovery, for the sudden execution of that nobleman, who was very popular among them: but the saying of a merchant was much talked of on the occasion, who remarked, that the proclamation was certainly drawn by the spirit of prophecy.

Lord Stanley, the Archbishop of York, the Duke of Ely, and other counsellors, were committed prisoners in different chambers of the Tower: and the protector, in order to carry on the face of his accusations, ordered the goods of Jane Shore to be seized; and at the same time, no longer unalloyed by the mercuries and others with their gallantries and intrigues as the meanest treble eves to be treated with. The protector, however, might have been indicted by Richard, or founded on a precedent of some similar and public nature of manners affecting the person of a sovereign; yet he feared not to proceed against his protector, without the privity of Sir Thomas Hoby. The preface is remarkable for the hypotetical and laconical manner of visitors affecting the person of a sovereign; yet he feared not to proceed against his protector, without the privity of Sir Thomas Hoby.
Paul's, before the whole people. This lady was born of reputable parents, in London, was well educated, and married to a substantial citizen; but unhappily, views of interest, more than the man's inclinations, had been consulted in the match, and her mind, though framed for virtue, had proved unable to resist the allurements of Edward, who solicited her favours. But while seduced from her duty by this gay and amorous monarch, she still maintained all her titles after this dishonour; and the natural descendant which her charms and vivacity long maintained over him, was all employed in acts of beneficence and humanity. She was still forward to oppose calumny, to protect the oppressed, to relieve the indigent; and in her gown of office, the voluminous dictates of her heart, never waited the solicitation of presents, or the hopes of reciprocal services. But she lived not only to feel the bitterness of shame, imposed on her by this tyrant, but to experience, in old age and poverty, the ingratitude of those courtiers who had long solicited her friendship, and been protected by her credit. No one, among the great multitudes whom she had obliged, had the humanity to bring her consolation or relief; she languished out her life in solitude and indignation: and amidst a court informed to the most atrocious crimes, the frailties of this woman justified all violations of friendship towards her, and all neglect of former obligations.

These acts of violence, exercised against the crown, were the more daring, from the crown's connexion with the late king, who had solicited her favours in that capacity. The licentious life of Edward, who was not restrained in his pleasures either by honour or prudence, afforded a pretext for declaring his marriage with the queen invalid, and all his potent illegitimacy. It was asserted, that before espousing the Lady Elizabeth Gray, he had paid court to the Lady Evanl Talbot, daughter of the Earl of Shrewsbury; and being repulsed by the latter, he now, therefore, by the force of argument, or he could not satisfy his desires, to consent to a private marriage, without any witnesses, by Stilling, Bishop of Bath, who afterwards divulged the secret. It was also maintained, that the act of attaint passed against the Duke of Clarence had virtually incapacitated his children from succeeding to the crown; and these two families being set aside, the protector remained the only true and legitimate heir of the house of York. But as it would be difficult, if not impossible, to prove the preceding marriage of the late king; and as the rule which excludes the heirs of an attainted crown from private successions, was never extended to a brother of a crown; the protector resolved to make another of another place still more shameless and scandalous. His partisans were taught to maintain, that both Edward IV. and the Duke of Clarence were illegitimate; that the Duchess of York had received different lovers into her bed, who were the fathers of these children; that their resemblance to those gallants was a sufficient proof of their spurious birth; and that the Duke of Gloucester alone, of all her sons, appeared, by his features and countenance, to be the true offspring of the Duke of York. Nothing can be imagined more impudent than this assertion, which threw so foul an imputation on his own mother, a princess of irreproachable virtue, and then alive; yet the plea chosen for first promulgating it was the ground, before a large congregation, and in the protector's presence. Dr.

Shaw was appointed to preach in St. Paul's; and having chosen this passage for his text, Bystard slipped off the pulpit, and dashing on this side and that, acknowledged the dissipation and incontinency, which could discredit the birth of Edward IV. the Duke of Clarence, and of all their children. He then broke out in a panegyric on the Duke of Gloucester; and exclaimed, Behold this excellent prince, the express image of heaven on earth, the air of majesty, the residence of glory; bearing, no less in the virtues of his mind, than in the features of his countenance, the character of the gallant Richard, once your hero and favourite: he alone is entitled to your consideration; he alone restored the lost glory and honour of the nation." It was previously concurred, that as the doctor should pronounce these words, the Duke of Gloucester should enter the church; and it was expected that the audience would cry out, God save King Richard! which would immediately have been laid hold of as a popular consent, and interpreted to be the voice of the nation: but by a ridiculous mistake, worthy of the whole scene, the duke did not appear till after this exclamation instanter readied by the doctor. The doctor was therefore obliged to repeat his rhetorical figure out of its proper place: the audience, less from the absurd conduct of the discourse, than from their detestation of these proceedings, kept a profound silence; and the protector and his preachers were equally at a loss in their stratagem.

But the duke was too far advanced to recede from his criminal and ambitious purpose. A new expedient was tried to work on the people. The mayor, who was brother to Dr. Shaw, and entirely in the protector's interest, called an assembly of the citizens; where the Duke of Buckingham, who possessed some talents for eloquence, ranged himself on the protector's side, and displayed those numerous virtues of which, he pretended, that prince was possessed. He next asked them, whether they would have the duke for king? and then stopped, in expectation of hearing the cry, God save the Duke! He was surprised to observe them silent; and turning about to the mayor, asked him the reason. The mayor replied, that perhaps they did not understand him. Buckingham then repeated the question, and enforced the same tinges, asked the same question, and was received with the same silence. "I now see the cause" said the mayor; "the citizens are not accustomed to be asked who is your master, and to answer, God save the Duke!" The recorder, Fitz-Williams, was then commanded to repeat the substance of the duke's speech; but the man, who was averse to the office, took care, throughout his whole discourse, to keep his expression good, and nothing but what he spoke nothing of himself, and that he only conveyed to them the voice of the Duke of Buckingham. Still the audience kept a profound silence: "This is wonderful obstancy," cried this man; "express your meaning, my friends, one way or other; when we apply to you on this occasion, it is merely from the regard which we bear to you. The Lords and Commons have sufficient authority, without your consent, to appoint a king; but I require you here to declare in plain terms, whether or not you will have the Duke of Gloucester for your sovereign." After all these efforts, some of the meanest apprentices, incited by the protector, with Buckingham's aid, raised a feverish cry, God save King Richard! The shouts and confusion of the nation were so sufficiently declared: the voice of the people was the voice of God: and Buckingham, with the mayor, hastened to Baynard's castle, where the protector then resided, that they might make him a tender of the crown. When Richard was told that a great multitude was in the court, he refused to appear to them, and pretended to be apprehensive for his personal safety; a circumstance taken notice of by Buckingham, who observed to the citizens that the prince was ignorant of the whole design. At last he was persuaded to step forth, but he still kept at some distance; and his conduct was such that the people knew nothing of himself, and that he only conveyed to them the voice of the protector. The protector then delivered you from the domination of all intruders: he alone can restore the orders to Sir Robert Brakenbury, constable of the Tower, to put his nephews to death; but this gentleman, who had sentiments of honour, refused to have any hand in the infamous office. The tyrant then sent for Sir James Tyrell, who promised obedience; and he ordered Brakenbury to resign to this gentleman the keys and government of the Tower for one night. Tyrell, choosing three associates, Slater, Dighton, and Tonna, came in the night-time to the door of the chamber where the princes were lodged; and sending in the assassins, he bade them execute their commission, while he himself stood without. They found the young princes fast asleep, and fell into a profound sleep. After suffocating them with the bolster and pillows, they showed their naked bodies to Tyrell, who ordered them to be buried at the foot of the stairs, deep in the ground, under a heap of stones. These circumstances were all confessed by the actors in the following reign; and they were never punished for the crime: probably, because Henry, whose maxims of government were extremely arbitrary, desired to establish it as a principle, that the commands of the reigning sovereign ought to justify every enormity in those who paid obedience to them. But there is one circumstance not so easy to be accounted for: it is pretended, that Richard, dispelled with the assassins, and after having left his nephews at the door, he had murdered, gave his chaplain orders to dig up the bodies, and to inter them in consecrated ground; and as the man died soon after, the place of their burial remained unknown. The4 story of the young princes having died as the chaplain ordered, he searched for which Henry could make for them. Yet in the reign of Charles II. there was occasion to remove some stones, and to dig in the very spot which was mentioned as the place of their interment, the bones of two persons were taken up, and showed to be of a size corresponding to the age of Edward and his brother; they were concluded with certainty to be the remains of those princes, and were interred under a marble monument, by orders of King Charles. Perhaps Richard's chaplain had died before he found an opportunity of executing his master's commands; and the bodies being supposed to be already removed, a diligent search was not made for them by Henry in the place where they had been burned.

RICHARD III.

The first acts of Richard's administration were to bestow rewards on those who had assisted him in usurping the crown, and to rain, by favours, those who he thought were best able to support his future government. Thomas Howard, his elder brother, received the crown; Thomas Howard, his son, Earl of Surrey; Lord Lovel, a Viceroy, by the same name; even Lord Stanley was set at liberty, and made steward of the household. This nobleman had been banished by his father, by the rejection of Richard's views, and also by his marrying the Countess dowager of Buckingham, heir of the Somerset family; but sensible of the necessity of submitting to the present government, he sought zeal for Richard's service, that he was received into favour, and even found means to be intrusted with the most important commands by that politic and jealous tyrant. Such a person who, both from the greatness of his services, and the power and splendour of his family, was best entitled to favours under the new government, was the Duke of Buckingham; and Richard seemed determined to spare no pains or bounty in securing him to his interests. Buckingham was descended from a daughter of Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, uncle to Richard II. and by this pedigree he not only was allied to the royal family, but had claims for dignities as well as estates of a very extensive nature. The Duke of Gloucester, and Henry, Earl of Derby, afterwards Henry IV. had married the two daughters and co-heirs of Bolingbroke, Earl of Hereford, one of the greatest of the ancient barons, whose immortal graces and virtues are to be divided into two shares. One was inherited by the family of Buckingham; the other was united to the crown by the house of Lancaster, and, after the attender of that royal lice, was seized, as legally devolved to them, by the sovereigns of the house of York. The Duke of Buckingham laid hold of the present opportunity, and claimed the restitution of that portion of the Hereford estate which had escheated to the crown, as well as of the great office of constable, which had long continued by inheritance in his ancestors of that family. Richard relented with these demands, which were probably the price stipulated to Buckingham for his assistance in promoting the usurpation. That nobleman was invested with the office of constable; he received a grant of great office and dignity; and the dignities and honours were conferred upon him; and the king thought himself sure of preserving the fidelity of a man whose interests seemed so closely connected with those of the present government. But it was impossible that friendship could long remain inviolate between two men of such corrupt minds as Richard and the Duke of Buckingham. Historians ascribe their first rupture to the king's refusal of making restitution of the Hereford estate; but it is certain, from records, that he passed a grant for that purpose, and that the full demands of Buckingham were satisfied in this particular. Perhaps Richard was soon sensible of the danger which might ensue from conferring such an immense property on a man of so turbulent a disposition, and afterwards raised difficulties about the execution of his own grant: perhaps he refrained some of Buckingham's outrages, so as to be found it impossible to gratify for his past services: perhaps he resolved, according to the usual maxims of politicians, to seize the first opportunity of ruining this powerful subject, who had been the principal instrument of his own elevation; and the dishonour of this refusal was the first discontent in the Duke of Buckingham. However this may be, it is certain that the duke, soon after Richard's accession, began to form a conspiracy against the government, and attempted to overthrow that usurpation which he himself had so zealously contributed to establish.

Never was there in any country an usurpation more flagrant than that of Richard, or more repugnant to every principle of justice and public interest. His claim was entirely founded on impudent allegations, never attempted to be proved, some of them incapable of proof, and all of them implying scandalous reflections on his own family; and on the persons with whom he was the most nearly connected. His title was never acknowledged by any national assembly, scarcely even by the lowest populace to whom he appealed; and it had become prevalent, that an assembly of distinct persons should stand forth against him, and give a voice to those sentiments of general detestation which arose in every bosom. They were men disposed to pardon these violations of public right, the sense of whose interest and property was not to be effaced in the most barbarous times, must have felt an abhorrence against him; and have represented the murder of the young and innocent princes, his nephews, with whose protection he had been intrusted, in the most odious colours imaginable. To endure such a bloody usurper seemed to draw disgrace upon the nation, and to be attended with immediate danger to every individual. Such was the general voice of the people; all parties were united in the same sentiments; and the Lancasterians, so long oppressed, and of late so much discontented, felt their blasted hopes again revive, and anxiously expected the consequences of these extraordinary events. Never was the Duke of Buckingham, whose family had been devoted to that interest, and who, by his mother, a daughter of Edmund, Duke of Somerset, was allied to the house of Lancaster, so easily induced to espouse the cause of that party, and to endeavour the restoring of it to its ancient superiority. Morton, Bishop of Ely, a zealous Lancasterian, whom the king had imprisoned, and had afterwards released, availed of the opportunity of these sentiments; and by his exhortations the duke cast his eye towards the young Earl of Richmond, as the only person who could free the nation from the tyranny of the present usurper.

The Earl of Richmond.

Henry, Earl of Richmond, was at this time detained in a kind of honourable custody by the Duke of Brittany; and his descent, which seemed to give him some pretensions to the crown, had been a great object of jealousies both in the late and in the present reign. Richard, Duke of York, grandson of John of Gaunt, by a spurious branch, but legitimated by act of parliament, had left only one daughter, Margaret; and his younger brother, Edmund, had succeeded him in his titles, and in a considerable part of his fortune. Margaret, the Duchess of York, and Edmund, the half-brother of Henry VI., and son of Sir Owen Tudor and Catherine of France, relict of Henry V., and she bore him only one son, who received the name of Henry, and who, after his father's death, inherited the house and fortune of Richmond. His mother, being a widow, had espoused in second marriage Sir Henry Stafford, uncle to Buckingham, and after the death of that gentleman had married Lord Stanley; but had no children by either of these husbands; and her son Henry was thus, in the event of her death, the sole heir of all her fortunes. But this was not the most considerable advantage which he had received to expect from her succession; he would represent the elder branch of the house of Somerset; he would inherit all the title of that family to the crown; and though his claim, while any legitimate branch subsisted of the house of Lancaster, had always been considered the real of fiction, after the death of Henry VI., and the murder of Prince Edward, immediately conferred a weight and consideration upon it.

Edward IV., finding that all the Lancastrians had turned themselves towards the young Earl of Richmond as the object of their hopes, thought him also worthy of his attention, and pursued him into his retreat at Brittany, where his uncle, the Earl of Pembroke, backed him with a small army; and Edward applied to Francis II., Duke of Brittany, who was himself, a weak but a good prince; and urged him to deliver up this fugitive, who might be the source of future disturbances in England; but the duke, averse to so dishonourable a proposal, would only consent that, for the security of Edward, the young nobleman should be detained in custody; and he received an annual pension from England for the safe keeping or the substance of his person. But towards the end of Edward's reign, when the kingdom was menaced with a war both from France and Scotland, the anxieties of the English court were so much increased, that he was required to make a new proposal to the duke, which covered, under the fairest appearances, the most bloody and treacherous intentions. He pretended that he was desirous of gaining his enemy, and of uniting him to his own family by a marriage with his daughter Elizabeth, and he solicited to have him sent over to England, in order to execute a scheme which would redound so much to his advantage. These pretences, seconded, as is supposed, by bribes to Peter Laudais, a corrupt minister, by whom the duke was entirely governed, gained credit with the court of Brittany. Henry was delivered into the hands of the English agents; he was ready to embark: when a suspicion of Edward's real designs was suggested to the duke, who recalled his orders, and thus saved the unhappy youth from the imminent danger which hung over him.

These symptoms of continued jealousy in the reigning families of England, both seemed to give some authority to Henry's pretensions, and made him the object of general favour and compassion, on account of the dangers and persecutions to which he was exposed. The desertion of his adherents during this very quarter still more excited the attention of the nation towards Henry; and in all the descendants of the house of York were either women or minors, he seemed to be the only person from whom the nation could expect the protection of the odious and bloody tyrant. But notwithstanding these circumstances, those who were so favourable to him, Buckingham and the Bishop of Ely well knew that there would still be many obstacles in his way to the throne; and that though the nation had been much divided between Henry VI. and the Duke of York, while present possession and hereditary right stood in opposition to each other; yet as soon as these titles were united in Edward IV., the bulk of the people had come over to the reigning family; and the Lancastrians had extremely decreased, both in numbers and in authority. It was then that Henry was suddenly created Duke of Richmond, and received a large estate from the crown. He found all the means to the contrary, that the only means of overturning the present usurpation was to unite the opposite factions, by contracting a marriage between the Earl of Richmond and the Princess Elizabeth, eldest daughter of King Edward, and thereby blinding together all the opposite pretensions of their families, which had so long been the source of public disorders and convulsions. They were sensible that the people were extremely desirous of repose, after so many bloody and destructive commotions; that both Yorkists and Lancastrians, who now lay equally under oppression, would embrace this scheme with ardour; and that the prospect of reconciling the two parties, which was in itself desirable an end, would, when added to the general hatred against the present government, render their cause absolutely invincible. In consequence of these views, the prelate, by means of Reginald Bray, steward to the Crown, and Richard Neville, Earl of Warwick, made such an union to that lady; and the plan appeared so advantageous for her son, and at the same time so likely to succeed, that it admitted not of the least hesitation. Dr. Lord, Bishop of Ely, came from his episcopal residence in the Queen'sIsle in her sanctuary, carried the proposals to her; and found that revenge for the murder of her brother and of her three sons, apprehensions for her surviving family, and indignation against her confinement, easily overcame all the objections against the marriage, and procured her appointment of a marriage, to which the age and birth, as well as the present situation, of the parties, seemed so naturally to invite them. She secretly borrowed a sum of money to defray the expenses of the marriage to the Earl of Richmond, required his oath to celebrate the marriage as soon as she should arrive in England, advised him to levy as many foreign forces as possible, and promised to join him on his return from France, with all the friends and partisans of her family.

The plan being thus laid upon the solid foundations of good sense and sound policy, it was secretly communicated to the principal persons of both parties in all the counties of England; and a wonderful alacrity appeared in every order of men to forward its success and completion. But it was impossible that so extensive a conspiracy could be conducted in so secret a manner with so little discovery. The jealousy which was in the eye of Richard; and he soon received intelligence that his enemies, headed by the Duke of Buckingham, were forming some design against his authority. He immediately put himself in a posture of defence, by levying a great army, and he as soon as he arrived to the Earl of Richmond, required the duke to appear at court, in such terms as seemed to promise him a renewal of their former amity. But that nobleman, well acquainted with the barbarity and treachery of Richard, replied only by taking arms in Wales, and giving the signal to his accomplices for a general insurrection in all parts of England. But at that very time there happened to fall such heavy rains, so incessant and continued, as exceeded any known in the memory of man; and the Severn, with the other rivers in that neighbourhood, swollen to a height which rendered them impassable, and prevented Buckingham's army marching further, he proposed to join his associates. The Welchmen, partly moved by superstition at this extraordinary event, partly distressed by famine in their camp, fell off from him; and Buckingham, finding himself deserted, took a wild and desperate course, and, with a band of his friends, went to the house of Banister, an old servant of his family. But being detected Buckingham in his retreat, he was brought to the king at

October, Salisbury; and was instantly executed, according to the summons which he had received to appear at Westminster, by the hands of the lawyers, and of every person whose life he had endangered in the course of those events. The whole army of the Lancastrians, consisting of three thousand men, who had taken arms in different places, at Exeter, at Salisbury, at Newbury, and at Maidstone, hearing of the Duke of Buckingham's misfortunes, despairs of success, and immediately dispersed themselves.

The Marquis of Dorset, and the Bishop of Ely, made their escape beyond sea: many others were equally fortunate: several fell into Richard's hands, of whom he made use: one example of many, which he is said to have compounded against Richard and his minsters. The Earl of Richmond, in concert with his friends, had set sail from St Malo's, carrying on board a body of 5000 men levied in foreign parts; but his fleet was driven back by a storm, and he landed at Plymouth, for which the Earl of Richmond was only there the coast of England till after the dispersion of all his friends; and he found himself obliged to return to the court of Brittany.

A.D. 1465.

The king, every where triumphant, and fortified by this unsuccessful attempt to achieve his purpose, ventured at last to summon a parliament; a measure which his crimes and flagrant usurpation had induced him hitherto to decline. Though it was natural that the parliament, in a contest of national parties, should not align itself more adhering to the victor, he seems to have apprehended it, lest his title, founded on no principle and supported by no party, might be rejected by that assembly. But his enemies found means to choose one of their number to represent them, and it was a subject chosen but to recognise his authority, and acknowledge his right to the crown. His only son, Edward, then a youth of twelve years of age, was created Prince of Wales: the Duke of York, with no delay, was sworn as the king for life; and Richard, in order to reconcile the nation to his government, passed some popular laws, particularly one against the late practice of extorting money on perjuries.

All the other measures of the king tended to the same object. Sensible, that the only circumstance which could give him security was to gain the confidence of the Yorkists by partaking in their sufferings, yet not to assume an address, made such earnest protestations of his sincere good-will and friendship, that this princess, tired of confinement, and despairing of any success from her former projects, ventured to leave her sanctuary, and to put herself and her daughters into the hands of the tyrant. But he soon carried further his views for the establishment of his throne. He had married Anne, the second daughter of the Earl of Warwick, and widow of Edward, Prince of Wales, and had with his authority, and by an act of parliament, driven his princess having born him but one son, who died about this time, he considered her as an invincible obstacle to the settlement of his fortune, and he was believed to have carried matters so far, that when the parliament met, he could not be supposed to have any solid proof, but which the usual tenour of his conduct made it reasonable to suspect. He now thought in his power to remove the chief perils which threatened his government. The Earl of Richmond, he knew, could never be formidable but from his projected marriage with the Princess Elizabeth, the true heir of the crown; and he therefore intended, by means of a papal dispensation, to expose himself this princess, and thus to unite, in his own family, their contending titles. The queen-dowager, eager to recover her lost authority, neither scrupled this alliance, which was very unusual in England, and was regarded as monstrous, nor did she shun the part that was taken against the marriage. The Earl of Richmond; an injury which the earl could never afterwards forgive; the court of Rome was applied to for a dispensation; Richard thought that he could easily dup him during the interval, till it arrived; and he had afterwards the agreeable prospect of a full and secure settlement. He flattered himself that the English nation, seeing all danger removed of a disputed succession, would then acquiesce under the dominion of a prince, who was of nature years, of great abilities, and of a genus qualified for government; and that they would forgive him all the crimes which he had committed, in plying his way to the throne.

But the crimes of Richard were so horrid and so shocking to humanity, that the natural sentiments of men, without any political or public views, were sufficient to render his government unstable; and every person of probity and honour was earnest to prevent the sceptre from being transferred to the gloomy and bloody-minded baron, who held it. All the exiles flocked to the Earl of Richmond in Brittany, and exhorted him to hasten his attempt for a new invasion, and to prevent the marriage with the Princess Elizabeth, which must prove fatal to all his hopes. The earl, sensible of the urgent necessity, but dreading the treachery of Peter Landais, who had entered into a negotiation with Richard for betraying him, was obliged to attend only to his present safety; and he made his escape to the court of France. The ministers of Charles VIII, who had now succeeded to the throne after the death of his father Lewis, gave him countenance and protection; and being desirous of raising disturbance to Richard, they secretly encouraged the earl in the enterprises which he made for the support of his enterprise upon England. The Earl of Oxford, whom Richard's suspicions had thrown into confinement, having made his escape, and joined Henry, and induced him to join the earl in his attempt, by the favourable accounts which he brought of the dispositions of the English nation, and their universal hatred of Richard's crimes and usurpation.

The Earl of Richmond set sail from Harlou in Normandy, with a small army of about 2000 men; and after a navigation of six days, he arrived at Milford-haven, in Wales, where he landed without opposition and conducted his course to that part of the kingdom, in hopes that the Welsh, who regarded him as their countryman, and who had been already prepossessed in favour of his cause by the information of his coming, would receive him as the standard, and enable him to make head against the established government. Richard, who knew not in what quarter he might expect the invader, had taken post at Nottingham, in the centre of the kingdom; and having given commissions to different persons in the several counties, whom he empowered to oppose his enemy, he purposed, in person, to fly on the first alarm to the place exposed to danger. Sir Richard Thomas and Sir Walter Herbert were intrusted with the command of the English forces in the north of England, and the Earl of Lancaster with the command of the forces in the south of England. Sir Gilbert Talbot was sent to the west of England; and Sir Ralph Hungerford and Sir Walter Hungerford brother, with his aid, to the south of England, no quarter was to be given to Richard. Sir Walter Hungerford brought their friends to share his fortunes; and the appearance of men of distinction in his camp made already his cause wear a favourable aspect.

But the danger to which Richard was chiefly exposed, proceeded not so much from the zeal of his open enemies, as from the misfortune of his pretended friends. Searce any nobleman of distinction was so securely attached to his cause, except the Duke of Norfolk; and all those who feigned the most loyalty were only watching for an opportunity to betray and desert him. But the persons whom he had entertained the time and honour of Lord Stanley, and his brother Sir William; whose connections with the family of Richmond, notwithstanding their professions of attachment to his person, were never entirely forgotten or overlooked by him. When he empowered Lords Ferrers and Shrewsbury to take care of the levvy forces, he still retained his eldest son, Lord Strange, as a pledge for his fidelity; and that nobleman was, on this account, obliged to employ great caution and reserve in his proceedings. He raised a powerful body of his friends and retainers in Cheshire and Lancashire, but without openly declaring himself; and though Henry had received secret assurances of his friendly intentions, the armies on both sides knew not what to infer from his equivocal behaviour. The two rivals at last approached each other at Bosworth near Leicester; Henry at the head of six thousand men, Richard with an army of above double the number: and a decisive action was every hour expected between them. Stanley, who commanded above seven thousand men, took care to post himself at Atherstone, not far from the hostile camps; and he made such a disposition as enabled him on occasion to join either party. Richard had too much sagacity not to discover his intentions from these movements; but he kept the secret from his own men for fear of discouraging them: he took not immediate revenge on Stanley's son, as some of his couriers advanced to him to hope that so valuable a pledge would induce the father to prolong still further his ambiguous conduct, and he hastened to decide by arms the quarrel with his competitor; being certain, that a victory over the Staffordites by, breaking in with his troops, would take ample revenge on all his enemies, open and concealed.

The van of Richmond's army, consisting of archers, was commanded by the Earl of Oxford: Sir Gilbert Talbot led the right wing: despicable enemies he left himself, accompanied by his uncle, the Earl of Pembroke, placed himself in the main body. Richard also took post in his main body, and intrusted the command of his van to the Duke of Norfolk: as his wings were never engaged, we have not learned the names of the several commanders. Soon after the battle began, Lord Stanley, whose conduct in this whole affair discovers great precaution and abilities, having not been in the field, desired for the Earl of Richmond. This measure, which was unexpected to the men, though not to their leaders, had a proportionable effect on both armies: it inspired unusual courage into Henry's soldiers: it threw Richard's into dismay and confusion. The utrepit tyrant, sensible of his desperate situation, cast his eyes around the field, and desiring his rival at no great distance, he drove against him with fury, in hopes that either Henry's death, or his own, would decide the victory between them. He killed with his own hands William Brandon, standard-bearer to the earl; he dismissed Sir John Cheshay; he was now within reach of Richmond himself, who declined not the combat; when St. John was cut off, most hopelessly, and himself surrounded Richard, who, fighting bravely to the last moment, was overwhelmed by numbers, and perished by a fate too mild and honourable for his multiplied and popular services. His men every where sought for safety by flight.

There fell in this battle about four thousand of the vanquished; and among these the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Pembroke, Sir Richard Talbot, Sir Richard Percy, and Sir Robert Brakenbury. The loss was considerable on the side of the victors. Sir William Catesby, a great instrument of Richard's crimes, was taken, and soon afterwards executed, with some others, near Leicester: all the body of Richard was found in the field covered with dead enemies, and all besmeared with blood: it was thrown carelessly across a horse; was carried to Leicester amidst the shouts of the insatiable spectators; and was interred in the Gray-Friars' church of that place.

The historians who favour Richard (for Richard III, even this tyrant has met with partisans among the writers), all agree, that he was well qualified for public government, had he legally obtained it; and that he committed no crimes but such as were necessary to procure him possession of the crown: but this is a poor apology, when it is confessed, that he was ready to commit the most horrid crimes, that he had a mind to that purpose, and it is certain, that all his courage and capacity, qualities in which he really seems not to have been deficient, would never have made compensation to the people for the danger that he incurred, and for the lamentable example of vice and murder, excited upon the throne. This prince was of a small stature, hump-backed, and had a harsh dis-

Thus have we pursued the history of England through a series of many barbarous ages, till we have at last reached the dawn of civility and science, and have the prospect both of ancient and modern nations illuminated to our mind by being able to present to the reader a spectacle most worthy of his attention. The want of certainty, however, and of circumstances, is not alike to be complained of throughout every period of this long narrative. This island possesses many ancient historians of good credit, as well as many historical monuments; and it is rare, that the annals of so uncultivated a people, as were the English, as well as the other European nations, after the decline of Rome, have reached us in those mutilated and imperfect, so complete, and with so little mixture of falsehood and of fable. This advantage we owe entirely to the clergy of the church of Rome; who, founding their authority on their own authority, hand down the sacred tradition of antiquity from a total extinction: and under shelter of their numerous privileges and immunities, acquired a security by means of the superstition, which they would never have dared to use, if they had been in a state of war with the people, of those turbulent and licentious ages. Nor is the spectacle altogether unentertaining and un instructive which the history of those times presents to us. The view of human nature, in all its manifold and numerous vicissitudes; of many actions which are connected with the possession of the English throne, as it is a sovereign antidote against superstition, is also the most effectual remedy against vice and disorders of every kind.

The rise, progress, perfection, and decline of art and science are curious objects of contemplation, and intimately connected with a narration of civil transactions. The events of no particular period can be fully accounted for, but by considering the degree of advancement which men have reached in those several art and science at every period. Those who cast their eye on the general revolutions of society will find, that, as almost all improvements of the human mind had reached nearly to their state of perfection about the age of Augustus, there was a sensible declination from that point or period; and men thenceforth relapsed gradually into ignorance and barbarism. The unlimited extent of the Roman empire, and the consequent despotism of its government, preserved the genius of the Romans in numerous spirits of men, and depressed that noble flame by which the all the refined arts must be cherished and enlarged. The military government which soon succeeded, rendered the people more subject to ignorance and precipitancy; and proved destructive to those vulgar and more necessary arts of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce; and in the end, to the military art and genius itself, by which alone the immense structure of the empire could be supported. The irruption of the barbarous nations which soon followed, overwhelmed all human knowledge, which was already far in its decline; and men sunk every age deeper into ignorance, stupidity, and superstition; till the light of ancient science never nearly suffered a total extinction in all the European nations.

But there is a point of depression, as well as of elevation, from which human affairs naturally return in a contrary direction, and beyond which they seldom pass either in their advancement or decline. The period in which the people of Christendom were the lowest sunk in ignorance, under the power of heathen despotism, and the most corrupt, was fixed at the eleventh century, about the age of William the Conqueror; and from that era, the sun of science be-giving to re-ascend, threw out many gleams of light, which preceded the full morning, when letters were revived in the fifteenth century. The Danes, and other northern people, who had so long infested all the coasts, and even the inland parts, of Europe by their piratical incursions, were now learned the arts of tillage and agriculture, found a certain subsistence at home, and were no longer tempted to desert their industry in order to seek precarious livelihoods, supplied by the plunder of their neighbours. The feudal governments also, among the more southern nations, were reduced to a kind of system; and though that strange species of civil polity was ill fitted to insure either liberty or tranquillity, it placed the universal peace and order which had every where preceded it. But perhaps there was no event which tended further to the improvement of the age, than one which has not been much remarked, the accidental finding of a copy of Justinian's Pandects, about the year 1150, in the town of Amalfi in Italy.

The ecclesiastics, who had leisure, and some inclination to study, immediately adopted with zeal this excellent system of jurisprudence, and spread the knowledge of it throughout every part of Europe. Besides the intrinsic merit of the performance, it was recommended to them by its original connexion with the imperial city of Rome, which had been the seat of perpetual attention, and enquiry into a new lustre and authority by the diffusion of its laws over the western world. In less than ten years after the discovery of the Pandects, Vlacarum, under the protection of Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, read public lectures of the learned studies of this kind, in every city and town wherever, by their example as well as exhortation, were the means of diffusing the highest esteem for this new science. That order of men, having large possessions to defend, was in a manner necessitated to turn their studies towards the law; and their properties being often endangered by the violence of the princes and barons, it became their interest to enforce the observance of general and local rules for the maintenance and protection. As they possessed all the knowledge of the age, and were alone acquainted with the habit of thinking, the practice as well as science of the law fell mostly into their hands; and though the close connexion which, without any necessity, they formed between the canon and civil law, begat a jealousy in the lady of England, and prevented the Roman jurisprudence from becoming the municipal law of the country, as was the case in many states of Europe, even the greatest part of it was seriously transferred into the practice of the courts of justice, and the imitation of their neighbours made the English gradually endeavour to raise their own law from its original state of rudeness and ignorance.

It is easy to see what advantages Europe must have reaped by its inheriting at once from the ancients so complete an art, which was also so necessary for giving security to all other arts, and which, by refining, and still more by bestowing solidity on the judgment, served as a model to further improvements. The sensible utility of the Roman law, both to public and private interest, recommended the study of it, at a time when the more excited and speculative sciences carried no charms with them; and thus the last branch of ancient literature which remained uncorrupted, was happily the first transmitted to the modern world: for it is remarkable, that in the decline of learning in the middle ages, this branch was least infected with superstition and sophistry, and the poets and historians with barbarism, the lawyers, who in other countries are seldom models of science or politeness, were yet able, by the choicest parts of their art, to maintain the standard and instruction of those whose predecessors, to maintain the same good sense in their decisions and reasonings, and the same purity in their language and expression.

By what bestows the highest merit on the civil law, was the extreme imperfection of that jurisprudence which preceded it among all the European nations, especially among the Saxons or ancient English. The absurdities which prevailed at that time in the administration of justice, may be conceived from the authentic monuments, which remained of the ancient Saxon laws; where a pecuniary compensation was the only method of punishment, and fines for every crime were fixed for men's lives and members, where private revenges were authorized for all injuries, where the use of the ordeal, cornet, and afterwards of the duel, was the received remedy, and where the judges were rustic freeholders, assembled of a sudden, and deciding a cause from one debate or alteration of the parties. Such a state of society was very little advanced beyond the rude incipient state of nature; for the general and equitable maxims: the pretended liberty of the times was only an incapacity of submitting to government: and men, not protected by law in their lives and properties, sought shelter by their personal servitude and attachments under some powerful chiefman, or by voluntary combinations.

The gradual progress of improvement raised the Europeans somewhat above this uncultivated state; and affairs in this island particularly, took early a turn which was more favourable to justice and to liberty. Civil employments and occupations soon became honourable among the English: the situation of that people rendered not the practice of perpetual attendance on their neighbours, and all regard was not confined to the military profession: the gentry, and even the nobility, began to deem an acquaintance with the law a necessary part of education; they were less diverted than afterwards from the pursuit of the liberal arts, and the professed literature of Henry VI., as we are told by Fortescue, there were in the inns of court about two thousand students, most of them men of honourable birth, who gave application to this branch of civil knowledge: a circumstance which proves that a considerable progress was already made in the science of government, and which prognosticated a still greater.

One chief advantage which resulted from the introduction and progress of the arts, was the practice, begun and increased in every part of the country, of using and improving the laws of ancient Greece and Rome; which was encouraged by the restoration of the barons, and other orders of the state, made their escape from those bonds of vassalage or slavery in which they had formerly been retained. It may appear strange, that the progress of the arts, which seems, according to our modern standard of taste and education, to have daily increased the number of slaves, should in later times have proved so general a source of liberty; but this difference in the events proceeded from a great difference in the circumstances which attended them. The ancient barons, obliged to maintain themselves continually in a military posture, and little emulous of elegance or splendour, employed not their vassals as domestic servants, much less as manufacturers; but composed their retinue of freemen, whose military spirit rendered the chieftain formidable to his neighbours, and who were ready to attend him in every warlike enterprise. The vassals were entirely occupied in the cultivation of their master's land, and paid their rents, either in corn and cattle, and other produce of the farm, or in service offices, which they performed for the benefit of the baron's family, and which he retained in his own possession. In proportion as agriculture improved, and money increased, it was found that these services, though extremely burdensome to the vassal, were in the advantage of the master; and it appears that the produce of a large estate could be much more conveniently disposed of by the peasants themselves who raised it, than by the landlord or his bailiff, who were formerly accustomed to receive it. A communation was, therefore, made of rents for services, and of money-rents for those in kind; and as men in a subsequent age discovered that farms were better cultivated, where the farmer enjoyed a security in his possession, the practice of granting leases to the peasant began to prevail, which entirely broke the bonds of servitude, already much relaxed by the former practices. After this manner villanage went gradually into disuse throughout the more civilized parts of Europe; and the mixture of servitude and freehold, as well as that of the slave, concurred in this alteration. The latest laws which we find in England, for enforcing or regulating this species of servitude, were enacted in the reign of Henry VII. and though the ancient state on this subject remain still unrepealed by parliament, it appears that, before the end of Elizabeth, the distinction of villain and freeman was totally, though insensibly, abolished, and that no person remained in the state to whom the former laws could be applied.

Thus personal freedom became almost general in Europe; an advantage which paved the way for the increase of political or civil liberty, and which, even where it was not so, gave in this salutary effect, deserved to give the members of the community some of the most considerable advantages of it.

The constitution of the English government, ever since the possession of this island by the Saxons, may boast of this pre-eminence, that in no age the will of the monarch was ever entirely absolute and uncontrollable: but in other respects the balance of power has extremely shifted among the several orders of the state; and this fabric has experienced the same mutability that has attended all human institutions.

The ancient Saxons, like the other German nations, where each individual was injur'd to arms, and where the independence was secured when the possessions, seem to have admitted a considerable mixture of democracy into their form of government, and to have been one of the first nations, of which there remains any account in the records of history. After this tribe was settled in England, especially after the dissolution of the Heptarchy, the great extent of the kingdom produced a great inequality in property; and the balance seems to have inclined to the side of aristocracy. The Norman conquest threw more authority into the hands of the sovereign, which, however, admitted of great control; though derived less from the general forms of the constitution, which were inaccurate and irregular, than from the independent power enjoyed by each baron in his particular district or province. The establishment of the great charter exalted still higher the aristocracy, imposed regular limits on royal power, and gradually introduced some mixture of democracy into the constitution. But even during this period, from the accession of Edward I. to the death of Richard III., the condition of the common man was nowise eligible; a kind of Polish aristocracy prevailed through the kingdom; and the people were as yet far from being free. It required the authority almost absolute of the sovereigns, which took place in the subsequent period, to pull down those disorderly and licentious maxims, who were usually as profligate of the laws, which, in a following age, enabled the people to erect a regular and equitable plan of liberty.

In each of these successive alterations, the only rule of government which is intelligible, or carries any authority with it, is the established practice of the age, and the maxims of administration, which are at that time prevalent and universally assented to. Those who, from a pretended respect to antiquity, appeal at every turn to an original plan of the constitution, only cover their turbulent spirit and their private ambition, under the appearance of venerable ornaments, and whatever period they patch on for their model, they may still be carried back to a more ancient period, where they will find the measures of power entirely different, and where every circumstance, by reason of the different age, and by circumstances, appear still less worthy of imitation. Above all, a civilized nation, like the English, who have happily established the most perfect and most accurate system of liberty that ever was found compatible with government, ought to be cautious in appealing to the practice of their ancestors, or regarding the maxims of unculculated ages, as certain rules for their present conduct. An acquaintance with the ancient periods of their government is chiefly useful, by instructing them to cherish their present constitution, from a comparison or contrast with the condition of those distant times. As it is also curious, by showing them the remote, and commonly faint and disfigured, originals of the most ancient constitutions of which they know, and by instructing them in the great mixture of accident, which commonly concurs with a small ingredient of wisdom and foresight, in erecting the complicated fabric of the most perfect government.

CHAP. XXIV.

HENRY VII.

The victory which the Earl of Richmond gained at Bosworth was entirely decisive; the king being as well attended as with the total rout and dispersion of the king's adherents, as with the defeat of the king himself. Joy for this great success suddenly promted the soldiers, in the field of battle, to bestow on their victorious general the appellation of king, which he had not hitherto assumed; and the acclamations of Long live Henry第七 Henry was at last a great equalized one, and his premiunmed movement, resounded from all quarters. To despise any appearance of formality on this species of military election, Sir William Stanley brought a crown of coronet which Richard wore in battle, and which had been found among the spoils; and he put it on the head of the victor. Henry himself remained not in suspense; but immediately without hesitation accepted of the magnificent present which was tendered him. He was come to the crisis of his fortune: and being obliged suddenly to determine himself, amidst great difficulties, which he must have frequently revolved in his mind, he chose that part which ambition suggested to him, and to which he seemed to be invited by his present success.

There were many titles on which Henry his title to the crown could be found; but no one of them free from great objections, if considered with respect either to justice or to policy.

During some years, Henry had been regarded as heir to the house of Lancaster by the party attached to that family; but the title of the house of Lancaster itself was generally thought to be very ill founded. Henry IV., who had first raised it to royal dignity, had never clearly defined the foundation of his claim; and while he plainly invaded the order of succession, he had not acknowledged the election of the prince. Without parliament, it is true, he had often recognised the title of the Lancasterian princes; but these votes had little authority, being considered as instances of compliance towards a family in possession of present power; and they had accordingly been often reversed during the late prevalence of the house of York. Prudent men also, who had been willing, for the sake of peace, to submit to the inevitable, had been induced to see the claims of that family revived; claims which must produce many convulsions at present, and which disjoined for the future the whole system of hereditary right. Besides, allowing the title of the house of Lancaster to be legally vacant, he was not the true heir of that family; and nothing but the obstinacy natural to faction, which never without reluctance will submit to an antagonist, could have engaged the Lancastrians to adopt the designs of so many elements that nothing could persuade. Margaret, Countess of Richmond, was sole daughter and heir of the Duke of Somerset, sprung from John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster: but the descent of the Somerset line was itself illegitimate, and even erroneous. And though the Duke of Lancaster had obtained the legitimation of his natural children by a patent from Richard II., confirmed in parliament, it might justly be doubted whether this deed could bestow any title to the crown; since, in the patent itself, all the privileges contained in it are fully enumerated, and the succession to the kingdom is expressly excluded. In all settlements of the crown made during the reign of the Lancasterian prince, he had been maintained in his title, and it was not till the failure of the legitimate branch, that men had paid any attention to their claim. And, to add to the general dissatisfaction against Henry's title, his mother, from whom he derived all his right, was still alive; thus strengthening the pretensions of a younger person. The title of the house of York, both from the plain reason of the case, and from the late popular government of Edward IV., had universally obtained the preference in the sentiments of the people; and Henry might ingraft his claim on the rights of that family, by his intended marriage with the Princess Elizabeth, the heir of it; a marriage which he had solemnly promised to celebrate, and to which he was already entitled by his own rights. But many reasons dissuaded Henry from adopting this expedient. Were he to receive the crown only in the right of his consort, his power, he knew, would be very limited; and he must expect nothing to enjoy the bare title of king by a sort of courtesy, than possess the real authority which belongs to it. Should the princess die before him, without issue, he must descend from the throne, and give place to the next in succession; and even if he succeeded her, and his title thus obtained did appear genorous to expect that final piety in his children would prevail over the ambition of obtaining present possession of regal power. An act of parliament, indeed, might easily be passed to discuss that point; and such a provision would serve to thwart any such wish as Henry's; but Henry knew how much superior the claim of succession by blood was to the authority of an assembly, which had always been overborne by violence in the shock of contending titles, and which had ever been more governed by the connivance of the times, than by any consideration derived from reason or public interest.

There was yet a third foundation on which Henry might rest his claim, the right of conquest, by his victory over Richard, the present possessor of the crown. But besides that Richard himself was deemed no better than an usurper, the army which fought against him consisted chiefly of Englishmen; and a right of conquest over Englishmen could not be constituted thereby a victory. Nothing also would give greater umbrage to the nation than a claim of this nature; which might be construed as an abolition of all their rights and privileges, and the establishment of absolute authority in the sovereign. William himself, the Norman, though at the head of a powerful and victorious army of foreigners, had at first declined the invincible title of conqueror; and it was not till the full establishment of his authority, that he ventured to advance such a pretension, and desire the magnificence of victory. But Henry was sensible that there remained another foundation of power somewhat resembling the right of conquest, namely, present possession; and that this title, guarded by vigour and abilities, would be sufficient to secure perpetual possession of the throne. He had before him the example of Henry IV., who, supported by no better pretension, had subdued many insurrections, as he had transmitted the crown to the next in succession, with his postern. He could perceive that this claim, which had been perverted through three generations of the family of Lancaster, might still have subsisted, notwithstanding the preferable title of the house of York; had not theexpedient devised by the hands of Henry VI., which were too feeble to sustain it. Instructed by this recent experience, Henry was determined to put himself in possession of regal authority; and to show all possible force of armament and necessity, the most of war, should be able to expel him. His claim as heir to the house of Lancaster he was resolved to advance, and never allowed to be discussed; and he hoped that this right, favoured by the partisans of that family, and seconded by present power, would secure him a perpetual and an independent authority.

These views of Henry are not exposed to much blame, because founded on good policy and on a species of necessity: but there entered into all his measures and counsels another motive, which admits not of the same apology. The violent contentions which, during so long a period, had prevailed between the rival families, and the bloody feuds and sanguinary revenges which they had alternately taken on each other, had inflamed the opposite factions to a high pitch of animosity. Henry himself, who had seen most of his near friends and relations become the objects of battle, or by the executioner, and who had been exposed himself, as a person, to many hardships and dangers, had imbued a violent antipathy to the York party, which no time or experience were ever able to efface. Instead of embracing the present happy opportunity of abolishing these fatal distinctions, of uniting his title with that of his consort, and of bestowing favour indiscriminately on the friends of both families; he carried to the throne all the partialities which belong to the use of a faction, and even the passions, which are carefully guarded against every true politician in that situation. To exalt the Lancasterian party, to depress the adherents of the house of York, were still the favourite objects of his pursuit; and, through the whole course of his reign, he never forgot these early prepossessions. Incapable, from his natural temper, of a more enlarged and more benevolent system of policy, he exposed himself to many present inconveniences, by too much constantly guarding against that future, possible event, which might disjoin his title from that of the princess whom he espoused. And, while he treated the Yorkists as enemies, he soon rendered them such, and taught them to regard the crown which he himself had obtained as kept separate; and to perceive its weakness and instability.

To these passions of Henry, as well as to his suspicious politics, we are to ascribe the measures which he embraced two days after the battle of Bosworth. Edward Plantagenet, Earl of Warwick, son of the Duke of Clarence, was detained in a kind of confinement at Sherif-lluton, in Yorkshire, by the jealousy of his uncle Richard; whose title to the throne was inferior to that of the young prince. Warwick had now reason to expect better treatment, as he was no obstacle to the succession either of Henry nor Elizabeth; and from a youth of such tender years no danger could reasonably be apprehended. But Sir Robert Willoughby was despatched by Henry, with orders to take him from Sherif-lluton, to convey him to the Tower, and to detain him in close custody. The same messenger carried directions that the Princess Elizabeth, who had been confined to the same place, should be conducted to London, in order to meet Henry, and there celebrate her nuptials.

Henry himself set out for the capital, and advanced by slow journeys. Not to lose the jealousy of the people, he took care to appear in all the magnificence of a prince, and so to restrain the insolence of victory, that every thing about him bore the appearance of an established monarch, making a peaceable progress through his dominions, rather than of a prince who had opened his way

HISTORY OF ENGLAND. [A. D. 1485—CHAP. XXIV.

His royal power to the throne by force of arms. The acclamation in London of the people was everywhere loud, and no less sincere and hearty. Besides, that a new and victorious prince, who was naturally the object of popularity; the nation promised themselves great felicity from the new scene which opened before them. During the course of near a whole century, there had been, by domestic wars and convulsions; and, if at any time the noise of arms had ceased, the sound of faction and discontent still threatened new disorders. Henry, by his marriage with Elizabeth, seems to have made a union of the titles of the two families; and having prevailed over a hated truant, who had once disjoined the succession, even of the house of York, and had filled his own family with blood and plunder, he was every way associated with the unfandoned favour of the people. Numerous and splendid troops of gentry and nobility accompanied his progress. The mayor and companies of London received him as he approached the city; the crowds of people and citizens were zealous in their expressions of satisfaction. But Henry, amidst this general effusion of joy, discovered still the stillness and reserve of his temper, which made him scorn to court popularity: he entered London with a crouch and scorn, and would not gratify the people with a sight of their new sovereign.

But the king did not so much neglect the favour of the people, as to delay giving them assurances of his ready mind to establish the principles of the late policy. He had already made a league with Elizabeth, by which he had been so passionately desired by the nation. On his leaving Brittany, he had artfully dropped some hints, that if he should succeed in his enterprises, and obtain the crown of England, he would espouse Anne, the heir of that duchy; and the report of this engagement had already reached England, and had begotten anxiety in the people, and even in Elizabeth herself. Henry took care to dissipate these apprehensions, by solemnizing the council and principal nobility, the promise which he had already given to celebrate his nuptials with the English princess. But, though bound by honour, as well as by interest, to carry out this engagement, he put it off till the ceremony of his own coronation should be finished, and till his title should be recognised by parliament. Still anxious to support his personal and hereditary right to the throne, he deemed it a preceding marriage with the princess should imply a participation of sovereignty in her, and raise doubts of his own title by the house of Lancaster.

Sweating sickness. In the meantime, in London, and other parts of the kingdom, a species of malaria, unknown to any other age or nation, the sweating sickness, which occasioned the sudden death of great numbers, did not seem to be contagious infection, but arose from the general disposition of the air and of the human body. In less than twenty-four hours the patient commonly died or recovered; what he possessed of fury for a few weeks, it was observed, either from alternations in the air, or from a more proper regimen which had been discovered, to be considerably abated. Preparations were then made for the ceremony of Henry's coronation. In order to heighten the splendour of that spectacle, he bestowed the rank of knightbanneret on twelve persons; and he conferred peerages on three. Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, his uncle, was created Duke of Bedford; Thomas, Lord Stanly, his father-in-law, Earl of Derby; and Edward Courteney, Earl of Devonshire. At the coronation, likewise, there appeared a new institution, which the king had established for security as well as pomp, a band of fifty archers, who were termed yeomen of the guard. But lest the people should take umbrage at this unusual symptom of jealousy in the prince, as if it implied a personal difference of his subjects to the instigation of Henry, the ceremony of coronation was performed by Cardinal Bourchier, Archbishop of Canterbury.

The parliament being assembled at Westminister, on the Monday following, the majesty of the prince immediately appeared to be devoted partisans of Henry; all persons of another disposition either declining to stand in those dangerous times, or being obliged to dissemble their principles and intentions. The nation's domestic tranquillity having been successful in the elections; and even many had been returned, who during the prevalence of the house of York had been exposed to the rigour of the law, and had been cruelly treated by domestic wars and convulsions. The right to take seats in the House being questioned, the case was referred to all the judges, who assembled in the exchequer chamber, in order to deliberate on so delicate a subject. The opinion delivered by the court, and contained in a just temperatment between law and expediency.

The judges determined, that the members attained should forever take their seats till an act were passed for their reversion; to which the demand was maintained; and in it were comprehended a hundred and seven persons of the king's party.

But a scruple was started of a nature still more important. The king himself had been attained; and his right of succession to the crown might thence be exposed to some doubt. The judges extricated themselves from this dangerous question, by asserting it as a maxim;

That, if the crown taken away, and another set up, the king might enjoy the revenues of his realm, and any person, or the king himself, might have the use of his lands, and the crown; but that from the time the king assumed royal authority, the fountain was cleared, and all attadators and corruption of blood discharged. Besides that the case, from its urgent necessity, admitted of no deliberation; the judges, as they knew to the king, and to the court of judicature, had authority sufficient to bar the right of succession; that the heir of the crown was commonly exposed to such jealousy, as might often occasion stretches of law and justice against him; and that a prison might even be engaged in unjustifiable measures during his predecessor's reign, without meeting on that account to be excluded from the throne, which was his birthright.

With a parliament so obstructed, and the king not fall of obtaining whatever act of settlement he was pleased to require. He seems only to have entertained some doubt within himself on what claim he should found his pretensions; but, as he had been made the king, he mentioned his just title by hereditary right; but lest that title should not be esteemed sufficient, he subjected his claim by the judgment of God, who had given him victory over his enemies. And mean, but that pretensions should be interpreted as assuming a right of conquest, he insured to his subjects the full enjoyment of their former properties and possessions.

The entail of the crown was drawn 30. Out of the king's court, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the Prince of Orange, in words dictated by him. He made no mention in it of the Princess Elizabeth, nor of any branch of her family. His courtiers and peers were subjected by law to a perpetual reserve and moderation. He did not insist that it should contain a declaration or recognition of his preceding right; nor on the other hand did he avoid the appearance of his own form. He chose a middle course, which, as it is generally unavoidable in such cases, was not entirely free from uncertainty and obscurity. It was voted, That the inheritance of the crown should rest, remain, and slide in the king, but whether as rightful heir, or only as present possessor, was not determined. In like manner, Henry was contented that the succession should be secured in the heirs of his body; but he pretended not, on any of these and all the incidents of it, to require that the house of York, or to give the preference to that of Lancaster; he left that great point ambiguous for the present, and trusted that, if it should ever become requisite to determine it, future incidents would open the way for the decision.

But even after all these precautions, the king was so little satisfied with his own title, that in the following year he applied to papal authority for a confirmation of it; and as the Pope of Rome gladly laid hold of all opportunities which the imprudence, weakness, or necessities of princes afforded it to extend its influence, Innocent VIII., the reigning Pope, readily granted a bull in whatever terms the king was pleased to desire. All Henry's titles, by succession, marriage, parliamentary choice, even conquest, are there enumerated; and to the whole the sanction of religion is added; excommunication is denounced against every one who should either disturb him in the present possession, or the heirs of his body in the future succession of the crown; and from this penalty no criminal, except in the account of death, could be absolved but by the Pope himself, or his special commissioners. It is difficult to imagine the security of crown. For from this ball could be a compensation for the defect which it betrayed in Henry's title, and for the danger of thus inviting the Pope to interpose in these concerns.

It was natural and even laudable in Henry to reverse the attainers which had passed against the partisans of the house of Lancaster: but the reverses which he exercised against the adherents of the York family, to which he was so soon to be allied, cannot be considered in the same light. Yet the parliament, at this instigation, passed an act of attainer against the late king himself, against the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Surrey, Viscount Lovel, the Lords Zouche, and Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Walter and Sir James Riversington, Sir William Berkley, Sir Humphrey Stafford, Catesby, and about twenty other gentlemen, who had fought on Richard's side in the battle of Bosworth. How men could be guilty of treason by supporting their natural and legal right, without the least suspicion of any criminal design in them, a prince, who, professing the true faith, and desiring nothing but the welfare of his kingdom, was as desirous to obviate every danger to the crown as was sensible of the satisfaction of the minds of his people in that particular. His marriage was celebrated at London, and that with greater appearance of universal joy, than either his father or his predecessor. In general, to find that the king, prompted either by avarice or resentment, could, in the very beginning of his reign, so far violate the cordial union which had previously been concerted between the parties, and to the expectation of which he had plunily owed his succession to the throne.

The king, having gained so many points of consequence from the parliament, thought it not expedient to demand any supply from that body. He withdrew, and probably enjoyed by the nation, and the late forfeiture of Richard's adherents, seemed to render somewhat superfluous. The parliament, however, conferred on him during the duty of tonnage and poundage, which had been enjoyed in the same manner by some of his immediate predecessors; and they added, before they broke up, other money bills of no great moment. The king, on his part, made returns of grace and favour to his people. He published his royal proclamation, offering pardon to all so far as had taken arms, or formed any attempts against him; provided they submitted themselves to mercy by a certain day; and if obnoxious to them, the king's grace and favour. Upon this proclamation many came out of their sanctuaries; and the minds of men were everywhere much quieted. Henry chose to take wholly to himself the merit of an act of grace, so agreeable to the nation; rather than communicate it with the parliament, (as was his first intention,) by passing a bill to that purpose. The Earl of Surrey, however, though he had submitted, and delivered himself into the king's hands, was sent prisoner to the Tower.

During this parliament, the king also bestowed favours and honours on some particular persons who were attached to him. Edward Stafford, eldest son of the Duke of Buckingham, although he was a natural child, and the prince, and peace enjoyed by the nation, and the late forfeiture of Richard's adherents, seemed to render somewhat superfluous. success, raised the siege of Worcester, and dispersed themselves. The Stafford took sanctuary in the church of Colham, a village near Abingdon; but as it was found, that this church had not the privilege of giving protection to rebels, they were taken thence: the elder was executed at Tyburn; the younger, pleading that he had been misled by his brother, obtained a pardon.6

5th Sept. By way of ransom for this service was followed, some time after, by the birth of a prince, to whom he gave the name of Arthur, in memory of the famous British king of that name, from whom it was pretended the family of Tudor derived its descent.

Disguised as a pilgrim in his true character, Richard's partisans, his government was become in general unpopular: the source of public discontent arose chiefly from his prejudices against the house of York, which was generally believed by the nation, and which for that very reason became every day more the object of his hatred and jealousy. Not only a preference on all occasions, it was observed, was given to the Lancastrians, but many of the opposite party had been exposed to great severity, and had been bereaved of their fortunes by acts of attainder. A general resumption likewise had passed of all grants made by the princes of the house of York; and though the rigour had been covered under the pretence that the revenue was become insufficient to support the dignity of the crown, and though the grants, during the latter years of Henry VI., were resumed by the same law, yet the York party were not reprieved, nor was the principal suspicion, thought it chiefly levelled against them. The severity exercised against the Earl of Warwick, begat compassion for youth and innocence exposed to such oppression; and his protection, in the person of the太子, Edward, whose children had been murdered by their uncle, made the public expect a like catastrophe for him, and led them to make a comparison between Henry and that despot of his day, and to imagine the queen herself met with harsh treatment, and even after the birth of a son was not admitted to the honour of a public coronation, Henry's prepossessions were then concluded to be inveterate, and men became equally dispose to their disgust to his government. Nor was the manner and address of the king calculated to eure those prejudices contracted against his administration: but had in every thing a tenderness to promote his, or at best reverence, rather than a good will and affection.8 While the high idea entertained of his policy and vigour, retained the nobility and men of character in obedience, the effects of his unpopular government soon appeared, by incidents of an extraordinary nature.

There lived in Oxford one Richard Simon, a priest, who possessed some subtility, and still more enterprise and temerity. This man had entertained the design of disturbing Henry's government by raising a pretender to the crown; and for that purpose he cast his eyes on Lambert Simnel, on Lamberti Simnel, a youth of fifteen years of age, who was son of a baker, and who, being endowed with understanding above his years, and address above his condition, seemed well fitted to personate a prince of royal extraction. A report had been spread among the people, and received with great credulity, that Richard, Duke of York, second son of Edward IV., had, by a secret escape, saved himself from the cruelty of his uncle, and by some concealment in England. Simon, taking advantage of this rumour, had at first instructed his pupil to assume that name, which he found to be so foolishly enjoyed in the public, but hearing afterwards a new report, that Warwick had made his escape from the Tower, and observing that this news was attended with no less general satisfaction, he changed the plan of his imposture, and made Simon personate that unfortunate prince.9 Though the youth was qualified by nature for the part which he was instructed to act, yet it was remarked, that he was better informed in circumstances relating to the royal family, which he had ascertained in the course of his education in the Lord of Warwick, than he could be supposed to have learned from one of Simon's condition; and it was thence conjectured, that persons of higher rank, partisans of the house of York, had laid the plan of this conspiracy, and had conveyed proper instructions to the actors. The queen-dowager herself was exposed to suspicion; and it was indeed the general opinion, however unlikely it might seem, that she had secretly given her consent to the imposture. The woman was of a very restless disposition. Finding that, instead of receiving as much reward at her services as she had hoped from Henry's elevation, she herself was fallen into absolute insignificance, her daughter treated with severity, and all her friends brought under suspicion, she had conceived the most violent animosity against him, and had resolved to make him feel the effects of her resentment. She knew, that the impostor, however successful, might easily at last be set aside; and if a way could be found at his risk to supplant the government, she hoped that a scheme might be opened which, though difficult at present, if once seen, would gratify her revenge, and be on the whole less irksome to her than that slavery and contempt to which she was now reduced.

But whatever care Simon might take to convey instruction to his pupil Simnel, he was sensible that the imposture would not bear a close inspection; and he was therefore determined to open the first public scene of it in Ireland. That nation was naturally hostile to York, and bore an affectionate regard to the memory of Clarence, Warwick's father, who had been their lieutenant, was impoverishly allowed by Henry to remain in the same condition in which he found it; and all the councilors and confidential friends of his successors, still retained their authority. No sooner did Simnel present himself to Thomas Fitzgerald, Earl of Kildare, the deputy, and claim his protection as the unfortunates of his house, chief among them, it was suspected so bold an imposture, gave occasion to him, and began to consult some persons of rank with regard to this extraordinary incident. These he found even more suspectable than to the designs of a traitor, and in proportion as the story diffused itself among those of lower condition, it became the object of still greater passion and credulity, till the people in Dublin, with one consent, tendered that allegiance to Simnel as to the true Plantagenet. Fond of a novelty, which flattered their national presumption, they overlooked the daughters of Edward IV., who stood before Warwick in the order of succession; they paid the pretended prince attendance according to their sovereign, lodged him in the castle of Dublin, crowned him with a diadem taken from a statue of the Virgin, and publicly proclaimed him king, by the appellation of Edward VI. The whole island followed the example of the capital; and not a sword was any where drawn in Henry's quarrel.

When this intelligence was conveyed to the king, it reduced him to some perplexity. Determined always to face his enemies, and to avoid a pretender to his crown; and for that purpose he cast his eyes on Lambert Simnel, a youth of fifteen years of age, who was son of a baker, and who, being endowed with understanding above his years, and address above his condition, seemed well fitted to personate a prince of royal extraction. A report had been spread among the people, and received with great credulity, that Richard, Duke of York, second son of Edward IV., had, by a secret escape, saved himself from the cruelty of his uncle, and by some concealment in England. Simon, taking advantage of this rumour, had at first instructed his pupil to assume that name, which he found to be so foolishly enjoyed in the public, but hearing afterwards a new report, that Warwick had made his escape from the Tower, and observing that this news was attended with no less general satisfaction, he changed the plan of his imposture, and made Simon personate that unfortunate prince.9 Though the youth was qualified by nature for the part which he was instructed to act, yet it was remarked, that he was better informed in circumstances relating to the royal family, which he had ascertained in the course of his education in the Lord of Warwick, than he could be supposed to have learned from one of Simon's condition; and it was thence conjectured, that der colour of an offence known to the whole world. They were afterwards the more confirmed in this suspicion, when they found that the unfortunate queen, though she made the most extravagant professions of sorrow, was, nevertheless, provided with any more lenity, but was allowed to end her life in poverty, solitude, and confinement.

The next measure of the king's was of a less exceptionable nature. He ordered that Wiltshire should be taken from the Tower, be led in procession through the streets of London, be conducted to St. Paul's, and there exposed to the view of the whole people. He even gave directions that some men of rank, attached to the house of York, and most acquainted with the person of this prince, should approach him and converse with him: and be trusted that these, being convinced of the absurd impos- ture of Simnel, would put a stop to the credulity of the populace. The expedition had its effect in England: but in Ireland the people still persisted in their revolt, and zealously retorted on the king the reproach of propagating an imposture, and of having shown a counterfeit Warwick to the public.

Henry had soon reason to apprehend, that the design against him was not laid on such slight foundations as the absurdity of the contrivance seemed to indicate. John, Earl of Lincoln, son of John de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, and late acquainted with the project of this prince, was anxious to take part in the conspiracy. This nobleman, who possessed capacity and courage, had entertained very aspiring views; and his ambition was encouraged by the known infirmity of the king. John could have formed a design, in case he himself should die without issue, of declaring Lincoln successor to the crown. The king's jealousy against all eminent persons of the York party, and his rigour towards Warwick, had further struck Lincoln with apprehensions, and made him resolve to seek for safety in the most dangerous counsels. Having fixed a secret correspondence with Sir Thomas Broughton, a man of great interest in Lancashire, he retired to Flanders, where Lovel had arrived on the same errand. During some time in the court of his aunt the Duchess of Burgundy, by whom he had been invited over.

Margaret, widow of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, not having any children by her own, attached herself with an entire friendship to her daughter-in-law, married to Maximilian, Archduke of Austria; and after the death of that princess, she persevered in her affection to Philip and Margaret, her children, and occupied herself in the care of their education and of their persons. By her virtuous conduct and demeanour she had acquired great authority among the Flemings; and lived with much dignity and respect as empress of the whole nation. The manner in which she inherited from her husband. The resentments of this princess were no less warm than her friendships; and that spirit of faction, which is so difficult for a social and sanguine temper to guard against, had taken strong pos- session of her heart, and interwoven somewhat on the probity which shone forth in the other parts of her character. Hearing of the malignant jealousy entertained by Henry against her family, and his oppression of all its pursuivants, she was moved with the highest indignation, and she determined to make him repent of that enmity to which so many of her friends, without any reason or neces- sity, had fallen victims. After consulting with Lincoln and Lovel, she hired a body of two thousand veteran Germans, under the command of Martin Sweert, a brave and experienced officer; and sent them over, together with these two noblemen, to join Sim- nel in Ireland. The counterpane given by her to persons of such high rank, and the accession of this military force, much raised the courage of the Irish, and made them entertain the resolu- tion of an enterprise, so passionately desired, as the spirit of disaffection as prevalent as it appeared to be in Ireland.

The poverty also under which they laboured, made it im- possible for them to support any longer their new court and army, and they proposed to remedy this state of things, by plundering and robbing in England.

Henry was not ignorant of these intentions of his en- emies; and he prepared himself for defence. He ordered troops to be levied in different parts of the kingdom, and put about them under the orders of the Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Oxford. He confined the Marquis of Dorset, who he suspected would resent the injuries suffered by his mother, the queen-dowager: and to gratify the people by his appearance. Of devotion, he made a pilgrimage to our lady of Walsingham, famous for not being visited, and offered up prayers for success, and for deliverance from his enemies.

Being informed that Simnel was landed at Foulney in Lancashire, he drew together his forces, and advanced towards the enemy as far as Coventry. The rebels had en- tertained hopes that the disaffected counties in the north would rise in their favour: but the people in general, asvete to join Irish and German invaders, convinced of Lambert's imposture, and kept in awe by the king's reputa- tion for success and conduct, either remained in tran- quillity, or gave assistance to the royal army. The Earl of Lincoln, therefore, who commanded the rebels, finding no hopes but in victory, was determined to bring the matter to a speedy decision; and the king, supported by the na- tive courage of his temper, and imbodied by a great accession of volunteers, who had joined him under the Earl of Shrewsbury and Lord Berkeley, was expedient to take part in the combat. The hostile armies met at Stoke in the county of Nottingham, and fought a Battle of Stoke, which was bloody, and more obstinately disputed than any that had been expected from the military force. All the leaders of the rebels were resolved to con- quer or to perish; and they inspired their troops with like resolution. The Germans also, being veteran and expe- rienced soldiers, kept the event as doubtful; and even the Irish, though ill-trained and almost defenceless, showed themselves not defective in spirit and bravery. The king's victory was purchased with loss, but was entirely decisive. Lincoln, Broughton, and Swart perished in the field of battle, with four thousand men of their army. The king was never more heard of, he believed to have under- gone the same fate. Simnel, with his tutor Simon, was taken prisoner. Simon, being a priest, was not tried at law, and was only committed to close custody; Simnel was too contemptible to be an object either of apprehen- sion or resentment to Henry. He was pardoned and made a scullion in the king's kitchen; whence he was afterwards advanced to the rank of a falconer.

Henry had now leisure to revenge himself on his ene- mies. He made a progress into the northern parts, where he gave many proofs of his rigorous disposition. A strict inquiry was made after those who had assisted or favoured the insurgents; and the king, not only of a man of the rank of the king made him re-venge subservient to his avance. Heavy fines were levied upon the delinquents. The pro- ceedings of the courts, and even the courts themselves, were arbitrary. Either the criminals were tried by com- missiitrs appointed for the purpose, or they suffered punishment by sentence of a court-martial. And, as a rumour had prevailed before the battle of Stoke, that the rebels had gained the victory, that the royal army was cut in pieces, and that the king himself had escaped by flight, Henry was resolved to interpret the belief or propagation of this report as a mark of disaffection; and lie punished many for that pretended crime. But such was the situation of the English government, that the time and prerogative, which was but imperfectly restrained during the most peaceable periods, was sure, in tumultuous or even suspicious times, which frequently recurred, to break all bounds of law, and to violate public liberty.

After the king had gratified his rigour by the punish- ment of his enemies, he determined to give contentment to the people in a point which, though a mere ceremony, was the inveterate desire of the English nation. He con- tinued near two years, but had not yet been crowned; and this inattention of delay had given great discontent to the public, and had been one principal source of the disaffec- tion which prevailed. The king, instructed by experience, now chose the ceremony the her coronation; and to show a disposition still more gracious, he restored to liberty the Marquis of Dorset, who had been able to clear himself of all the suspicions enter- tained against him.

The kingdom of Scotland had not yet attained that state which distinguishes a civilized monarchy, and which enables the government, by the force of its laws and institutions alone, without any extraordinary capacity in the sovereign, to maintain itself in order and tranquillity. James III. who now filled the throne, was a prince of little industry and of a narrow genus; and though it behoved him to yield the reins of government to his ministers, he had never been able to make any choice which could give contentment both to himself and to his people. When he bestowed his confidence on any of the principal nobility, he found that they exalted their own family to such a height as was dangerous to the prince, and gave him proofs of it whenever he conferred favour on anyone of meaner birth, on whose submission he could more depend, the barons of his kingdom, engrossed at the power of an upstart minister, proceeded to the utmost extremities against their sovereign. Had Henry entertained the ambition of conquests, a tempting opportunity now offered of reducing that kingdom to submission; but as he was probably sensible that a warlike people, though they might be overawed by reason of their domestic divisions, could not be retained in obedience without a regular military force, which was then unknown in England, he rather intended the renewal of the peace with Scotland, and sent an embassy to James for that purpose.

But the Scots, who never desired a durable peace with England, and who deemed their security to consist in constantly preserving themselves in a warlike posture, would not agree to more than a seven years' truce, which was accordingly concluded.

The European states on the continent were then hastening fast to the situation in which they have remained, without any material alteration, for near three centuries; and began to unite themselves into one extensive system of policy, which comprehended the chief powers of Christendom.

State of Spain. Spain, which had hitherto been almost entirely occupied within herself, now became formible by the union of Aragon and Castile in the persons of Ferdinand and Isabella, who, being princes of great capacity, employed their force in enterprises the most advantageous to their combined monarchy. The conquest of Granada from the Moors was the undertaking, and brought near to a happy conclusion. And in that expedition the military genius of Spain was revived; honour and security were attained; and her princes, no longer kept in awe by a domestic enemy so dangerous, began to enter into all the transactions of Europe, and made a great figure in every war and negotiation.

Of the Low Countries. Maximilian, King of the Romans, son of the Emperor Frederick, by his marriage with the heiress of Burgundy, acquired an interest in the Netherlands; and though the death of his consort had weakened his connections with that country, he still pre- tended to the government as tutor to his son Philip, and his authority had been acknowledged by Flanders, Holland, and several of the provinces. But as Flanders and Hainault still refused to submit to his regency, and even appointed other tutors to Philip, he had been engaged in long wars against that obstinate people; and was able to subdue their spirit. That he might free himself from the opposition of France, he had concluded a peace with Lewis XI. and had given his daughter Margaret, then an infant, in marriage to the dauphin; together with Artois, Franche Comté, and Chaulois, as her dowry. But this alliance had not produced the desired effect. The dauphin succeeded to the crown of France by the appellation of Charles VIII.; but Maximilian still found the mutations of the Flemings fomented by the intrigues of the court of France.

France, during the two preceding reigns, had made a mighty increase in power and greatness; and had not other states of Europe at the same time received an accession of force, it had been impossible to have retained her within her ancient boundaries. Most of the great seigniors, Normandy, Champagne, Anjou, Dauphiné, Guienne, Provence, and Burgundy, had been united to the crown of France by the marriages of their nobility, or by the birthright of the French princes, to which the prince had been raised to such a height as enabled him to maintain law and order; a considerable military force was kept on foot, and the French court was able to undertake all the expeditions which their king could undertake, the generosity of which, combined with their valor, enabled them to perform any service which the monarch could undertake, and to bear the expenses of it. The French power suffered no check or decline. On the contrary, this prince formed the great project, which at last he happily effected, of uniting to the crown of France the last and most independent fee of the monarchy.

Francis H. Duke of Brittany, conscious of his own incapacity for government, had resigned himself to the direction of Peter Landais, a man of mean birth, more remarkable for abilities than for virtue or integrity. The nobles of Brittany, dispensed with the great advancement of this favourite, had even proceeded to dissatisfaction against their sovereign; and after many tumults and disorders, they at last united among themselves, and in a violent manner seized, tried, and put to death the obnoxious minister. Dreading the resentment of the prince for this invasion of his authority, many of them retired to France; others, for protection of their property, maintained their allegiance to the French monarchy, who, observing the great dissensions among the Bretons, thought the opportunity favourable for invading the duchy; and so much the rather, as they could cover their ambition under the specious pretence of providing for domestic security.

Lewis, Duke of Orleans, first prince of the blood, and presumpptive heir of the monarchy, had disputed the administration with the lady of Beaufort; and though his pretensions had been rejected by the states, he still maintained cahals with many of the grands, and had schemes for subverting the authority of that prince. Finding his correspondence detected, he took to arms, and fortified himself in Beaufort; but as his revolt was precipitate, before his confederates were ready to join him, he had been obliged to submit, and to receive such conditions as the French monarchy were pleased to impose upon him. Ac- tuated, however, by his ambition, and even by his fears, he soon retired out of France, and took shelter with the Duke of Brittany, who was desirous of strengthening himself against the designs of the lady of Beaufort, by the friendship of the Duke of Orleans. This latter prince also, perceiving the ascendancy which he soon acquired over the Duke of Brittany, had engaged many of his partisans to join him at that court, and had formed the design of gaining thereby a name of power by a marriage with Anne, the heir of that opulent duchy.
The barons of Brittany, who saw all favour engrossed by the Duke of Orleans and his train, renewed a stricter correspondence with France, and even invited the French king to make an invasion on their country. Desirous, however, of preserving its independence, they had regulated the number of succours which France was to send them, and had stipulated, that no fortified place in Brittany should remain in the possession of that monarchy; a condition which, and that as both the aggressor and the aggressed, France found superior power so much superior! The French inofanna, vaded Brittany with forces three times more numerous than those which they had promised to the barons; and advancing into the heart of the country, laid siege to Ploemel. To oppose them, the duke raised a numerous but ill-disciplined army, which he put under the command of the Duke of Orleans, the Count of Dunons, and others of the French nobility. The army, discontented with this choice, and jealous of their confederates, soon disbanded, and left their prince with too small a force to keep the field against his invaders. He retired to Vannes; but being both pursued by the French, who had now magnified themselves masters of Ploemel, he escaped to Nant; and the enemy, having previously taken and garrisoned Vannes, Dinant, and other places, laid close siege to that city. The barons of Brittany, finding their condition of their own accord, and the multiplying difficulties of their project of reducing Brittany to subjection. The situation of Europe appeared favourable to the execution of this design. Maximilian was indeed engaged in close alliance with the Duke of Brittany, and had even opened a treaty for marrying his daughter; but he was on all occasions so indigent, and at that time so disquieted by the mutu-ties of the Flemings, that little effectual assistance could be expected from him. Ferdinand was entirely occupied in the conquest of Granada; and it was also known, that if France would resign to him Roussillon and Cerdagne, to which he had pretensions, she could at any time engage him to abandon the interests of Brittany. England alone was both enabled by her power, and engaged by her interests, to support the independency of that duchy; and the most dangerous opposition was therefore, by Anne of Beaujeu, expected from that quarter. In order to cover her, Maximilian, by the conclusion of the treaty of peace, and the restoration of the Templars, had received by the French court the undertaking to supply him with a sufficient number of French soldiers. Henry, on his late victory, and communicating to him, in the most cordial manner, as to an intimate friend, some successes of their master against Maximilian, came in commendation of their designs, and desirous to mention the late transactions in Brittany. They told him, that the duke having given protection to French fugitives and rebels, the king had been necessitated, contrary to his intention and inclination, to carry war into that duchy; that the honour of the crown was interested not to suffer a vassal so far to forget his duty to his liege lord; nor was the security of the government less concerned to prevent the consequences of this dangerous temerity: that the fury of that duty, if not successful, or obscure persons, had among others, the Duke of Orleans, first prince of the blood, who, finding himself obnoxious to justice for treasonable practices in France, had fled into Brittany; where he attempted to allure of the people to his project against his sovereign: that the war being thus, on the part of the French monarch, entirely defensive, it would immediately cease, when the Duke of Brittany, by returning to his duty, and laying his design to the ground, would their master was sensible of the obligations which the duke, in very critical times, had conferred on Henry; but it was known also, that in times still more critical, or his master's peril, the barons had deserted him, and put his life at the utmost hazard: that his tale told the Duke not only protected his person, but supplied him with men and money, with which, aided by his own valour and conduct, he had been enabled to mount the throne of England; that France in this transaction, ship to Henry, acted contrary to what, in a narrow view, might he esteemed her own interest; since, instead of an odious tyrant, she had contributed to establish on a rival throne a prince endowed with such virtue and abilities: and that if the cause of the contest, the selfish principle, of the French nation, power so much superior! The French inofanna, vaded Brittany with forces three times more numerous than those which they had promised to the barons; and advancing into the heart of the country, laid siege to Ploemel. To oppose them, the duke raised a numerous but ill-disciplined army, which he put under the command of the Duke of Orleans, the Count of Dunons, and others of the French nobility. The army, discon-

turning to his duty, and laying his design to the ground, would their master was sensible of the obligations which the duke, in very critical times, had conferred on Henry; but it was known also, that in times still more critical, or his master's peril, the barons had deserted him, and put his life at the utmost hazard: that his tale told the Duke acted the part of protector and guardian to Henry during his youth and adverse fortune. He had expected from a monarch of such virtue, more effectual assistance in his present distresses, than a barren offer of mediation, which suspended not the progress of the French arms: that if Henry's gratitude were not sufficient to engage him in such a measure, his prudence, as King of England, should determine for himself the perils he perceived. The consequences attaching to the conquest of Brittany, and its annexation to the crown of France; that that kingdom, already too powerful, would be enabled, by so great an accession of force, to display, to the world, that visible disunion which had always subsisted between those rival nations: that Brittany, so useful so ally, which, by its situation, gave the English an entrance into the heart of France, being annexed to that kingdom, would be equally enabled, from its situation, to disturb, either by sea or land, the commerce and peace of England; and that if the duke rejected Henry's mediation, it proceeded neither from an inclination to a war which he experienced to be ruinous to him, nor from a confidence in his own force, which he knew to be much inferior to that of the enemy; but, on the contrary, from a sense of his present necessities, which must engage the king to act the part of his confederate, not the enemy.

When this answer was reported to the king, he abandoned not the plan which he had formed: he only concluded, that some time more was requisite to quell the obstinate dispositions, and make the French understand. And when he learned that the people of Brittany, anxious for their duke's safety, had formed a tumultuary army of 60,000 men, and had obliged the French to raise the siege of Nantes, he fortified himself the more in his opinion that the court of England would at last yield to the combined obstacles and difficulties, to abandon the project of reducing Brittany to subjectation. He continued, therefore, his scheme of negotiation, and thereby exposed himself to be deceived by the artifices of the French minister, who, still pretending pacific intentions, sent Lord Bernard, Daugnay, a Scotchman of quality, to London, and pressed Henry not to be discouraged in offering his mediation to the court of England. The king, on his part, despatched another embassy, consisting of Urswe, the Abbot of Almogrand, and Sir Richard Tunstal, who carried new proposals for an amicable treaty. No effectual succours, meanwhile, were provided for the distressed Bretons. Lord Woodville, brother to the queen-dowager, having asked leave to raise underhand a body of volunteers, and to transport them into Brittany, met with a refusal from the king, who was desirous of preserving the appearance of neutrality. Though solicitation therefore was not seduced in his purpose. He went over to the Isle of Wight, of which he was governor; levied a body of 400 men; and having at last obtained, as is supposed, the secret permission of the king, sailed with them into Brittany. This enterprise proved fatal to the leader, and brought small relief to the unhappy duke. The Bretons rashly engaged in a general action with the French at St. Aubin, and were discomfited. Woodville, and all the English were put to the sword; together with a body of Britons, who had been acctuated in the garb of Englishmen, in order to strike a greater terror into the French, to whom the marshal of that nation, was always formidable. The Duke of Orleans, the Prince of Orange, and many other persons of rank, were taken prisoners; and the military force of Brittany was totally broken. The death of the duke, which followed soon after, threw affairs into still greater confusion, and threatened to set the state with a final subjection.

Though the king did not prepare against these events, so hurtful to the interests of England, with the present vigour and promptness, he had not altogether overlooked them. Determined to maintain a pacific conduct, so far as the situation of affairs would permit, he yet knew the warlike temper of his subjects, and the recent history of the art of war, and France was now revived by the prospect of this great accession to her power and grandeur. He resolved, therefore, to make advantage of this disposition, and draw some supplies from the people, on presence of giving assistance to the Duke of Brittany. He had summoned a parliament at Westminster; and he soon persuaded them to grant him a considerable subsidy. But this supply, though voted by parliament, involved the king in unexpected difficulties. The county of Durham and York, always discontented with Henry's government, and further provoked by the late oppressions under which they had laboured, after the suppression of Simnel's rebellion, determined the commissioners with whom they were appointed to levy the tax. The commissioners, terrified with this appearance of sedition, made application to the Earl of Northumberland, and desired of him advice and assistance in the execution of their office. That nobleman thought the matter of importance enough to consult the king; who, unwilling to yield to the humour of a discontented populace, and foreseeing the pernicious consequence of such a precedent, renewed his orders for strictly levying the impositions. Northumberland summoned together the justices and chief freeholders, and delivered the king's commands in the most imperious terms, which, he thought, would enforce obedience, but which, it proved, only served to provoke the people, who believed him the adviser of those orders which he delivered to them. They flew to arms, attacked Northumberland in his house, and put him to death. Having incurred such a breach of peace, he was compelled to declare against the king himself; and being instigated by John Aclander, a sedulous fellow of low birth, they chose Sir John Euremond their leader, and prepared themselves for a vigorous resistance. Henry was not dismayed with all this exercise of force; and, by the immediate levies a force, which he put under the command of the Earl of Surrey, by which he had freed from confinement and received into favour. His intention was to send a fleet from the French ministry, which he did, and thereby fill his coffers with the money levied by the imposition. But as the distresses of the Bretons still multiplied, and became every day more urgent; he found himself under the necessity of taking more vigorous measures, in order to support them. On the death of the duke, the French had revived some ardent claims to the dominion of the duchy; and as the Duke of Orleans was now captive in France, their former A.D. 1169. presence for hostilities could not longer serve as a cover to their ambition. The king resolved, therefore, to engage as auxiliary to Brittany; and to consult the interest of his people, as well as desire his progress to the progress of the French project. Persons entering into a league with Maximilian, and another with Ferdinando, which were distant resources, he levied a body of troops to the number of 6000 men, with an intention of transporting them into Brittany. Still anxious, however, for the repayment of his expenses, he concluded a treaty with the young duchess, by which she engaged to deliver into his hands two sea-port towns, there to remain till she had entirely reduced the alternating armament. Though he engaged for the service of these troops during the space of ten months only, yet was the duchess obliged, by the necessity of her affairs, to submit to such rigid terms, as were imposed on her so much concerned in interest to accept them. The fleet was armed under
It was necessary that this expedient, which had not been foreseen by any court in Europe, and which they were all so much interested to oppose, should be kept a profound secret, and should not be discovered by the forces of any nation, to which the full execution of it. The measures of the French ministry, in the conduct of this delicate enterprise, were wise and political. While they pressed Brittany with all the resources of war, they secretly prepared the means of discovering this project by the most peaceful means, and of bringing it to light in a manner that should be least prejudicial to the interests of France. The execution of this plan, which had been formed by one who was sure to be traversed by another. The English, unprepared for any enterprise by these unexpected and uncertain counsels, returned home as soon as they had surmounted the difficulties of the sea; leaving only a small garrison in those towns which had been consigned into their hands. During their stay in Brittany, they had only contributed still further to waste the country; and by their departure, they left it entirely at the mercy of the enemy. So feeble was the succour which Henry, in this important conjuncture, afforded his ally, whom the invasion of a foreign enemy, concurring with domestic dissensions, had reduced to the utmost despair. The Chancellor of this country, whose design, so far as the disposal of the young duchess in marriage. The Mareschal Rieux, favoured by Henry, seconded the suit of the Lord d'Albret, who led some forces to his assistance. The Chancellor recommended to them the injustice of this measure, that there was no pretence of marriage to the duchess's surplus, insisted that a petty prince, such as d'Albret, was unable to support Anne in her present extremity; and he recommended some more powerful alliance, particularly that of Maximilian, King of the Romans. This party at last prevailed; the marriage with Maximilian was celebrated by proxy; and the duchess thenceforth assumed the title of Queen of the Romans. But this magnificent appellation, which had been the object of so many dispositions, and the marriage of Maximilian, who, though too young for the consummation of his marriage, had been sent to Paris to be educated, and at this time bore the title of Queen of France. Besides the rich dowry which he had obtained by the marriage of his eldest daughter, Philip, then in early youth, heir to all the dominions of the house of Burgundy; and seemed, in many respects, the most proper match that could be chosen for the young monarch. He was also the chief of a mighty family, both Maximilian and Henry, that they never suspected any other intentions in the French court; nor were they able to discover, that engagements, seemingly so advantageous, and so solemnly entered into, could be infringed and set aside. But Charles began to perceive that the conquest of Brittany, in opposition to the nations, and to all the great powers of Christendom, would prove a difficult enterprise; and that, even if he should overrun the country, and possess a considerable fortress, it would be impossible for him long to retain possession of them. The marriage alone of the duchess could fully aannex that fief to the crown; and the present and certain enjoyment of it was considerable. A territory seemed preferable to the prospect of inheriting the dominions of the house of Burgundy; a prospect which became every day more distant and precarious. Above all, the marriage of Maximilian and Anne appeared destructive to the grandeur, and even security, of the French monarchy. The consequences of this marriage threatened the crown of France, and the whole empire, preserved to the French crown. The possession of Flanders on the one hand, and Brittany on the other, might thus, from both quarters, make invades into the heart of the country. The only remedy for these evils was therefore the dissolution of the two marriages, which had been celebrated, but not consummated; and the espousal of the Duchess of Brittany by the King of France.
he could not precisely foresee, his negligence in leaving his most useful ally so long exposed to the invasion of superior power, could not but appear, on reflection, the result of timid caution and narrow politics. As he valued himself on his extensive foresight and profound judgment, the ascendant acquired over him by a raw youth, such as Charles, could not but give him the highest displeasure, and if he pointed out to him the present danger, he charged his miscarriage was become absolutely impracticable. But he was further actuated by avarice, a motive still more predominant with him than either pride or revenge; and he sought, even against that presentiment, the gratification of this ruling passion. On presence of a French war, he issued a commission for levying a Benevolence on his people; 1 a species of taxation which had been abolished by a recent law of Richard II. This violence (for such it really was) fell chiefly on the commercial part of the nation, who were possessed of the ready money. London alone contributed to the amount of near 10,000 pounds. Archbishop Morton, the chancellor, instructed the commissioners to employ a dilemma, in which every one might be comprehended; if the persons applied to lived frugally, they were told that their parsimony must necessarily have enriched them; if their method of living were splendid and hospitable, they were concluded to be opulent on account of their expenses. This device was, by some, called Chancellor Morton's fork, by others his crutch.

The person who was the king of a parliament, on account of his levying this arbitrary impost, that he soon after summoned that assembly to meet at Westminster; and he even expected to enrich himself further by working on their passions and prejudices. It was known that the English had conceived against France, on account of the acquisition of Brittany; and he took care to insist on that topic, in the speech which he himself pronounced to the parliament. He told them, with her late successes, bad even proceeded to a contempt of England, and had refused to pay the tribute which Lewis XI. had stipulated to Edward IV. That it had been known to the English he had conceived against France, on account of the acquisition of Brittany; and he took care to insist on that topic, in the speech which he himself pronounced to the parliament. He told them, before the audience, that they was to be roused by this indignity, and not to limit their pretensions merely to repelling the present injury: that, for his part, he was determined to lay claim to the crown itself of France, and to maintain, by force of arms, so vast a title, transmitted to him by his gallant ancestor. That Crecy, Pocetiers, and Amicour, were sufficient to instruct them in their supremacy over the enemy; nor did he despair of any further success that might attend this glorious catalogue: that a king of France had been heretofore in such possession, and a king of England had been crowned at Paris; events which should animate them to an emulation of like glory with that which had been enjoyed by their forefathers: that the domestic despondency of France had been the sole cause of her losing these foreign dominions; and her present internal union would be the effectual means of recovering them: that, where such lasting honour was in view, and such an important acquisition, it became not brave men to recede, rather than diminish, the riches of the nation.

Notwithstanding these magnificent vaunts of the king, all men of penetration concluded, from the personal character of the man, and still more from the situation of affairs, that he had no serious intention of pushing the war to such extremities as he pretended. France was not now in the same condition as when such successful inroads had been made upon her by former kings of England.

The great fields were united to the crown; the princes of the blood were devoted to tranquility, and the nation supported with able captains and veteran soldiers; and the general aspect of her affairs seemed rather to threaten her neighbours, than to promise them any considerable advantages against such a magnitude and variety of enemies. As he pretended to be supported by his pompous titles; but were ill seconded by military power, and still less by any revenue proportioned to them. The politic Ferdinand, while he made a show of war, was actually negociating for peace; and, rather than expose himself to the hazard, would accept of very moderate concessions from France. Even England was not free from domestic discontent; and in Scotland, the death of Henry's friend and ally, James III., who had been murdered by his rebellious subjects, had made war more than ever necessary for his interests. Scotland, which was devoted to the French interest, and would surely be alarmed at any important progress of the English arms. But all these obvious considerations had no influence on the present proceedings. French aid was so long claimed as a matter of course, and of enriching themselves by the spoils of that kingdom, they gave in to the snare prepared for them, and voted the supply which the king demanded. Two fifteenths were granted them; and the better to enable his vassals and nobility to attend him, an act was passed, empowering them to sell their estates, without paying any fines for alienation.

The nobility were universally seized with a desire of military glory; and having credulously swallowed all the boas of the king, they dreamed of no less than carrying their triumphant banners to the gates of Paris, and putting the crown of France on the head of the emperor. Almost three thousand arms, or sold off manors, that they might appear in the field with greater splendour, and lead out their followers in more complete order. The king crossed the Channel on the 6th of Oct., with an army of twenty-five thousand foot, and sixteen hundred horse, which he put under the command of the Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Oxford; but as some inferred, from his opening the campaign in so late a season, that peace would soon be concluded between the crowns, he was desirous of suggesting a contrary inference. He had come over, he said, to make entire conquest of France, which was not the work of one summer. It was therefore of no consequence what season he began the invasion; especially as he had Calais ready for winter quarters. As if he had seriously intended this enterprise, he instantly marched into the enemy's country, and laid siege to Bullington; but not withstanding this appearance of hostilities, there had been secret advances made towards peace above three months before; and commissioners had been appointed to treat of the terms. The better to reconcile the minds of men to this unexpected measure, the king's ambassadors arrived in the camp from the Low Countries and informed him that Maximilian was in no readiness to join him; nor was an army to be expected from Spain, which was in no readiness. Soon after, messengers came from Spain, and brought news of a peace concluded between that kingdom and France, in which Charles had made a cession of the counties of Boussil and Cerdagne to Ferdinand. Though these articles of intelligence were carefully dispersed throughout the army, the king was still apprehensive lest a sudden peace, after such magnificent promises and high expectations, might expose him to reproach. In order the more effectually to cover the intended measures, he secretly engaged the Marquis of Dorset, together with twenty-three persons of distinction, to present him a petition for agreeing to a treaty with France. The pretence was founded on the late reason of the year, the difficulties of supplying the army at Calais during winter, the obstacles which arose in the siege of Bullington, the desertion of those allies whose assistance had been most relied on; events which might, as well, have been foreseen before the embarkation of the forces.

In consequence of these preparatory steps, the Bishop of Exeter and Lord Daubeney were sent to confer at Estaples with the Mareschal de Cordes, and to put the last hand to the treaty. After many days of deliberation, the demands of Henry were wholly pecu- niary; and the King of France, who deemed Peace with France with the peaceable possession of Brittany an equa- livalent to the loss of Maximilian's, was readily agreed to the proposals made him. He engaged to pay Henry 745,000 crowns, near 400,000 pounds sterling of our present money; partly as a reimbursement of the sums advanced to Henry, partly as arrears of the pension due to Edward IV. And he stipulated a yearly pension to Henry and his sons of 25,000 crowns. Thus the king, as remarked by his historians, made profit upon his subjects for the war; and upon his enemies for the peace. And the people agreed that he had fulfilled his promises, which were said to the parliament that he would make the war maintain itself. Maximilian was, if he pleased, comprehended in Henry's treaty; but he disdained to be in any respect beholden to an ally of whom he thought he had reason to complain: he made a separate peace with France, and obtained restitution of Artois, Franche Comté, and Charolais, which had been ceded as the dowry of his daughter when she was allied to the King of France.

The peace concluded between England and France was the more likely to continue, because Charles, full of ambition and youthful hopes, bent all his attention to the side of Italy, and soon after undertook the conquest of Naples; an enterprise which Henry regarded with the greatest indifference; as Naples lay remote from him, and France had never in any age been successful in that quarter. The king's authority was fully established at home; and every resource by which he had hitherto tended only to confound his enemies, and consolidate his power and influence. His reputation for policy and conduct was daily augmenting; his treasures had increased even from the most unfavourable events; the army was in a perfect state of order; and he had been so well by his marriage, as by the issue which it had brought him. In this prosperous situation, the king had reason to flatter himself with the prospect of durable peace and tranquillity; but his enemies, and indistinct enemies, whom he had wantonly provoked, raised him an adversary, who long kept him in inquietude, and sometimes even brought him into danger.

The cause of his full of resentment for the depression of his family and its partisans, rather irritated than discouraged by the ill success of her past enterprises, was determined at least to disturb that government which she found so difficult to subvert. By means of her emissaries she propagated a report that her nephew, Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, had escaped from the Tower when his elder brother was murdered, and that he still lay somewhere concealed: and finding this rumour, however improbable, to be greedily received by the people, she had been looking out for some young man proper to personate that unfortunate prince.

Perkin Warbeck. There was one Osbey, or Warbeck, a renowned man, of whatever name he was born, who was connected by some business to London in the reign of Edward IV. and had there a son born to him. Having had opportunities of being known to the king, and obtaining his favour, he prevailed with that prince, whose manners were very affable, to stand godfather to his son, to whom he gave the name of Peter, corrupted, after the Flemish manner, into Perkin, or Perkin. It was by some believed, that Edward, among his amorous adventures, had a secret connexions with Warbeck's wife; and people thence accounted for that resemblance which was afterwards marked between young Perkin and that monarch. Some years after the birth of this child, Warbeck returned to Touraine, where the king's son, did not long continue but by different accidents was carried from place to place, and his birth and fortunes became thereby unknown, and difficult to be traced by the most diligent inquiry. The variation of his name, his resemblance to the king, his versatility and sagacity of his genius; and he seemed to be a youth perfectly fitted to act any part, or assume any character. In this light he had been represented to the Duchess of Burgundy, who, struck with the concomitance of the two events, and with the supposed design of this prince to be made acquainted with the man on whom she already began to ground her hopes of success. She found him to exceed her most sanguine expectation; so that she was, for a time, so graceful in his air, so courtly in his address, so full of docility and good sense in his behaviour and conversation. The lessons necessary to be taught him, in part, by personating the Duke of York, were soon learned by a skill which appeared to be inborn, and the Duke seemed not then favourable for his enterprise, Margaret, in order the better to conceal him, sent him, under the care of Lady Brampton, into Portugal, where he remained a year, unknown to all but himself.

The war, which was then ready to break out between France and England, seemed to afford a proper opportunity for the discovery of this new phenomenon; and Ireland, which still retained its attachments to the house of York, was chosen as the proper place for his first appearance. He landed at Cork; and immediately assuming the name of Richard Plantagenet, drew to him partisans among that credulous people. He wrote letters to the Earls of Desmond and Kildare, inviting them to join his party: he dispersed every where the strange intelligence of his escape from the cruelty of his uncle Richard; and men, fond of every thing new and wonderful, began to make him the general subject of their discourse, and even the object of their favour.

The news soon reached France; and Charles, prompted by the secret solicitations of the Duchess of Burgundy, and the entreaties of such persons whose ambition had deserted his service, sent Perkin an invitation to repair to him at Paris. He received him with all the marks of regard due to the Duke of York; settled on him a handsome pension, assigned him magnificent lodgings, and in order to provide for all for his life, created him a pensioner, and a guard for his person, of which Lord Congeval accepted the office of captain. The French courtiers readily embraced a fiction which their sovereign thought it his interest to adopt: Perkin, by his deportment and personal qualities, supported the prepossession which was spread abroad of his royal pedigree: and the whole kingdom was full of the accomplishments, as well as the singular advantages and misfortunes, of the young Plantagenet. Wonders of this nature are commonly augmented at a distance. From France, the admiration and credulity diffused themselves into England: Sir George Nevil, Sir John Taylor, and above a hundred gentlemen more, came to Paris, in order to offer their services to the supposed Duke of York, and to share his fortunes: and the impostor had now the appearance of a court attending him, and began to entertain hopes of final success in his undertakings.

When peace was concluded between France and England at Estaples, Henry applied to have Perkin put into his hands; but Charles, resolute not to betray a young man whom he had taken to his heart, and to whom his kingdom, would agree only to dismiss him. The pretended Richard retired to the Duchess of Burgundy, and, craving her protection and assistance, offered to lay before her all the proofs of that birth to which he laid claim. The princess affected ignorance of his pretensions; even put on the appearance of being the Duchess distrustful; and having, as she said, been al of Burgundy, ready deceived by Simnel, she was determined never again to be seduced by any impostor. She desired before all the world to be instructed in his reasons for assuming the name which he bore; seemed to examine every circumstance with the most scrupulous nicety; put many particular questions to him; affected astonishment at his answers; and at last, after long and severe scrutiny, burst out into joy and admiration at his wonderful deliverance, embraced him as her nephew, the true image of Edward, the sole heir of the Plantagenets, and the legitimate successor to the English throne. She immediately assigned him an equipage suited to his pretended birth; appointed him a guard of thirty bearers; engaged every one to pay court to him; and on all occasions honoured him with the appellation of the White Rose of England. The Flemings, moved by the authority which Margaret, both from her rank and personal character, enjoyed among them, readily adopted the fiction of Perkin's royal descent, and he assumed a name which was as yet heard of: little contradiction was made to the prevailing opinion: and the English, from their great communication with the Low Countries, were every day more and more prevailed with in favour of the impostor. It was not the populace alone of England that gave credit to Perkin's pretensions. Men of the highest birth and quality, disgusted at Henry's government, by which they found the nobility depressed, began to turn their thoughts to a new design; and some of them even entered into a correspondence with him. Lord Fitzwater, Sir Simon Mountfort, Sir Thomas Thwaites, and many others of the English nobility, William Stanley himself, Lord Chamberlain, who had been so active in raising Henry to the throne, moved either by blind credulity or a restless ambition, entertained the project of a revolt in favour of his enemy.* Sir Robert Clifford and William Barley were still more open in their purposes: they went over to Flanders, were introduced by the Duchesses of Burgundy to the acquaintance of Perkin, and made him a tender of their services. Clifford wrote back to England, that he knew perfectly the person of Richard, Duke of York, that this young man was undoubtedly that prince himself, and that no circumstance of his story was exposed to the least difficulty. Such positive intelligence, conveyed by a person of his character, was sufficient, with many, to put the matter beyond question, and excited the attention and wonder even of the most indifferent. The whole nation was held in suspense; a regular conspiracy was formed against the king's authority; and a correspondence was established between the malcontents in Flanders and those in England.

The king was informed of all these particulars; but agreeably to his character, which was both cautious and reserved, he turned deliberately to counter-working the projects of his enemies. His first object was to ascertain the death of the real Duke of York, and to confirm the opinion that had always prevailed with regard to that person. Five persons had been employed by Richard in the murder of his nephews, or could give evidence with regard to it; Sir James Tyrell, to whom he had committed the government of the Tower for that purpose, and who had seen the dead princes; Forrest, Dighton, and Slater, who perpetrated the crime; and the priest who buried the bodies. Tyrell and Dighton alone were alive, and they agreed in the same story; but as the prince was dead, and as the bodies were supposed to have been removed by Richard's orders from the place where they were first interred, and could not now be found, it was not in Henry's power to put the fact, so much as he wished, beyond all doubt and controversy. He was more satisfied with more difficulty; but was in the end more successful, in detecting who this wonderful person was that thus boldly advanced pretensions to list crown. He dispersed his spies all over Flanders and England; he engaged men to pretend that they had embraced Perkin's party; he directed them to insinuate themselves into the confidence of the young man's friends; in proportion as they conveyed intelligence of any conspirator, he bribed his retainers, his domestic servants, nay, sometimes his confessor, and by these means traced up some other confederate; Clifford himself he engaged, by the hope of rewards and pardon, to betray the secrets committed to him; the more trust he gave to any of his spies, the higher resentment did he beg against them; and some of them he even caused to be publicly anathematized, in order the better to procure them the confidence of his enemies; and in the issue, the whole plan of the conspiracy was clearly laid before him; and the pedantry in adventures, life, and conversation of the pretended Duke of York. This latter part of the story was immediately published for the satisfaction of the nation: the conspirators served the story a sober and grave manner.

Meanwhile he remonstrated with the Archbishop of Canterbury, on account of the countenance and protection which was afforded in his dominions to so odious an impostor; contrary to treaties subsisting between the sovereigns, and to the mutual amity which had so long been maintained by the subjects of both states. Margaret had interest enough to get his application rejected; on pretence that Philip had no authority over the dominions of the duchess-dowager. And the king, in resentment of this injury, cut off all commerce with the Low Countries, banished the Flemings, and recalled his own subjects from those provinces. Philip retaliated by like edicts; but Henry knew, that so little mutual confidence existed, that he was not in compliance with the hauns of his prime, to be deprived of the beneficial branch of commerce which they carried on with England.

He was thus lord to inflict more effectual punishment on his domestic enemies; and when his projects were sufficiently matured, he failed not to make them feel the effects of his resentment. Almost in the same instant, he arrested Fitzwater, Mountfort, and Thwaites, together with William Daubeney, Robert Hartd, and Thomas Crossen, and Thomas Astwood. All these were arraigned, convicted, and condemned for high treason, in adhering and promising aid to Perkin. Mountfort, Ratchiffe, and Doutheney, were immediately executed; Fitzwater was sent over to Calais, and detainted in custody; but being detected in practising on his keeper for an escape, he soon after underwent the same fate. The rest were pardoned, together with some others, who had been accused and examined, but not brought to public trial.*

Greater and more solemn preparations were deemed requisite. Francis one of the trial of Stanley, Lord Chamberlain, was sent over to Calais, and detainted in custody; but being detected in practising on his keeper for an escape, he was soon after undergone the same fate. The rest were pardoned, together with some others, who had been accused and examined, but not brought to public trial.*

scrapes; the prisoner was brought to his trial, condemned, and presently after beheaded. Historians are not agreed with regard to the crime which was proved against him. The general report is, that he should have said in confidence to Clifford, that if he were the youngest of the queen, who appeared in Flanders, was really son to King Edward, he never would bear arms against him. The sentiment might disgust Henry, as implying a preference of the house of York, and a desire to establish that party among the people; but the report only founded itself on the ground, even in those arbitrary times, of a sentence of high treason against Stanley. It is more probable, therefore, as is asserted by some historians, that he had expressly requested the king to send for Perkin, and had actually sent him some supply of money.

The fate of Stanley made great impression on the kingdom, and struck all the partisans of Perkin with the deepest dismay. From Clifford's desertion they found that all their securities were betrayed; and as it appeared that Stanley, while he seemed to live in the greatest confidence with the king, had been continually surrounded by spies, who reported and registered every action in which he was engaged, nay, every word which fell from him, a general distrust took place, and all mutual confidence was destroyed, even among intimate friends and acquaintance. The jealous and severe temper of the king, together with his jealousy of all the assumptions of authority on the part of his friends, made him suspicious, and quelled not only the movements of sedition, but the very murmur of faction. Libels, however, crept out against Henry's person and administration; and being grievously propagated by every secret art, showed that there still remained among the people a disposition to disturb the peace of the kingdom, which wanted only a proper opportunity to discover itself.

But Henry continued more intent on increasing the termainence of his people, than on gaining their affections. Trusting to the great success which attended him in all his enterprises, he gave every day, more and more, a loose to his rapacious temper, and employed the arts of perversion and false assertions, as well as small and great compositions from his people. Sir William Capell, alderman of London, was condemned on some penal statutes to pay the sum of 2743 pounds, and was obliged to compound for sixteen hundred and fifteen. This was the first noted case of the kind; but it became a precedent, which prepared the way for many others. The management, indeed, of these arts of chicanery, was the great secret of the king's administration. While he depressed the nobility, he increased the power and influence of the lawyers. By that means both bestowed authority on the laws, and was enabled, whenever he pleased, to pervert them to his own advantage. His government was oppressive: but it was managed so as to secure to himself the extending of his royal authority, and to the nobility, he became in reality the sole oppressor in his kingdom.

As Perkin found that the king's authority daily gained ground among the people, and that his own pretension to be becoming obsolete, he resolved to attempt something which might revive the hopes and expectations of his partisans. Having collected a band of outlaws, pirates, robbers, and necessitous persons of all nations to the number of 600 men, he put to sea, with a resolution of making a descent in England, and of exciting the common people to arms, since all his correspondence with the nobility was cut off by Henry's vigilance and severity. Information having brought him that that which his own pretension to the North, he cast anchor on the coast of Kent, and sent some of his retainers ashore, who invited the country to join him. The gentlemen of Kent assembled some troops to oppose him; but they were only maintained as a service than by repelling the invasion: they carried the semblance of friendship to Perkin, and invited him to come himself ashore, in order to take the command over them. But the wary youth, observing that they had more order and regularity in their movements than could be supposed in new levied forces who had taken arms against established authority, refused to intrust himself in their hands; and the Kentish troops, despairing of success in their stratagem, fell upon such of his retainers as were already landed; and besides some whom they slew, they took a hundred and fifty prisoners. These were tried and condemned; and all of them executed by orders from the king, who was resolved to use no lenity towards men of such desperate fortunes.

This year a parliament was summoned in England, and another in Ireland; and some A parliament. remarkable laws were passed in both countries. The English parliament enacted that the king should not resort to arms or otherwise assist the king for the time being, should ever afterwards, either by course of law or act of parliament, be attainted for such an instance of obedience. This statute might appear to some persons to be capable of use; they were there any precise rule which always, even during the most factious times, could determine the true successor, and render every one inexcusable who did not submit to him. But as the titles of princes are then the great subject of dispute, and each party pleads tiporis in its own favour, it seems but equitable to secure those who act in support of public tranquillity, an object at all times of undoubted benefit and importance.

Henry, conscious of his disputed title, promoted this law, in order to secure his partisans against all events; but as he had himself observed a contrary practice with regard to Richard's adherents, he had reason to apprehend, that during the interval between the death of his predecessor, and his example, rather than his law, would, in case of a new revolution, be followed by his enemies. And the attempt to bind the legislature itself, by prescribing rules to future parliaments, was contradictory to the plainest principles of political government. This parliament also passed an act empowering the king to levy, by course of law, all the sums which any person had agreed to pay, by way of benevolence: a statute by which that arbitrary method of taxation was indirectly authorized and justified.

The king's authority appeared equally prevalent and uncontested in Ireland. Sir Edward Poynings had been sent over to that country, with an intention of quelling the partisans of the house of York, and of reducing the nation to submission. He was not supported by forces sufficient for that enterprise: the Irish, by flying into their woods, mountains, and forests, for some time eluded his efforts; but Poynings summoned a parliament at Dublin, where he was more successful. He passed that memorable statute, which still bears his name, and which establishes the authority of the English government in Ireland. By this statute, the king revoked the former laws of England with annulling them in Ireland; and no bill can be introduced into the Irish parliament unless it previously receive the sanction of the council of England. This latter clause seems calculated for insuring to the dominion of the king the sanction of all his predecessors, and especially granted at the desire of the Irish Commons, who intended by that means to secure themselves from the tyranny of their lords, particularly of such such debased as were of Irish extraction.

While Henry's authority was thus established throughout his dominions, and general tranquillity prevailed, the whole continent was thrown into combustion by the French invasion of Italy, and by the rapid success which attended Charles in that rash and ill-contrived enterprise. The Italians, who had entirely lost the use of arms, and who, in the midst of continual wars, had become every day more warlike, were astonished to meet an enemy, that made the field of battle their school, and accustomed to a scene of blood, and sought, at the hazard of their own lives, the death of their enemies. Their effeminate troops were dispersed every where on the approach of the French, and the French, by their skill in the science of war, were able to subdue them, and to subvert the art of fighting, and to make war a series of victories and conquests. The deputies, who were the representatives of provinces and cities, were in an instant overthrown; and through the whole length of Italy, which the French penetrated without resistance, they seemed rather to be taking quarters in their own country, than making conquests over an enemy. The maxims which the Italians, during that age, followed in negociations, as well as in calulations to support their states, as the habits to which they were addicted in war: a treacherous, deceitful, and inconsistent system of politics prevailed; and even those small remains of fidelity and honour, which were preserved in the councils of the other European princes, were ridiculed in Italy as proofs of ignorance and rusticity. Ludovico, Duke of Milan, who invited the French to invade Naples, had never desired or expected their success; and was the first that felt terror from the prosperous issue of those projects which he himself had concurred. By his intrigues a league was formed among several potentates to oppose the progress of Charles's conquests, and secure their own independence. This league was composed of Ludovico himself, the Pope, Maximilian, King of the Romans, Ferdinand of Spain, and the republic of Venice. Henry too entered into the confederacy; but was not put to any expense or trouble in consequence of his engagements.

The King of France, terrified by so powerful a combination, retired from Naples with the greater part of his army, and returned to France. The remnants which he left in the new conquest were, partly by the revolt of the inhabitants, partly by the invasion of the Spaniards, soon after subdued; and the whole kingdom of Naples suddenly returned to its allegiance under Ferdinand, son to Alphonso, who had been suddenly expelled by the irruption of the French. Ferdinand died soon after; and left his uncle, Frederic, in full possession of the throne.

CHAP. XXVI.

After Perkin was repulsed from the coast of Kent, he retired into Flanders; but as he found it impossible to procure subsistence for himself and his followers while he remained in tranquillity, he soon after made an attempt upon Ireland, which had always appeared forward to join every invader of Henry's authority. But Poyning's had now put the affairs of that island into so good a posture, that Perkin met with little success; and being tired of the savage life which he was obliged to lead while skulking among the wild Irish, he bent his course towards Scotland, and presented himself to James IV., who then governed that kingdom. He had been previously recommended to this prince by the King of France, who was disgusted at Henry for entering into the general league against him; and this recommendation was even seconded by Maximiliano, who, though one of the confederates, was also displeased with the king on account of his publicizing in England all commerce with the Low Countries. The countenance given to Perkin by these princes, procured him a favourable reception with the King of Scotland, who assured him, that, whatever he were, he Perkin never should repent putting himself in his to Scotland. But the usurious interest and plausible behaviour of the youth himself seem to have gained him credit and authority. James, whom years had not yet taught distrust or caution, was seduced to believe the story of Perkin's birth and adventures; and he carried his confidence so far, as to give him in marriage the Lady Catherine Gordon, daughter of the Earl of Huntly, and related to himself; a young lady, too, eminent for virtue as well as beauty.

There subsisted at that time a great jealousy between the courts of England and Scotland; and James was probably the more forward, on that account, to accept any fiction which he thought might reduce his enemy to distress or difficulty. He suddenly resolved to make an inroad into England, attended by some of the borderers; and he carried Perkin along with him, that the appearance of the pretended prince might raise an insurrection in the northern counties. Perkin in himself dispensed a manifesto, in which he set forth his own story, and craved the assistance of all his subjects in expelling the usurper, whose tyranny and maladministration, whose depression of the nobility by the elevation of mean and base, whose arbitrary, disjointed, and multiplied impositions and vexations, had justly, he said, rendered him odious to all men. But Perkin's pretensions, attended with repeated disappointments, were now become stale to the inhabitants of the populous; and the hostile disposition which subsisted between the kingdoms rendered a prince, supported by the Scots, but an unwelcome present to the English nation. The ravages also committed by the borderers, accustomed to plunder and disorder, struck a terror into all men; and made the people prepare rather for repelling the invaders than for joining them. Perkin, that he might support his pretensions to royal birth, feigned great compassion for the misery of his subjects; and he secretly made his ally against the dependencies exercised by the Scottish army: but James told him, that he doubted his concern was employed only in behalf of an enemy, and that he was anxious to preserve what never should belong to him. That prince now began to perceive that his attempt would be fruitless; and hearing of an army which was on its march to attack him, he thought proper to retreat into his own country.

The king discovered little anxiety to procure either repARATION or vengeance for this insult committed on him by the Scottish nation: his chief concern was to draw advantage from it, by the presence which it might afford him to levy troops on his own subjects. He had convened a parliament, to whom he made bitter complaints against the irruption of the Scots, the absurd imposture countenanced by that nation, the cruel devastations committed in the northern counties, the assistance which had been offered both to the king and kingdom of England. The parliament made the expected return to this discourse, by granting a subsidy to the amount of 120,000 pounds, together with three fifteenths. After making this grant, they were dismissed.

The vote of parliament for imposing the tax was without much difficulty procured by the authority of Henry; and he found it not so easy to levy the money upon his subjects. The people, who were acquainted with the immense treasures which he had amassed, could ill brook the new impositions raised on every slight occasion; and it is probable that the flux, which was universally known to be in his tithe, made his reign the more subject to insurrections and rebellions. When the subsidy began to be levied in Cornwall, the inhabitants, numerous and poor, were not generally courageous, nor willing to resist a tax occasioned by a sudden inroad of the Scots, from which they esteemed themselves entirely secure, and which had usually been repelled by the force of the northern counties. Their ill humour was further excited by one Michael Joseph, a fervor of Bodmin, a notable prating fellow, who, by thrusting himself forward on every occasion, and being loudest in every complaint against the government, had acquired an authority among those rude people. Thomas Flammece, too, a lawyer, who had become the oracle of the neighbourhood, encouraged the sedition, by informing them that the tax, though imposed by parliament, was entirely illegal; that the northern nobility were bound, by their oaths, to defend the nation against the king, and that if these new impositions were tamely submitted to, the avance of Henry and his of ministers would soon render the burden intolerable to the nation. The Cornish, he said, must deliver to the king a petition, seconded by such a force as would give it authority; and, in order to procure the concurrence of the rest of the kingdom, care must be taken, by their orderly deportment, to show that they had nothing in view but on account of the king's love, and the redress of all those grievances under which the people had so long laboured.

Encouraged by these speeches, the multitude flocked together, and armed themselves for flight and resistance; and a great number of the country people are usually possessed of. Flammece and Joseph were chosen their leaders.
They soon conducted the Cornish through the county of Devon, and reached that of Somerset. At Taunton, the rebels killed, in their fury, an officious and eager commissioner of the subsidy, whom they called the Provost of Popes. They would be in order of battle, said Lord Audley, a nobleman of an ancient family, popular in his deportment, but vain, ambitious, and restless in his temper. He had from the beginning maintained a secret connection with the first rising on the moorings, and was now joyfully received by them as their leader. Proud of the countenance given them by so considerable a nobleman, they continued their march; breathing destruction to the king's ministers, and particularly to Morton, Lord Treasurer, and Sir Reginald Bray, who were deemed the most active instruments in all his oppressions. Notwithstanding their rage against the administration, they carefully followed the directions given them by their leaders; and as they met with no resistance, they committed, during their march, no violence or disorder.

The rebels had been told by Flamisco, that the inhabitants of Kent, as they had ever, during all ages, remained unsubdued, and had even maintained their independence during the Norman conquest, would surely embrace their party, and declare themselves for a cause which was no other than the welfare of the multitude. But the Kentish people had very lately distinguished themselves by repelling Perkin's invasion; and as they had received from the king many gracious acknowledgments for this service, their affections were, by that means, much consolidated to his interest. It was easy, therefore, for the Earl of Kent, Lord Abergavenny, and Lord Cobham, who possessed great authority in those parts, to retain the people in obedience; and the Cornish rebels, though they pitched their camp near Eltham, at the very gates of London, and invited all the people to join them, got reinforcement from no quarter. There wanted not discontentments every where, but no one would take part in so rash and ill-considered a scheme; and besides, the situation in which the king's affairs then stood, discouraged even the boldest and most daring.

Henry, in order to oppose the Scots, had already levied an army, which he put under the command of Lord Daubeney, the chamberlain; and as soon as he heard of the Cornish insurrection, he ordered it to march southwards, and suppress the rebels. Not to leave the northern frontier defenceless, he despatched thither the Earl of Surrey, with a body of forces for the protection of the borders, and made him general against the enemy. Henry found here the concurrence of the three most fatal incidents than can befall a monarchy: a foreign enemy, a domestic rebellion, and a pretender to his crown; but having recourse to arms and treasure; and still more, in the intrepidity and courage of his own temper. He did not, however, immediately give full scope to his military spirit. On other occasions, he had always hastened to a decision; and it was a usual saying with him, that he desired but to see his rebels: but as the Cornish mutineers behaved in an insubordinate manner, and committed no spoil on the country; as they received no accession of force on their march or in their encampment; and as such hasty and popular tumults might be expected to diminish every moment by delay; he took post in London, and assiduously prepared the means of insuring victory.

But after all his forces were collected, he divided them into three bodies, and marched out to assail the enemy. The first body, commanded by the Earl of Oxford, and under him by the Earls of Essex and Suffolk, were appointed to place themselves behind the hill on which the rebels were encamped: the second, and most considerable, Henry put under the command of Lord Daubeney, and ordered him to attack the enemy in front, and bring on the action. The third, he kept as a body of reserve adhering to his own person, to look out in St. George's fields; where he secured the city, and could easily, as occasion served, either restore the fight or finish the victory. To put the enemy off their guard, he had spread a report that he was not to attack them till some days after; and the better to confirm in this opinion, he began not the action till near the evening. Daubeney beat a detachment of the rebels from Depford bridge; and before the main body had arrived, he had collected twothirds of the hill, and placed himself in array before them. They were formidable from their numbers, being sixteen thousand strong, and were not defective in valour; but being surprised, and not provided with cavalry or artillery, they were but an unequal match for the king's forces. Daubeney began the attack with courage, and even with a contempt for the enemy, which had almost proved fatal to him. He rushed into the midst of them, and was taken prisoner; but soon after was released by his own troops. After some resistance, the rebels were broken, and put to flight. Lord Audley, Flamisco, and Joseph, their leaders, were taken, and all three executed.

The latter seemed even to exalt in his end, and boasted; with a preposterous ambition, that he should make a figure in history. The rebels, being surrounded on every side by the king's troops, were almost all made prisoners, and immediately dismissed without further punishment: whether, that Henry was satisfied with the victims who had fallen in the field, and who amounted to near two thousand, or that he pitied the ignorance and simplicity of levellers, and men of little consideration, or that he was pleased that they had never, during their insurrection, disputed his title, and had shown no attachment to the house of York, the highest crime, of which, in his eyes, they could have been guilty.

To the Scottish insurrections in England. He levied a considerable army, and sat down before the castle of Norham, in Northumberland; but found that place, by the precaution of Fox, Bishop of Durham, so well provided, both with men and ammunition, that he made little or no progress in the siege.

Hearing that the Earl of Surrey had collected some forces, and was advancing upon him, he retreated into his own country, exposed himself in the presence of the English general, who besieged and took Aston, a small castle lying a few miles beyond Berwick. These unsuccessful or frivolous attempts on both sides, prognosticated a speedy end to the war; and Henry, notwithstanding his superior force, was no less desirous than James of terminating the differences between the nations. Not to depart, however, from his dignity, by making the first advances, he employed in this friendly office Peter Hals, a man of address and learning, who had come to him as ambassador from Ferdinand and Isabella, and who was charged with a commission of negociating the marriage of the Infanta Catharine, their daughter, with Arthur, Prince of Wales.

Hals took a journey northwards, and offered his mediation between James and Henry, as minister of a prince who was in alliance with both potentates. Commissioners were soon appointed to meet, and confer on terms of accommodation. The first demand of the English was, that Perkin should be put into their hands: James replied, that he himself was no judge of the young man's pretensions, but having received him as a supplicant, and promised him protection, he was determined not to betray a man who had trusted to his good faith and his generosity. The next demand of the English met with no better reception: they required repayment for the ravages committed by the late insurrections in England: the Scottish commissioners replied, that the spoils were like water spilt upon the ground, which could never be recovered, and that Henry's subjects were better able to bear the loss, than their master to repair it. Henry's council next proposed, that the two kings should have an interview at Newcastle, in order to adjust all differences; but James said, that he meant to treat of a peace, not to go a begging for it. Lent the conferences should break off altogether without effect, a truce was concluded, for some months; and James, perceiving that, while Perkin remained in Scotland, he himself never should enjoy a solid peace with Henry, privately desired him to depart the kingdom.
Access was now barred Perkin into the Low Countries, his usual retreat in all his disappointments. The Flemish merchants, who severely felt the loss resulting from the interruption of commerce with England, had made such interest in the archduke's council, that commissioners were sent to London in order to treat of an accommodation. The Flemish court agreed, that all English rebels should be excluded the Low Countries; and, in this prohibition, the denouement of the duchess-dowager were expressly comprehended. When this principal article was agreed to, all the other terms were easily adjusted. A treaty of commerce was finished, which was favourable to the state to which they longed for the appellation of Interius magnus, the great treaty. And when the English merchants returned to their usual abode at Antwerp, they were publicly received, as in procession, with joy and festivity.

Perkin was a Fleming by descent, though born in England; and it might, therefore, be doubted, whether he was included in the treaty between the two nations; but as he must dismiss all his English retainers, if he took shelter in the Low Countries, and as he was sure of a cold reception, if not bad usage, among people who were determined to keep on terms of friendship with the court of England, he fitted for some time, in the wilds and fastnesses of Ireland. Impatient, however, of retreat, which was both disagreeable and dangerous, he held consultations with his followers, Ferne, Selken, and Astley, three broken tradesmen; by these he was resolved to try the issue of Cornwall, whose mutinous disposition, notwithstanding the king's severity, still subsisted after the suppression of their rebellion. No sooner did he appear at Bodmin in Cornwall than the people, in a number of three thousand, flocked to his standard; and Perkin, elated with this appearance of success, took him, for the first time, the appellation of Richard IV., King of England. Not to say, for the expectations of his followers to languish, he presented himself before Exeter; and, by many fair promises, invited that city to join him. Finding that the inhabitants shut their gates against him, he laid siege to the place; but being unprovided with artillery, ammunition, and every thing requisite for the attempt, he made no progress in his undertaking. Messengers were sent to the king, informing him of this insurrection; the citizens of Exeter, meanwhile, were determined to hold out to the last extremity, in expectation of receiving succour from the well-known vigilance of that monarch.

When Henry was informed that Perkin was landed in England, he expressed great joy, and prepared himself with all the speed he could to overtake him, in his great length, to put a period to pretensions which had so long given him vexation and inquietude. All the courtiers, sensible that their activity on this occasion would be the more calculated to the best purpose which they could render the king, displayed their zeal for the enterprise, and forwarded his preparations. The Lords Daubeney and Broke, with Sir Rice ap-Thomas, hastened forward with a small body of troops to the relief of Exeter. The Earl of Devonshire, and the most considerable gentlemen in the county of that name, took arms of their own accord, and marched to join the king's generals. The Duke of Buckingham put himself at the head of a troop, consisting of young noblemen and gentry, who served as volunteers, and who longed for an opportunity of displaying their courage and their loyalty. The king himself prepared to follow with a considerable army; and thus all England seemed united against a prince, who had at first engaged their attention, and divided their affections.

Perkin, informed of these great preparations, immediately raised the siege of Exeter, and retired to Taunton. The king now summoned the number of over seven thousand, and seemed still resolved to maintain his cause, he himself depaired of success, and secretly withdrew to the sanctuary of Beaulieu, in the New Forest. The Cornish rebels submitted to the king's mercy, and found themselves not yet exhausted in their behalf. Except a few persons of desperate fortunes, who were executed, and some others who were severely fined, all the rest were dismissed with impunity. Lady Catherine Gordon, wife to Perkin, fell into the hands of the victor, and was treated with a generosity which does him honour. He took her with many marks of regard, placed her in a respectable station about the queen, and assigned her a person, in whose judgement she esteemed that his successor.

Henry deliberated what course to take with Perkin himself. Some counselled him to make the privileges of the church yield to the rights of state, and make the rebels fly to the sanctuary, only by violence from without, and in the apellation of Interius magnus, the great treaty. And when the English merchants returned to their usual abode at Antwerp, they were publicly received, as in procession, with joy and festivity.
